> Finally, [32] [Layne] argues that there is no evidence of any damage to Purolite for any of these acts of competition. Not true. Those acts of competition directly led to the breakdown of the Agreement. SOF at ¶ 71. Indeed, without those acts of competition, the parties would still be working together to produce ArsenX today. SOF at ¶ 71. And the damage amounts to Purolite have been extensively explained by Purolite's damages expert Mr. Troxel. SOF ¶ 92. What's more, Purolite has suffered intangible, yet real, damage as result [sic] of these acts of competition including the loss of business and diminished reputation. SOF ¶ 71.

First, the citation to the expert report of Mr. Troxel (Purolite's damage expert) in Paragraph 92 of Purolite's Statement of Facts, as noted above, provides evidence of the amount of damage, but it does not provide any evidence of the fact of damage to Purolite. In his report, Mr. Troxel stated that in making his calculations, he assumed proof of the alleged breach,[8] and he calculated his lost sales figure for this claim based on Purolite's "belief" that it lost sales because of Layne's actions in the marketplace. Mr. Troxel did not provide any expert opinion that Purolite [33] lost sales because of the alleged acts (and it is hard to imagine that he could do so as an expert); rather, he opined that if Purolite in fact lost sales, those sales totaled to a certain figure.

Purolite's only other citation to the record in support of its argument that it suffered damages (the breakdown of the Agreement and the relationship, "intangible" damages) is to Paragraph 71 of its statement of facts. That paragraph, however, relates only to Purolite's ability to make sales made by Resin Tech (addressed above). Neither that paragraph nor any other paragraph in Purolite's Statement of Facts in its response to this motion cites to evidence that Purolite suffered actual harm from the alleged anticompetitive acts by Layne. Accordingly, Purolite has not provided evidence, as required in opposing summary judgment, [34] that it suffered damages as a result of the alleged breach, and summary judgment is therefore appropriate on this claim.

2. MERITS OF THE CLAIM

Layne is also entitled to summary judgment for another reason. In arguing that it did not breach Section 11.1 of the Agreement, Layne notes that all of the restrictions in that section relate to activities involving "Media". That term is defined in the introduction the Agreement:

> Whereas, SolmeteX has developed a resin primarily used in arsenic removal from aqueous streams, which is referred to as "AsXnp" or "ArsenXnp", comprised of SolmeteX's chemistry applied to a Purolite base bead (in this case, Purolite's A-500P base bead or improved alternate) (the "Media");

Layne has provided evidence that the alleged competitive acts involved products that did not use a Purolite bead, but instead used beads manufactured by others. Thus, Layne argues that any such acts did not involve "Media", which must by definition include a Purolite bead, and that it [*1221] therefore cannot be said to have breached Section 11.1.

Purolite does not dispute that the alleged acts of breach did not involve any product or resin using a Purolite bead. Rather, Purolite argues that the [35] Court should not interpret "Media" to require the use of a Purolite bead, despite the plain language of the Agreement's definition. Purolite instead asks the Court to interpret "Media" to be a resin product with SolmeteX's chemistry on any substrate, which interpretation Purolilte asserts would be in keeping with the parties' intent. Purolite argues that following the plain language of the definition would be absurd and unreasonable, although it does not explain that absurdity. In support of its interpretation, Purolite argues that the title of the Agreement ("Exclusive . . . Agreement") and other terms in the Agreement show that the intent was for Purolite to be the exclusive manufacturer for the product (Purolite appointed as "exclusive manufacturer and supplier of the Media") and to prevent SolmeteX from competing with Purolite (Solmetex may not direct sell the [8] Under Delaware law, which the parties agree applies here, resulting damage from the breach is an element of a claim for breach of contract. See H-M Wexford LLC v. Encorp, Inc., 832 A.2d 129, 140 (Del. Ch. 2003); see also Paul v. Deloitte & Touche, LLP, 974 A.2d 140 (Del. 2009) (affirming summary judgment based on failure to show damage from alleged breach of contract).

Media to third party distributors, Purolite is lead distributor of the Media, Solmetex will use its best efforts to avoid competing directly at the same customers, and Purolite and SolmeteX will work together to penetrate the market).[9]

The Court rejects Purolite's alternative definition. The Agreement's definition of "Media" to include a Purolite base bead is unambiguous. The Agreement as a whole does not show that definition to be unreasonable or absurd, as the parties quite reasonably could have intended to restrict competing acts only to the extent that they involve the unique combination of SolmeteX's chemistry and Purolite's base bead, with which the product was originally constructed. The other terms from the Agreement cited by Purolite also relate to the Media and do not contradict the definition's plain language or Section 11.1; nor do they suggest that the parties intended to restrict SolmeteX's activities involving the use of a different bead. The Court therefore [37] interprets Section 11.1, in conjunction with the Agreement's unambiguous definition of "Media", as prohibiting only certain activities by SolmeteX involving the use of product or resin that includes a Purolite base bead.

Purolite does not dispute that the alleged acts by Layne did not involve a product using a Purolite base bead, or provide evidence to the contrary. Accordingly, Purolite has not provided evidence that Layne breached Section 11.1 by those acts, and summary judgment is warranted on this claim for that reason as well.[10]

E. Breach of Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

Purolite also asserts a counterclaim for breach of the Agreement's implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, based on the same anti-competitive acts by Layne that Purolite alleged with respect to the counterclaim under Section 11.1.

[*1222] 1. DAMAGES

Layne again argues that Purolite has failed to provide evidence of damage, for the same reasons set forth above with respect to the claim under Section 11.1. In [38] response, Purolite only incorporates its prior arguments concerning the claim under Section 11.1. As explained above, Purolite did not provide evidence of the fact of its damage from the alleged anti-competitive acts. Accordingly, summary judgment is also appropriate on Purolite's claim for breach of the implied covenant.[11]

2. MERITS OF THE CLAIM

The Court concludes that summary judgment on this claim is warranted for another reason as well. Delaware courts have expounded on this cause of action as follows:

> All contracts are subject to an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. This doctrine, however, does not provide a Delaware court with the authority to rewrite or supply omitted provisions to a written contract. Rather, a court should be cautious when implying a contractual obligation and do so only where obligations which can be understood from the text [39] of the written agreement have nevertheless been omitted from the [9] Purolite also cites testimony by a SolmeteX executive that because of the definition of [36] "Media", SolmeteX was in a better situation than he initially anticipated, and because of that "loophole", SolmeteX could have another company make the product with a non-Purolite bead. Of course, if a contract is unambiguous, such parol evidence is not admissible to alter or add a term to the contract or even to create an ambiguity, see Capital Mgmt. Co. v. Brown, 813 A.2d 1094, 1097 (Del. 2002), and the Court concludes that there is no ambiguity here.

[10] Because of this ruling, the Court does not address the parties' arguments concerning the interpretation of "sales activities" and whether the alleged acts fell within the scope of that term.

[11] In addition, a claim for breach of the implied covenant does not fall within any of the exceptions in Section 9.4 of the Agreement; therefore, this claim, by which Purolite seeks damages for lost sales, would also be barred by that section's prohibition against the recovery of lost profits and other consequential damages.

> agreement in the literal sense. In this instance, a court's inquiry should focus on what the parties likely would have done if they had considered the issue involved. The express terms of a contract and not an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, however, will govern the parties' relations when the terms expressly address the dispute.

*Fitzgerald v. Cantor, 1998 Del. Ch. LEXIS 212, 1998 WL 842316, at 1 (Del. Ch. Nov. 10, 1998) (unpub. op.) (footnotes and internal quotations omitted).

> Under Delaware law, the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is employed as a means of honoring the parties' reasonable expectations in forming a contract. Courts must interpret the reasonable expectations of the parties within the context of existing contract terms, however. Accordingly, the implied covenant cannot be asserted to circumvent the express terms of the parties' bargain or to create new duties unattached to the underlying contract, and courts should not imply alleged obligation where the contract addresses the subject of the alleged wrong but fails to include the obligation alleged. Thus, the Delaware Supreme Court has consistently [40] held that obligations under the covenant of good faith and fair dealing should be implied only in rare instances.

*Homan v. Turoczy, 2005 Del. Ch. LEXIS 121, 2005 WL 2000756, at 18 (Del. Ch. Aug. 12, 2005) (unpub. op.) (footnotes omitted).

With respect to this claim, Purolite asks the Court to recognize an implied term prohibiting Layne from engaging in the alleged anti-competitive acts, even if those acts do not involve products using the Purolite base bead and thus do not involve the "Media". The Agreement, however, contains specific terms concerning prohibited anticompetitive acts by SolmeteX. Thus, SolmeteX's (and Layne's) restrictions are expressly stated, and under Delaware law, this Court may not inject other obligations relating to non-competition by SolmeteX into the contract under the guise of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Accordingly, [*1223] Purolite's claim under this doctrine fails, and Layne is awarded summary judgment for this reason as well.

F. Unfair Competition

In the Pretrial Order, Purolite asserts a claim for "common law unfair competition." Layne seeks summary judgment on that claim on the basis that such a claim is not recognized under Kansas law. Purolite agrees that Kansas [41] law applies and that Kansas does not recognize this claim. Purolite therefore states that it withdraws this claim. Based on Purolite's admission that the claim as asserted in the Pretrial Order cannot stand, however, the Court deems it appropriate to enter summary judgment in Layne's favor on this claim.

G. Restraint of Trade

Finally, Purolite seeks an injunction prohibiting Layne's enforcement of one provision of Section 11.2 of the Agreement. The provision in question reads as follows:

11. Non-Competition

> 11.2. Restrictions on Purolite. . . . During the Term and hereafter, Purolite agrees not to directly or indirectly use any Intellectual Property resulting from its activities under this Agreement to directly or indirectly manufacture, sell, supply or use any products or media substantially similar to, or competitive with, the Media (excluding any existing product already manufactured by Purolite as of the date of this Agreement) or other products of SolmeteX. . . .

Purolite claims that this provision should be deemed void as an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of one of Kansas's antitrust statutes, K.S.A. § 50-112. The statute reads as follows:

> All arrangements, contracts, [42] agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons made with a view or which tend to prevent full and free competition in the importation, transportation or sale of articles imported into this state, or in the product, manufacture or sale of articles of domestic growth or product of domestic raw material, or for the loan or use of money, or to fix attorney or doctor fees, and all arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts or combinations between persons, designed or which tend to advance, reduce or control the price or the cost to the producer or to the consumer of any such products or articles, or to control the cost or rate of insurance, or which tend to advance or control the rate of interest for the loan or use of moneys to the borrower, or any other services, are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful and void.

Id. (emphasis added). Purolite argues that this provision in Section 11.2 of the Agreement unreasonably restricts its ability to compete with Layne because the restriction lacks any temporal or geographical limitation; the restriction goes beyond what is necessary to protect Layne's interest in its intellectual property, in light of protection under the [43] patent laws and other terms in the Agreement; Purolite is restricted from using intellectual property jointly owned with Layne; a limited number of competitors operate in this market; and the product, which removes arsenic from water, benefits public health.

Layne seeks summary judgment on this claim, arguing as a matter of law that Purolite has not shown that this contractual provision is an unreasonable restraint of trade in violation of the Kansas antitrust statute. The Court concludes that the relevant caselaw indicates that the [*1224] Kansas Supreme Court would not deem this provision void as a violation of K.S.A. § 50-112. Accordingly, the Court agrees with Layne that summary judgment is appropriate here.

In 1999, the Kansas Supreme Court noted that, although Section 50-112 is broad on its face, "there has been no meaningful interpretation" of the statute since its enactment more than one hundred years ago, as only a few cases involving the statute had come before the supreme court, and none since 1959. See Bergstrom v. Noah, 266 Kan. 829, 843-44, 974 P.2d 520 (1999). That 1959 case, however, is at least somewhat instructive. In Okerberg v. Crable, 185 Kan. 211, 341 P.2d 966 (1959), the court placed the burden of [44] proof on the party challenging the contract and applied a presumption of validity, in accordance with its earlier cases, as follows:

> There is no presumption that a contract is illegal. He who denies his liability under a contract which he admits having made, must make the fact of its illegality apparent. The burden of showing it wrong is on him who seeks to deny his obligation thereon. The presumption is in favor of innocence, and the taint of wrong is a matter of defense.

Id. at 217 (quoting Morrison v. Bandt, 145 Kan. 942, 945, 67 P.2d 584 (1937), which quoted an earlier case). The court also confirmed that the governing test under the statute is one of reasonableness:

> The old rule as to limitations of time and space with respect to contracts involving restraint of trade has given way to the modern doctrine of reasonableness and the real test is never whether there is any restraint but always whether the restraint is reasonable under the facts and circumstances of the particular case.

Id. (quoting Heckard v. Park, 164 Kan. 216, 188 P.2d 926, syl. ¶ 7 (1948)). The question of reasonableness depends "upon the fundamental elements of common fairness in view of the facts and circumstances of the parties." Id. (quoting [45] Heckard, 164 Kan. at 224).

Applying these standards in Okerberg, the supreme court held that a restriction among milk haulers concerning routes was reasonable. See id. at 217-18. In so concluding, the court reviewed and distinguished several cases that involved either price-fixing or a monopolized market. See id. at 215-17.

At the time Okerberg was decided, the supreme court had last addressed Section 50-112 in Barton v. Hackney, 167 Kan. 754, 208 P.2d 590 (1949), which involved a contract for the sale of a restaurant that also prohibited the seller from competing in that city for a period of time. See id. In holding that that restraint was reasonable and did not violate Section 50-112, the court noted that the statute "was not passed with the intention of prohibiting such a contract as this made in connection with the sale of a business." See id. at 760-61.[12] The court also relied on its previous opinion in Mills v. Ressler, 87 Kan. 549, 125 P. 58 (1912), in which the court had stated that the decisive test under this statute for contracts that do not restrain competition generally is the resulting injury to the public. See Barton, 167 Kan. at 760 (quoting Mills, 87 Kan. at 554). The Barton court further noted [46] that in Mills, for purposes of that inquiry, it had distinguished contracts "that stifled competition between public service and like [*1225] corporations." See id. at 760 (citing Mills, 87 Kan. at 554). In Mills, the court upheld as valid under Section 50-112 a contract by which a physician sold his practice and agreed not to practice or to disclose or sell certain formulas. See Mills, 87 Kan. at 555. In so finding in Mills, the supreme court applied a standard of reasonableness, as follows:

> [T]he validity of a contract in partial restraint of trade or business is not to be determined by the arbitrary measures of extent in time, extent in space, and the like, but by its reasonableness under all the circumstances, having regard both for the liberty of a person to make beneficial use of his own, and for the public consequences of such use.

Id. at 554. The court proceeded to make the distinction later affirmed in Barton:

> Therefore the subject of the contract belongs to a different class from those which involve competition between public service corporations like gas and electric light companies, or which involve natural competition in ordinary branches of trade.

Id.

The Kansas Supreme Court also upheld a contract against this statute in Heckard v. Park, 164 Kan. 216, 188 P.2d 926 (1948), in which the contract allegedly restrained competition by prohibiting the defendant from taking singing lessons from any instructor other than the plaintiff. See id. The court applied the same standards from Mills that it later applied in Barton and Okeberg:

> The real question is never whether there is any restraint of trade, but always whether the restraint is reasonable in view of all the facts and circumstances and whether it is inimical to the public welfare. If it is reasonable and does not contravene public welfare the contract will be upheld. . . .
> The old rule as to limitations of time and space has given way to that of reasonableness. The question of reasonableness of a contract of this character frequently depends upon fundamental elements of common fairness in view of the facts and circumstances of the parties.

Id. at 223-24 (citations omitted). In finding the [48] contract before it to be reasonable, the court distinguished one case involving the furnishing of electricity for the public and another involving price-fixing. See id. at 224.

The Court also notes the supreme court's opinion in Gard v. Holmes' Estate, 132 Kan. 443, 295 P. 716 (1931), in which the supreme court invalidated under the Kansas antitrust statutes a secret agreement to hire away an undertaker in a particular city to control price and cost in that market. See id. The court noted in Gard, however, that if the plaintiffs had simply bought out the undertaker's business with an agreement for him not to compete there, the court would have had "little hesitation in upholding the contract." See id. at 446. Years later, in Okerberg, the supreme court relied on this distinction and reaffirmed that "relaxing" of the strict rule of earlier cases. See Okerberg, 185 Kan. at 216 (citing Gard, 132 Kan. at 446).

Finally, even though the case does not specifically refer to Section 50-112 in discussing the Kansas antitrust statutes generally, the Kansas Supreme Court's opinion in Sage v. Oil Country Specialties Mfg. Co., 134 Kan. 215, 5 P.2d 1091 (1931), supports the Court's decision here. Like the present case, Sage [49] involved an agreement for the license of patented technology [*1226] that had allegedly been breached by the sale of a competing product by the licensee. See id. The court held that the contract was not void under Kansas's anti-monopoly acts,

[12] At one point in the opinion, [47] the Barton court mistakenly referred to Section 50-118, but it referred at other places to the defendant's argument under Section 50-112, and it quoted and considered the latter statute. See Barton, 167 Kan. 754, 208 P.2d 590.

K.S.A. § 50-101 et seq. See id. at 220. The court noted that "[t]he main purpose of the anti-trust acts is to prevent a person or an association from gaining control of the market, shutting off competition, and fixing prices at will to the prejudice of the public," and that "[t]he protection of the public is the vital thing in the statute." See id. The court stressed that the defendant could still sell other products, as long as they didn't compete with plaintiff's product; that there was no monopoly to harm the public; and that competition generally was not restrained, as others could still sell competing products. See id. at 219-20.

Based on these cases from the Kansas Supreme Court, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Purolite has not met its burden to show that the provision in Section 11.2 of the Agreement is unreasonable in violation of K.S.A. § 50-112. Under Kansas law, the Agreement is presumed to be valid. As a part of the Agreement, Layne [50] granted a license and disclosed its intellectual property to Purolite, and it was reasonable for the parties to agree to restrict Purolite's use of that intellectual property and any other intellectual property that resulted from activities under the Agreement to compete with Layne's own products. Purolite was not prohibited from competing with Layne altogether—it only had to forego competition using the intellectual property gained as a result of a contract that included benefits for Purolite and that Purolite willingly entered into. Nor did the Agreement stifle competition in the market generally, as Purolite has not shown that a monopoly existed here. Nor did the Agreement involve a public service corporation or the like. The fact that the restriction did not include temporal or geographic limitations is not especially pertinent, as the Kansas Supreme Court has made clear. This case does not involve a monopoly or price-fixing, as in the cases consistently distinguished by the supreme court. Moreover, if the right to compete could not be contracted away in this manner, companies would be discouraged from licensing their technology to other companies. Finally, Purolite has not cited [51] any Kansas authority suggesting that Section 11.2 should be invalidated as a violation of K.S.A. § 50-112.

The Court is convinced that the Kansas Supreme Court would reject this challenge under Section 50-112 and uphold Section 11.2 of the Agreement. Accordingly, the Court also rejects this challenge, and it awards summary judgment in favor of Layne on Purolite's counterclaim for restraint of trade.[13]

IV. Layne's Claims for Breach of Contract

Layne asserts various claims against Purolite for breach of the Agreement, which are the subject of summary judgment motions by the parties. Layne seeks summary judgment on its claim for breach of Purolite's obligation to pay royalties for sales of the product, and on its claim for a permanent injunction prohibiting the further breach of Section 11.2 of the Agreement (Doc. # 406). Purolite seeks summary judgment on any claims by Layne under Sections 10.1 and 11.2 of the Agreement (Doc. # 410).

[*1227] A. Purolite's [52] Defense of a Prior Material Breach

Purolite seeks to avoid summary judgment based on the defense that its own performance under the Agreement was excused by a prior material breach of the Agreement by SolmeteX or Layne. *See, e.g., Eastern Elec. and Heating, Inc. v. Pike Creek Prof. Ctr., Inc., 1986 Del. LEXIS 1191, 1986 WL 9031, at 3 (Del. Aug. 5, 1986) (unpub. op.) (noting the general rule that "the party first guilty of a material breach of contract cannot complain if the other party subsequently refuses to perform"); *DeMarie v. Neff, 2005 Del. Ch. LEXIS 5, 2005 WL 89403, at 4 (Del. Ch. Jan. 12, 2005) (unpub. op.) (material breach may excuse other party's performance). The Court addresses in turn each prior breach alleged by Purolite.

1. PROVISION OF SPECIFICATIONS

[13] After these rulings by the Court, the only remaining counterclaim is Purolite's claim for breach of contract, in the amount of $53,802.11, based on SolmeteX's alleged failure to pay for product sold to it by Purolite in 2009. (See Pretrial Order ¶ 5.b.)

Purolite contends that SolmeteX breached Section 1.2 of the Agreement by failing to provide sufficient specifications for the product, and in support, Purolite refers to the arguments that it made in opposition to summary judgment on its affirmative counterclaims. The Court has already concluded, however, that Purolite has not presented evidence to establish a breach of this provision. See supra Part III.B.2. Accordingly, Purolite may not rely on this alleged prior [53] material breach in opposition to summary judgment on Layne's contract claims.[14]

2. COMPETITIVE ACTS

Purolite, again relying on its arguments in support of its affirmative counterclaim, also argues that Layne breached Section 11.1 of the Agreement and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing by engaging in certain competitive acts. Because the Court has already rejected this claim on its merits, see supra Parts III.D.2, III.E.2, Purolite may not rely on this alleged prior material breach.

3. PURSUIT OF SUSPECTED INFRINGER

Third, Purolite argues that Layne breached Section 4.6.1 of the Agreement by failing to pursue a party suspected of infringing the patent. The Court concludes, however, that this alleged breach by Layne was not in fact a material breach.

Delaware courts have recognized that a prior breach must be material to excuse later performance:

> Not all breaches will authorize the other party to abandon or refuse further performance. To justify termination, it is necessary that [54] the failure of performance on the part of the other go to the substance of the contract. "Modern courts, and the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, recognize that something more than mere default is ordinarily necessary to excuse the other party's performance in the typical situation, subscribing to the general rule that where the performance of one party is due before that of the other party, such as when the former party's performance requires a period of time, an uncured failure of performance by the former can suspend or discharge the latter's duty of performance only if the failure is material or substantial." Thus, although a material breach excuses performance of a contract, a nonmaterial—or de minimis—breach will not allow the non-breaching party to avoid its obligations under the contract.

[*1228] *DeMarie, 2005 Del. Ch. LEXIS 5, 2005 WL 89403, at 4 (emphasis in original) (quoting 14 Williston on Contracts § 43:5 (4th ed. 2004)) (footnotes omitted). In Hexion Specialty Chemicals, Inc. v. Huntsman Corp., 965 A.2d 715 (Del. Ch. 2008), the court further quoted from the Williston treatise's explanation of materiality as follows:

> Thus if the prior breach of such a contract was slight or minor, as opposed to material [55] or substantial, the nonbreaching party is not relieved of his or her duty of performance, although he or she may recover damages for the breach. . . . Generally, such nonperformance will attain this level of materiality only when it goes to the root, heart or essence of the contract or is of such a nature as to defeat the object of the parties in making the contract, or, as it has sometimes been said, when the covenant not performed is of such importance that the contract would not have been made without it.

Id. at 752 n.99 (quoting 14 Williston on Contracts § 43:5-6).

The Court concludes that even if Layne did commit a breach by failing to pursue a single suspected infringer, Resin Tech (an issue that the Court does not decide), such a breach would not have been a material breach. First, Purolite has not offered any argument why this breach meets this standard of materiality. Second, the Agreement reveals that its essential purpose was to grant Purolite a license to use SolmeteX's intellectual property to manufacture and distribute a product, and the alleged failure by Layne to pursue Resin Tech was not so substantial as to defeat that object. In opposing summary judgment on its counterclaim [56] based on this alleged breach, Purolite could not provide evidence that it suffered any resulting damage. Nor did Purolite dispute Layne's evidence that the degree of suspected infringement and the quality of the infringing product did not justify an infringement

[14] In light of the parties' briefs relating to Purolite's counterclaims, the Court rejects Purolite's argument that Layne improperly failed to negate this defense in its initial brief on this motion.

lawsuit against Resin Tech. Nor did Purolite dispute Layne's contention that Purolite also elected not to pursue Resin Tech, although the Agreement gave it that right. These facts confirm that the alleged breach was minor and thus nonmaterial. Accordingly, Purolite may not rely on this alleged prior material breach in opposition to summary judgment on Layne's contract claims.[15]

4. FAILURE TO PAY FOR PRODUCT

Finally, Purolite relies on its claim that Layne breached the Agreement by failing to pay Purolite for product in January and February 2009. First, any such breach by Layne occurred after—and therefore cannot have excused—Purolite's failure to pay royalties beginning in late 2008, and thus Purolite may not rely on this alleged breach by Layne as a defense to Layne's claim for royalties. Second, with respect to Layne's claim based [57] on Purolite's breach of Section 11.2, Purolite has not offered any argument as to why this alleged prior breach should be deemed material. The Court concludes that this alleged failure by Layne to pay for some product does not defeat the object of the Agreement and thus is not material, particularly because any such breach may be easily redressed by an award of damages. See 14 Williston on Contracts § 43:6 (Restatement's factors for materiality include the extent to which the party may otherwise be adequately compensated) (citing Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 241); see also, e.g., BioLife Solutions, Inc. v. [*1229] Endocare, Inc., 838 A.2d 268, 278 (Del. Ch. 2003) (applying factors for materiality from Restatement § 241). Accordingly, Purolite may not rely on any alleged prior material breach in opposition to Layne's contract claims.[16]

B. Claim for Unpaid Royalties

Layne seeks summary judgment on its claim against Purolite for $145,433.88 in unpaid royalties under the Agreement for sales of Purolite's product, ArseneXnp. Purolite [58] has stipulated that it ceased paying such royalties to Layne at the end of 2008, even though it did not cease sales of that product until April 2009. In opposition to summary judgment on this claim, Purolite has only asserted the defense of a prior material breach by Layne, but the Court has now ruled that Purolite may not rely on that defense. Accordingly, Layne is entitled to summary judgment on this claim, at least with respect to the issue of Purolite's liability.

With respect to damages, the only evidence submitted by Layne to support the amount of royalties owed is a letter of June 5, 2009, from Purolite to Layne. In the letter, Purolite calculated a total of $145,433.88 in royalties due on sales of ArseneXnp. Purolite has objected to Layne's use of this document, on the basis that the letter is inadmissible under Fed. R. Evid. 408. That rule makes inadmissible any settlement offers or statements made in compromise negotiations "when offered to prove liability for, invalidity of, or amount of a claim that was disputed as to validity or amount." Fed. R. Evid. 408(a). In this letter, Purolite began by stating its desire to settle outstanding payments at issue between the parties, [59] and it set forth Purolite's positions and calculated the royalties in the process of proposing a settlement on particular terms. Accordingly, Rule 408 bars Layne's use of this letter to prove the amount of its claim against Purolite.[17] Because Layne has offered no other evidence to support that amount, the issue remains for proof at trial, and the Court denies summary judgment on this claim with respect to the issue of the amount of damages.

[15] The Court again declines to address the merits of this assertion of breach. See supra note 4.

[16] In light of these rulings, the Court need not address Layne's argument that Purolite elected not to repudiate the Agreement after the alleged prior breaches.

[17] The cases cited by Layne on this issue are inapposite. In two of the cases, the courts noted that Rule 408 permits the use of statements in settlement negotiations for purposes other than those prohibited in the rule, such as to show an admission of fact. See Vulcan Hart Corp. v. NLRB, 718 F.2d 269, 277 (8th Cir. 1983); Urico v. Parnell Oil Co., 708 F.2d 852, 854 (1st Cir. 1983). In this case, however, Layne seeks to use the evidence to establish the amount of its claim—a use expressly prohibited by the rule. The other two cases cited by Layne were not decided by reference to Rule 408, and thus they are unhelpful. See Cooper v. Brown, 126 F.2d 874, 878 (3d Cir. 1942); Nebraska Drillers, Inc. v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co. of N.Y., 123 F. Supp. 678, 682 (D. Colo. 1954).

C. [60] Claim for Breach of Section 11.2

Layne also seeks summary judgment on its claim for a permanent injunction based on Purolite's alleged breach of the following provision contained in Section 11.2 of the Agreement:

> 11.2 Restrictions on Purolite. . . . During the Term and thereafter, Purolite agrees not to directly or indirectly use any Intellectual Property resulting from its activities under this Agreement to directly or indirectly manufacture, sell, supply or use any products or media substantially similar to, or competitive with, the Media (excluding any existing product already manufactured by Purolite [*1230] as of the date of this Agreement) or other products of SolmeteX.

This provision essentially prohibits Purolite from using any "Intellectual Property" resulting from its acts under the Agreement to compete with Layne. Purolite does not dispute that an injunction would be appropriate if its breach of this provision is shown. Nevertheless, Purolite opposes summary judgment on this claim for three reasons, which the Court addresses in turn.

1. SURVIVAL OF TERMINATION

According to Section 11.2, this restriction applies "[d]uring the Term and thereafter." "Term" is defined in Section 8.1 of the [61] Agreement as the initial ten-year term of the Agreement that is automatically renewed for another ten-year period if no contrary notice is given by either party. Purolite argues that, despite the language making the provision applicable during the Term "and thereafter," this provision should be deemed not to have survived Layne's termination of the Agreement.

Purolite first relies on the survival provision, Section 8.4, which reads as follows:

> 8.4 Survival of Provisions. Any provisions which by their nature should survive termination or expiration of this Agreement, will survive, including Sections 1.6, 4.4, 4.5, 4.6, 5.3, 6.5, 8.3, 8.4, 9, 10, 12, and 13.

Purolite notes the absence of Section 11.2 from the list of the surviving provisions, and it argues that the parties would have included Section 11.2 in that list if they intended this provision to survive termination. The Court rejects this argument. The parties did not simply list all surviving provisions; rather, Section 8.4 clearly provides that all provisions survive termination "which by their nature should survive termination." The list of specific sections in Section 8.4 is not described therein as exhaustive. Therefore, the [62] issue is whether the provision in Section 11.2 is one that should survive by its nature.

Purolite also argues that the word "thereafter" in Section 11.2 should be interpreted to refer only to the "supplemental term" (Purolite's words) described in Section 8.3.3. That section provided that if the Agreement did not renew after the initial ten-year term, Purolite could nonetheless, for a period of two years, continue to supply the Media to SolmeteX and existing customers. Purolite argues that the parties used "thereafter" in Section 11.2 only to restrict Purolite during such a two-year additional period and not to restrict Purolite forever. The Court rejects this argument as well, as there is no support in the Agreement for such a reading. Section 11.2 did not make its restriction applicable only during the Term of the Agreement and during the two-year period following termination; rather, the parties used "thereafter" without further limitation in describing the applicability of the provision.

Thus, the Court does not agree with Purolite that the Agreement is ambiguous with respect to the survivability of this provision of Section 11.2. Section 8.4 plainly provides that provisions survive [63] termination if they should survive by their nature. Section 11.2 is such a provision, as it plainly makes the restriction applicable while the Agreement is in force "and thereafter." Moreover, the nature of the provision itself is such that one would expect it to survive. Accordingly, the Court concludes as a matter of law that this provision in Section 11.2 did survive the termination of the Agreement, and Layne may therefore assert a breach of this provision occurring after the termination, as it [*1231] has done here.[18]

2. UNREASONABLE RESTRICTION ON COMPETITION

Second, in opposition to Layne's motion for summary on this claim, Purolite argues that this restriction should be invalidated as an unreasonable restriction on competition under Delaware law. Purolite also seeks summary judgment on this claim for this reason.

In support of this argument, Purolite relies on Delaware cases involving non-compete provisions in employment contracts [64] or contracts for the sale of businesses, in which the courts applied the rule that such provisions must be reasonable, including with respect to geographical and temporal limits. See, e.g., Tull v. Turek, 38 Del. Ch. 182, 186-90, 147 A.2d 658 (Del. 1958) (contract for sale of business); Faw, Casson & Co. v. Cranston, 375 A.2d 463, 465 (Del. Ch. 1977) (employment contract). Purolite also cites to Section 188(1) of the Restatement, which provides as follows:

> (1) A promise to refrain from competition that imposes a restraint that is ancillary to an otherwise valid transaction or relationship is unreasonably in restraint of trade if > (a) the restraint is greater than is needed to protect the promisee's legitimate interest, or
> (b) The promissee's need is outweighed by the hardship to the promisor and the likely injury to the public.

Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 188(1). Purolite argues that this provision of Section 11.2 is an unreasonable restraint on its ability to compete for the same reasons discussed above with respect to Purolite's claim under Kansas law—the restraint is not limited by geography or duration; the restraint goes beyond that necessary to protect Layne's interests, in light of the patent [65] statutes and the fact that Purolite's license terminates with the termination of the Agreement; and competition is suppressed in a limited market.[19]

The Court concludes that the restriction in Section 11.2 of the Agreement is not invalid. Under Delaware law, including the cases cited by Purolite, the ultimate inquiry is whether the restraint on competition is reasonable. [66] See, e.g., Faw, 375 A.2d at 467 (modern rule is "that a restrictive covenant should be enforced only to the extent that it is reasonable so to do"). Similarly, the general rule from the Restatement is that "[a] promise is unenforceable on grounds of public policy if it is unreasonably in restraint of trade." Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 186(1). Purolite argues that the lack of any geographical or temporal limit makes the restriction in Section 11.2 unreasonable and unenforceable under Delaware law; that requirement is most often found in employment [*1232] contract cases, however, and such contracts, because they affect a person's ability to make a living, are subject to a heightened level of scrutiny. See Elite Cleaning Co. v. Capel, 2006 Del. Ch. LEXIS 105, 2006 WL 1565161, at *3 (Del. Ch. June 2, 2006) (unpub. op.) ("Where a restriction on the ability to be gainfully employed is involved, the customary sensitivity of a court of equity to the particular interests affected by its remedies is heightened.") (citing McCann Surveyors, Inc. v. Evans, 611 A.2d 1, 3-4 (Del. Ch. 1987)); Faw, 375 A.2d at 465 ("covenants are subject to somewhat greater scrutiny when contained in an employment contract as opposed to [67] contracts for the sale of a business"). Indeed, Layne's interest as the promisee in restraining competition by the promisor is even greater than in the case of the sale of a business. In the latter case, the purchaser seeks to restrict competition generally by the buyer in a market to protect the value of the purchased business. In this case, the contractual provision does not merely restrain competition by Purolite; rather, Section 11.2 prohibits Purolite's

[18] Given the plain language of Section 11.2 making this provision applicable after the Agreement is otherwise no longer in force, the Court rejects Purolite's argument that Layne was required to argue in its initial brief that the provision survived termination.

[19] Purolite argues that Layne must establish that the restraint on competition is reasonable by clear and convincing evidence, based on Delaware caselaw stating that a party seeking specific performance of a non-competition provision must meet that evidentiary standard. See, e.g., American Homepatient, Inc. v. Collier, 2006 Del. Ch. LEXIS 79, 2006 WL 1134170, at *2 (Del. Ch. Apr. 19, 2006) (unpub. op.). The applicability of that standard to this case is not clear, however, in light of the fact that the provision here is not like the typical employment or sale-of-business non-compete analyzed by the Delaware courts, as discussed below. Nevertheless, the Court concludes that the result here would be the same whether or not that standard is applied, as the evidence showing the reasonableness of the provision is clear and convincing in this case.

use of certain intellectual property—intellectual property given to Purolite by SolmeteX or gained by Purolite because of the Agreement by which SolmeteX licensed Purolite's use of SolmeteX's intellectual property—to compete with SolmeteX (Layne). Thus, SolmeteX had (and Layne has) a great and legitimate interest in protecting that intellectual property by enforcement of the restriction in Section 11.2.

Other courts have recognized that this interest in protecting intellectual property is more worthy of protection than in the case of the typical non-compete. For instance, in Harvey Barnett, Inc. v. Shidler, 338 F.3d 1125 (10th Cir. 2003), the Tenth Circuit held that the district court had erred in determining that a confidentiality [68] provision was a disguised restrictive covenant that was unenforceable under Colorado law. See id. at 1134. The Tenth Circuit reasoned that confidentiality and non-disclosure agreements should not be characterized as restrictive covenants because they "serve entirely different purposes than do agreements not to compete and must be analyzed on the basis of those distinct purposes alone." See id. (quoting MAI Basic Four, Inc. v. Basis, Inc., 880 F.2d 286, 288 (10th Cir. 1989)).[20]

IDX Systems Corp. v. Epic Systems Corp., 285 F.3d 581 (7th Cir. 2002), is similarly instructive. In that case, the Seventh Circuit overturned the district court's conclusion that certain non-disclosure provisions were unenforceable under Wisconsin law because they were unlimited in temporal and geographical scope and thus unduly restrained trade. See id. at 584-85. The Seventh Circuit reasoned as follows:

> In reaching this conclusion, the district court relied on decisions requiring restrictive [69] covenants limiting competition between employers and their ex-employees to be reasonable, and that in Wisconsin entails some restrictions on time and scope. Rules limiting the extent of no-compete clauses are based on the fact that they tie up human capital and, if widely adopted, may have the practical effect of preventing horizontal competition in economically significant markets. But neither rationale applies to contracts that restrict the use of particular information between businesses that have vertical (supplier-to-customer) rather than horizontal (competitor-to-competitor) [*1233] relations. IDX did not contract for limitations on Epic's ability to compete; contracts between IDX and the Foundation are vertical in nature and protect intellectual property without affecting competition. They may compel rivals such as Epic to do more work to develop software independently, but this promotes rather than restricts competition. Kewanee Oil Co. v. Bicron Corp., 416 U.S. 470, 94 S. Ct. 1879, 40 L. Ed. 2d 315 (1974), holds that trade-secret law is compatible with antitrust law; the same can be said for contracts protecting intellectual property that, though not demonstrably a trade secret, is commercially valuable. Rivals such [70] as Epic, as non-parties to the vertical arrangements, remain entitled to discover and use the information independently and to compete vigorously. Nothing in the antitrust laws gives one producer a right to sponge off another's intellectual property, even when the producer of that knowledge has a market share much larger than IDX's.
> The parties have not cited, and we have not found, any Wisconsin statute or decision subjecting non-disclosure agreements between suppliers and users of intellectual property to the rules that govern non-competition clauses between employers and employees. To the contrary, [a Wisconsin case] tells us that Wisconsin allows a much greater scope of restraint in contracts between vendor and vendee than between employer and employee. . . . Restrictions on disclosure may make intellectual property more valuable to its producer, and thus promote both the creation of knowledge and competitions against other firms in the same industry. No one doubts this with physical property: General Motors is entitled to control 100% of its own output of mufflers, without handing any of them over to Ford or Toyota or Volkswagen. Permitting a producer the full return on its investment [71] in mufflers (or any other product) is essential to promote investment in productive assets and rivalry with other producers. Just so with knowledge, an increasingly vital input into production. Why should IDX or any other maker of intellectual property be placed under legal rules that effectively entitle its rivals to a chunk of that asset's value?

[20] The Tenth Circuit stated that, although MAI Basic involved a contract dispute in New Mexico, its rationale was equally applicable in the case before it under Colorado law. See Harvey Barnett, Inc., 338 F.3d at 1134 n.12.

> No Wisconsin decision of which we are aware requires temporal or geographic limits as a condition to the enforcement of a non-disclosure agreement for intellectual property.

Id. at 585-86 (citations and internal quotation omitted). This analysis applies equally in this case, which also involves both a relationship that is more vertical than horizontal in nature and a lack of governing caselaw invalidating contracts intended to protect intellectual property.

Purolite attempts to distinguish these cases from the Tenth Circuit and the Seventh Circuit as involving non-disclosure provisions, unlike the present case involving a non-competition provision. As the Court explained above, however, the restriction in Section 11.2 does not simply prohibit competition by Purolite, but instead prohibits Purolite's use of intellectual property gained as a [72] result of its relationship with SolmeteX in order to compete with SolmeteX. Thus, as in the case of a non-disclosure provision, the intent of the restriction is to protect intellectual property from its ultimate use by the promisor (as in the present case) or by a third party (in the case of a non-disclosure provision). Thus, the Court finds the reasoning of the Tenth Circuit and, especially, the Seventh Circuit to be helpful and persuasive.

[*1234] The Court concludes that the restriction in Section 11.2 is reasonable and therefore enforceable under Delaware law, for the reasons stated by the Seventh Circuit in IDX and those stated by this Court above in upholding this restriction against a challenge under the Kansas restraint-of-trade statute. See supra Part III.G. In short, the restriction represents a reasonable attempt by SolmeteX to protect its intellectual property. As in IDX, the competitor (Purolite) is entitled to compete with the promisee (Layne) by making and selling products not based on or resulting from the promisee's own intellectual property. The restriction is reasonable even without the type of geographical and temporal limitations required for other types of contractual [73] non-compete provisions. The Court also rejects Purolite's argument that the restriction is greater than necessary; patent law is not sufficient by itself to protect Layne, as the restriction applies also to non-patented intellectual property, and the Agreement's license provisions would not necessarily protect Layne from Purolite's use of the intellectual property to create a different product that competes with Layne's products (as is alleged to have occurred here). Purolite has not cited any Delaware cases indicating that the type of restriction found in Section 11.2 relating to the use of intellectual property should be invalidated. The Court therefore concludes that the restriction is not invalid as an unreasonable restriction on competition, and Purolite's motion for summary judgment on Layne's claim under Section 11.2 is denied.

3. MERITS OF THE CLAIM

Purolite also argues that Layne's motion for summary judgment on this claim for breach of the restriction in Section 11.2 should be denied on the merits. Purolite first argues in this regard that the restriction should be interpreted not to apply to its use of intellectual property that is jointly-owned by the parties. Purolite contends [74] that its interpretation is compelled by reading Section 11.2 in conjunction with Section 4.4 of the Agreement. Section 4.4, which required Purolite to use its best efforts to conduct research and development to improve the product, provides as follows:

> Any improvements, discoveries and changes by Purolite in the course of this R&D, and any Intellectual Property conceived, created or developed by Purolite in performance under this Agreement will be the joint property of both Purolite and SolmeteX (provided that all Intellectual Property concerning SolmeteX's chemistry will belong solely to SolmeteX, whether arising before, during, or after the Term).

Purolite argues that Section 4.4, which gives Purolite rights in improvements made during the course of the Agreement, would be defeated if Section 11.2 prohibited its own use of such improvements.

The Court rejects this interpretation by Purolite. "Intellectual Property" is defined in Section 4.1 of the Agreement to include all discoveries and improvements, whether patentable or not, as well as all patents, trade secrets, confidential information, copyrights, trademarks, and other similar rights relating to the Media. By its terms, Section 11.2 [75] does not apply only to Purolite's use of SolmeteX's intellectual property; rather, it applies to Purolite's use of any "Intellectual Property," which would include improvements jointly owned by Purolite. Such an interpretation in accordance with the plain language of the Agreement would not defeat Rule 4.4, as the recognition or grant of a property right to Purolite is not inconsistent with a restriction, to which Purolite agreed in exchange for benefits under the Agreement, on Purolite's use of such property, [*1235] which exists only because of the Agreement, to compete with the party that provided that base technology. Accordingly, there is no basis to reject a plain reading of Section 11.2 to include jointly-owned intellectual property within the restriction.

In support of its claim of a breach by Purolite, Layne has provided evidence of the following: Purolite impregnated a resin with iron only after beginning the relationship with SolmeteX; SolmeteX brought that process to Purolite; the provision of that intellectual property to Purolite by SolmeteX constituted the basis for the Agreement; the final product manufactured by Purolite under the Agreement, named ArseneXnp, was identical (only [76] the name was changed) to FerrIX, the product manufactured and sold by Purolite after the termination of the Agreement; and Purolite continues to sell FerrIX, a product that is competetive with Layne's products. Purolite has not controverted any of these facts, and the Court agrees with Layne that these facts establish a breach by Purolite of Section 11.2. Purolite has provided evidence that it made changes and improvements to the product over the course of the Agreement, and that its present product is therefore different from the product first licensed to it by SolmeteX, and it further argues that there is a question of fact whether its product uses SolmeteX's intellectual property (SolmeteX's chemistry). As noted above, however, whether Purolite's product uses SolmeteX's intellectual property is not determinative, as Section 11.2 prohibits Purolite's use of any intellectual property (including jointly-owned property) resulting from the Agreement to compete with Layne. Similarly, the fact that Purolite made improvements is immaterial, as any such improvements made during the Agreement would constitute "Intellectual Property" for purposes of this restriction in Section 11.2. Purolite [77] has not disputed that its product is at least based on improvements to the initial product supplied by SolmeteX (as its executives have admitted that FerrIX is identical to the most-improved version of ArseneX). Accordingly, Layne has established a breach of Section 11.2 as a matter of law.

As noted above, Purolite has not disputed that an injunction would be appropriate here if a breach is shown. Accordingly, the Court grants Layne summary judgment on its claim for a permanent injunction, and Purolite is hereby permanently enjoined from further breaching Section 11.2, including making, selling, or using the product FerrIX A33E or any substantially similar product that uses "Intellectual Property" (as defined in the Agreement) resulting from Purolite's activities under the Agreement.[21]

D. Claim for Breach of Section 10.1

Purolite seeks summary judgment on Layne's claim for breach of Section 10.1 of the Agreement. Layne has not sought [78] summary judgment on this claim. Section 10.1 provides as follows:

> 10.1 Prior NDAs. The parties have executed a Non-Disclosure Agreement dated as of March 10, 2004 (the "SolmeteX NDA") and a Non-Disclosure Agreement dated as of April 12, 2004 (the "Purolite NDA" and together with the SolmeteX NDA, the "NDAs"). Copies of the NDAs are attached hereto as Appendix D. The parties intend that the NDAs will continue to govern their relationship under this Agreement. Purolite agrees that it will not disclose to [*1236] or use or facilitate or permit others to use SolmeteX's Intellectual Property or confidential information for any reason or purpose including to compete with SolmeteX. Purolite will completely safeguard all of SolmeteX's Intellectual Property and confidential information.

In its motion, Purolite divides Section 10.1 into two potential breaches asserted by Layne: (1) breach of the first three sentences of Section 10.1 regarding NDAs, based on an alleged breach by Purolite of the underlying SolmeteX NDA; and (2) breach of the fourth and fifth sentences of Section 10.1, based on Purolite's alleged use of SolmeteX's intellectual property or confidential information. Purolite seeks summary [79] judgment on each of these claims of breach.

1. INCORPORATION OF THE OTHER AGREEMENT

[21] Layne did not move for summary judgment on its claim for damages for breach of this provision of Section 11.2; therefore, the amount of damages suffered by Layne for this breach (which has been established as a matter of law) remains an issue for trial.

Pursuant to explicit language in the contract by which Layne acquired the assets of SolmeteX, Layne assumed SolmeteX's rights under the Agreement, but it did not assume SolmeteX's rights under the SolmeteX NDA. Thus, although Layne has standing to assert SolmeteX's rights under the Agreement (as this Court has previously ruled), it would not have standing to bring a claim against Purolite for breach of the SolmeteX NDA. Layne does not dispute these facts. Layne argues, however, that Section 10.1 of the Agreement incorporates by reference the SolmeteX NDA. Thus, Layne argues that a breach of the SolmeteX NDA also constitutes a breach of the Agreement, which it has standing to enforce.

The Court agrees with Purolite, however, that Section 10.1 does not incorporate by reference the SolmeteX NDA. Section 10.1 does not contain language of incorporation or any other language evidencing an intent to include the terms of the SolmeteX NDA as terms of the Agreement. Instead, Section 10.1 merely recognizes the existence of the NDAs and states the parties' intent that the NDAs continue to have force. Thus, the parties [80] provided that the Agreement did not supersede or otherwise invalidate the NDAs. The Court agrees with the following reasoning by a Delaware court:

> A mere reference in one agreement to another agreement, without more, does not incorporate the latter agreement into the former by reference. To incorporate one document into another, an explicit manifestation of intent is required.

*Wolfson v. Supermarkets General Holdings Corp., 2001 Del. Ch. LEXIS 6, 2001 WL 85679, at 5 (Del. Ch. Jan. 23, 2001) (unpub. op.). Section 10.1 does not contain any language indicating an intent to do more than simply recognize and reaffirm the ongoing validity of the NDAs; therefore, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Section 10.1 does not incorporate the SolmeteX NDA by reference.

Layne does not dispute that it lacks standing to enforce the SolmeteX NDA.[22] Therefore, because Layne cannot enforce the NDA's terms through the Agreement, Purolite is awarded summary judgment on any claim by Layne for breach of the Agreement based on an alleged breach of the SolmeteX NDA.

2. USE OF INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY

The fourth sentence of Section 10.1 of the [81] Agreement provides:

> [*1237] Purolite agrees that it will not disclose to or use or facilitate or permit others to use SolmeteX's Intellectual Property or confidential information for any reason or purpose including to compete with SolmeteX.

Layne asserts a claim for breach of this provision based on Purolite's alleged use of its intellectual property. It does not allege that Purolite disclosed its intellectual property to a third party in breach of Section 10.1.

In seeking summary judgment on this claim, Purolite argues that this provision effectively prohibits only its disclosure of intellectual property ("IP") to third parties, and that it does not prohibit its own use of such property. Purolite parses the words "will not disclose to or use or facilitate or permit others to use" to mean that it will not do the following: "disclose to . . . others" the IP; "use . . . others to use" the IP; "facilitate . . . others to use" the IP; or "permit others to use" the IP. Thus, under its interpretation, Purolite is not forbidden to "use" the IP; it is only forbidden to "use . . . others to use" the IP. Purolite argues that the parties would not have intended to prohibit Purolite's use of the IP in light [82] of the Agreement's basic purpose to allow Purolite to use the IP to manufacture and supply the product based on SolmeteX's chemistry.

The Court concludes as a matter of law, however, that this provision in Section 10.1 of the Agreement does apply to and prohibit Purolite's own use of the IP. Purolite's interpretation depends on an intent by the parties to prohibit Purolite's "use of others to use" the IP. Such language is nonsensical, however. The only reasonable interpretation of the first "use" in the sentence is that it refers to use by Purolite of the IP, not use by Purolite of others. Although this sentence may not be a model of clarity and may have been inartfully drafted, the language unambiguously evidences an intent that Purolite be prohibited from using the IP. Moreover, such a prohibition does not conflict with the Agreement as a whole, as the parties could quite reasonably have intended to prohibit Purolite's use of SolmeteX's IP except for purposes explicitly permitted in the Agreement—a general prohibition that would be absent from the Agreement under Purolite's interpretation. Indeed, this prohibition complements the restriction in Section 11.2 against Purolite's use [83] of any IP gained under the Agreement (not only SolmeteX's IP) for the specific purpose of competing with SolmeteX.

[22] Moreover, Layne has not asserted a claim under the SolmeteX NDA in the Pretrial Order.

Accordingly, the Court rejects Purolite's interpretation of this provision in Section 10.1 of the Agreement, and the Court denies Purolite's motion for summary judgment on Layne's claim for breach of Section 10.1 based on Purolite's use of Layne's intellectual property.

V. Plaintiffs' Patent Claims

Plaintiffs have moved for summary judgment on their claims for infringement of the patent, including with respect to Purolite's invalidity defenses (Doc. # 408). By cross-motion, Purolite also seeks summary judgment on plaintiffs' infringement claims and on various defenses to those claims.

A. Infringement

1. MARKING ESTOPPEL

Plaintiffs assert that Purolite is precluded from contesting the issue of infringement under the doctrine of marking estoppel. As adopted by some courts, this doctrine provides that, "under some circumstances, a party that marks its product with a patent number is estopped from asserting that the product is not covered by the patent." See SmithKline Diagnostics, Inc. v. Helena Labs. Corp., 859 F.2d 878, 890 n.9 (Fed. Cir. 1988) (citations [*1238] omitted). Plaintiffs [84] note that, although Purolite did not mark either its product manufactured under the license from Layne (ArseneX) or its subsequent product (FerrIX) by reference to the patent, it did sell ArseneX (but not FerrIX) with the reference "patent pending." Plaintiffs argue that the marking estoppel doctrine should be extended to apply to such conduct.

The Court holds as a matter of law that plaintiffs may not rely on this doctrine in this case. First, the Federal Circuit has never adopted the doctrine, including in at least three instances when given the opportunity to do, and those opinions cast doubt on whether it would adopt and apply the doctrine in this case. See SmithKline, 859 F.2d at 890-91 (concluding that, "[w]hatever the validity of the 'marking estoppel' line of cases," the doctrine would not apply in that case); *High Frequency Prods., Inc. v. Wynn's Climate Sys., Inc., 1996 U.S. App. LEXIS 9957, 1996 WL 217840, at 2 (Fed. Cir. Apr. 30, 1996) (unpub. op.) (where district court concluded that the marking estoppel doctrine was no longer viable, court deemed it unnecessary to decide that issue because the doctrine would be inapplicable in that case at any rate); Slip Track Sys., Inc. v. Metal Lite, Inc., 113 F. App'x 930, 934 (Fed. Cir. 2004) [85] (refusing to address the continued viability of the marking estoppel doctrine because it would not apply in that case). For instance, in the most recent case, the Federal Circuit concluded that the doctrine would not apply there in part because there was no evidence that the marking party believed its product to fall outside the patent's claim but nonetheless deliberately mismarked the product. See Slip Track, 113 F. App'x at 934. Similarly, in the present case, there is nothing to suggest that Purolite deliberately mismarked ArseneX with "patent pending" while believing that the product was not covered by the patent application that was the subject of its license agreement with SolmeteX.

Moreover, plaintiffs have not pointed to any authority (and the Court has found none) that would permit this doctrine to be extended beyond a reference to an actual patent to apply also to a "patent pending" reference. The Court does not agree that the rationale for the doctrine necessarily encompasses the "patent pending" situation. By referring to an actual patent, a manufacturer has represented to the public that the product falls with the scope of that patent; by saying "patent pending," however, [86] the manufacturer cannot be telling the public that the product is covered by whatever patent issues, as there is no guarantee that the eventual patent (if issued) will not differ from the application. Without such supporting authority and in the absence of scienter, as discussed above, the Court cannot conclude that the Federal Circuit would both recognize the doctrine and allow the doctrine to be applied in this case. Accordingly, the Court denies plaintiffs' request for summary judgment on this issue, and it grants Purolite's motion for summary judgment on this theory asserted by plaintiffs.

2. EQUIVALENTS, INDIRECT INFRINGEMENT

Although Purolite expresses its uncertainty concerning whether plaintiffs are pursuing the theories (they are not mentioned in the Pretrial Order), Purolite moves for summary judgment on any claim by plaintiffs for infringement based on indirect infringement or the doctrine of equivalents, based on a lack of any evidence to support such theories. Plaintiffs have not opposed this request for summary judgment. Accordingly, the Court awards summary judgment in favor of Purolite on any claim for infringement asserted by plaintiffs based on a theory of [*1239] indirect [87] infringement or the doctrine of equivalents.

3. "DISPERSALTHROUGHOUT" (CLAIMS 1 AND 15)

"Determining whether a patent claim has been infringed involves two steps: (1) claim construction to determine the scope of the claims, followed by (2) determination of whether the properly construed claim encompasses the accused structure." Bai v. L & L Wings, Inc., 160 F.3d 1350, 1353 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (citation omitted). The first step involves a question of law for the court, while the second presents a question of fact, although "a literal infringement issue is properly decided on summary judgment when no genuine issue of material fact exists, in particular, when no reasonable jury could find that every limitation recited in the properly construed claim either is or is not found in the accused device." See id. (citations omitted).

In support of summary judgment, plaintiffs have provided evidence and argued that the accused product, FerrIX, meets all of the limitations in, and thus infringes, Claim 1 (and dependent Claims 7, 10, 11, 12, and 13) and Claim 15. In response, and in its own motion for summary judgment, Purolite points to only three claim limitations (two in Claim 1, one in both Claim [88] 1 and Claim 15) that it argues FerrIX does not satisfy.[23]

Purolite first argues that plaintiffs cannot satisfy the limitation in Claim 1 and Claim 15 of a dispersal "throughout the intermediate." Claim 1 of the patent states as follows:

> 1. A method for synthesizing a selective adsorbent, the method comprising the steps of:
> reacting a material that exhibits anion exchange behavior with an anionic oxidant to produce an intermediate; and
> reacting, with said intermediate, a solution of a salt of a metal, said salt being capable of being oxidized, thereby precipitating and dispersing a salt of said metal throughout the intermediate by the action of the oxidant and producing an adsorbent capable of exchanging anions.

(Emphasis added.) Claim 15 states as follows:

> 15. An adsorbent for the selective removal of ligands from fluids, said absorbent [sic] comprising a polymeric anion exchange resin containing particles of an oxygen-containing [89] compound of iron dispersed throughout the resin.

(Emphasis added.) Plaintiffs contend that the limitation underlined above in each claim is met here because the accused product contains iron oxide in every part of the resin beads that make up the adsorbent, including the core section, the shell section, and even the ring or "halo" between the core and shell. Purolite responds that the iron oxide has not been dispersed "throughout" the intermediate or resin because only a very small percentage of the iron oxide has penetrated to the core of the bead in the accused product.

At the claim construction stage of the litigation, the parties disputed the proper construction of the terms "dispersing" / "dispersed" and "throughout". In its claim construction order, the Court construed "dispersing" and [23] Purolite does not make any separate arguments concerning dependent Claims 7, 10, 11, 12, and 13. Instead, Purolite argues only that plaintiffs' inability to show infringement of independent Claim 1 also dooms their claims for infringement of those dependent claims.

"dispersed" to mean "distributing or spreading" and "distributed [*1240] or spread" respectively. The Court construed "throughout" as follows:

> Dispersion "throughout the intermediate" and "throughout the resin" in Claims 1 and 15 respectively means all the way through the intermediate or resin, or through the whole of it, or to every part of it, or everywhere in it. Dispersion "throughout" the intermediate [90] or resin is not achieved merely by having some particles reach the interior or go beyond the periphery of the intermediate or resin. On the other hand, dispersion "throughout" the intermediate or resin does not require that a stoichiometric amount was used or that every possible exchange site was reached.

In arguing that the iron oxide in the accused product is not dispersed "throughout" the beads, Purolite relies on the analysis of finished beads by its expert, Dr. Stack. Dr. Stack measured the iron content in each of two beads at 19 points extending from the center of the bead to the outside. Those measurements showed that the iron was concentrated primarily in the outer part of each bead. For instance, Dr. Stack states that the iron concentration near the periphery was more than ten times greater than in the core of the bead and more than 40 times greater than in the halo of the bead; and that the iron contained in the core and halo make up only 0.8 percent of the total iron in the bead. Plaintiffs argue from this evidence that the iron has not been distributed "throughout" the bead—in every part of it or everywhere in it—because there are relatively few iron particles in the core, [91] which therefore contains relatively large areas without iron.

The Court concludes, however, that the accused product does contain iron distributed "throughout" the beads as a matter of law. Dr. Stack's measurements establish, and thus it is undisputed, that there is at least some measurable amount of iron at each radial point in the bead.[24] This evidences establishes that a species of iron has been dispersed all the way through the bead, and through the whole of it, and in every part of it, and everywhere in it—and thus, "throughout" the bead, under the Court's construction of that term. The fact that there are gaps or areas in the bead without any iron does not alter that conclusion, as gaps necessarily occur when particles are dispersed (spread) in any concentration.

Purolite argues that, even if the Court did not require uniformity of concentration of the particles in construing "throughout", it should now construe the term to require at least a certain minimum concentration (such as one percent of the total amount in the bead) at each radial point in the bead (which standard the accused product would fail under Dr. Stack's measurements). The Court declines this invitation to alter its construction, however, as there is no basis in the claims or specification of the patent (or even in any extrinsic evidence) for construing "throughout" in that manner and thus adding a limitation to the claims (let alone any basis for choosing a standard of one percent at each of the points chosen by Dr. Stack).

[*1241] Accordingly, the undisputed evidence establishes as a matter of law that the accused product contains iron dispersed "throughout" the intermediate or resin, pursuant to the Court's construction of the pertinent claim limitation in Claims 1 and 15. Plaintiffs are therefore awarded summary judgment [93] on that particular issue.

Purolite also points out that, even if some species of iron has been dispersed "throughout" each bead, the claims require that the dispersed substance be a salt of a metal (Claim 1) or an oxygen-containing compound of iron (Claim 15). Plaintiffs contend that those requirements are met because the dispersed particles in the accused product are iron oxide. Purolite concedes that the iron concentrated so heavily in each bead's shell section is indeed iron oxide. Purolite argues, however, that a question of fact arises concerning whether the iron that has been dispersed to the core of each bead—and thus whether the iron that has been distributed "throughout" each bead—is iron oxide as alleged or some other species of iron.

[24] The Court rejects Purolite's argument that there is no evidence of iron within the halo between the bead's shell and core sections. Dr. Stack's graph of his iron measurements for each of the two beads shows a concentration above zero for the halo point, and, indeed, plaintiffs have argued that the concentration at the shell was more than 40 times that in the halo, which calculation presumes some measurable amount at [92] the halo. Dr. Stack's deposition testimony that the halo "effectively" has no iron does not controvert his own measurements showing at least some amount of iron there.

The Court agrees that this issue presents a question of fact for trial. Plaintiffs rely on the testimony of certain employees of Purolite, who testified that the beads in the accused product are impregnated with iron oxide. Those witnesses did not testify, however, that iron oxide could be found in both the shell and the core of the beads, or that some other species of iron was not also contained in the beads. Although plaintiffs' expert, Dr. [94] Clifford, opines that the iron in the core is iron oxide, Dr. Stack has challenged the bases for that opinion and has provided a reason why one may not presume that the iron in the core is iron oxide from the mere fact that the iron in the shell is iron oxide. Therefore, if the evidence is considered in the light most favorable to Purolite, plaintiffs cannot establish that the iron in the core is iron oxide and thus that iron oxide has been dispersed "throughout" the beads. Accordingly, an issue of fact remains, and neither side is entitled to summary judgment concerning this specific issue of whether iron oxide, and not merely iron or some other species of iron, has been dispersed "throughout" the intermediate or resin.

4. "BY THE ACTION OF THE OXIDANT" (CLAIM 1)

Purolite next argues that plaintiffs cannot satisfy the limitation in Claim 1 that the dispersal of the iron oxide be "by the action of the oxidant." The parties agree that in the case of the accused product, the oxidant is permanganate. In support of this argument, Purolite relies only on the evidence of a test conducted by Dr. Stack. In that test, when Dr. Stack loaded virgin beads with permangate in the concentration used [95] in the manufacture of the accused product, he discovered that the permanganate did not travel to the core section of the beads. Purolite argues that this test demonstrates that the iron in the core was not dispersed there "by action of" the permanganate—and thus must have been dispersed there in some other way—because otherwise permanganate would have been found in the core of the tested beads.

The Court rejects this argument by Purolite for a number of reasons. First, Dr. Stack's test involving permanganate was not intended to test whether the iron in the core arrived there by action of the oxidant. Instead, Dr. Stack's report indicates that he loaded the beads with permanganate to confirm the stratification of the iron concentration in the bead (heavily concentrated in the shell section). Thus, it is not surprising that Dr. Stack's report does not contain a statement by which he opines that the iron in the core section of the bead in the accused product is not dispersed there "by action of" the permanganate. [*1242] Second, in conducting this test, Dr. Stack did not attempt to replicate the actual manufacturing process for the accused product, or even measure the manganese in the product [96] itself. There is no basis to conclude that loading permanganate onto virgin beads would provide a reliable indication as to whether iron is dispersed to the core section in the finished product by action of the permanganate—although the lack of such a basis is not surprising given the fact that Dr. Stack does not appear to have intended that his test be used in that way. Thus, the test is not scientifically reliable to make the intended point. Third, Purolite has made an unwarranted inferential leap here. The fact that the permanganate does not accompany the iron to the core does not necessarily mean, as a matter of logic, that the permanganate, by its action, could not have caused the iron to travel to the core. Again, the lack of that foundation, which would require expert opinion in this case, is not surprising given Dr. Stack's different purpose in conducting the test.

Therefore, Purolite has failed to create an issue of fact by providing evidence to controvert plaintiffs' evidence that the iron has been dispersed throughout the beads of the accused product by action of the permanganate, as required for infringement of Claim 1. Accordingly, this defense fails as a matter of law; [97] plaintiff's summary judgment motion is granted, and Purolite's summary judgment motion is denied, to that extent.

5. "SALT OF SAID METAL" (CLAIM 1)

Finally, Purolite argues that plaintiffs cannot satisfy the limitation in Claim 1 that the substance dispersed in the second step of the method in Claim 1 be a "salt of said metal." It is undisputed that in the accused product, the substance dispersed is ferric oxide. In support of this argument, Purolite relies solely on deposition testimony by Dr. SenGupta, the inventor, concerning the following excerpt from the patent's specification:

> The intermediate, produced by reacting the anion exchange material with an anionic oxidant, may be reacted with a solution of an oxidizable salt of a metal, preferably a ferrous salt such as ferrous sulphate, ferrous ammonium sulfate, ferrous chloride or ferrous acetate. The hydrated iron oxide particles precipitated in the anion exchange material can take various forms, such as hematite, [goethite], magnetite and ferrihydrite.

(Patent at 10:17-24.) In his deposition, Dr. SenGupta first confirmed that the "ferrous salts" listed in the excerpt are all "metal salts." Then Dr. SenGupta agreed that the four substances [98] subsequently listed as exemplar forms of the "hydrated iron oxide particles" are all "metal oxides," different from "metal salts" such as the ferrous salts previously discussed. Based solely on that testimony, Purolite argues that because a metal oxide, such as iron (ferric) oxide, is different from a "metal salt," the accused product does not include a dispersed "salt of said metal," as required for infringement of Claim 1.

The Court also rejects this argument. The patent clearly contemplates that the substance dispersed may be an iron oxide. Thus, the Court construes "salt of said metal" as used in Claim 1 (an issue of law for the Court) to include iron oxides. The specification of the patent supports that construction, as the primary embodiments discussed by the patent's specification involve the dispersion of HFO ("Hydrated Fe Oxide"), an iron oxide. See Patent at 3:7-8 (summary of invention), 3:23-25 (summary), 3:36-37 (summary), 5:16-18, 6:62-64.

[*1243] The specification also confirms that the "salt of a metal" that is reacted in solution in Claim 1 is different from the "salt of said metal" that is dispersed:

> The step of reacting a solution of a salt of a metal with the intermediate is [99] carried out by passing a solution of the salt through the intermediate, thereby oxidizing the metal, and causing precipitation and dispersion of another salt, in which the metal is in a higher oxidation state than in the original salt.

(Patent 2:47-53 (summary of invention) (emphasis added).) Dr. Clifford's report contains the opinion that the "salt of a metal" and the "salt of said metal" from Claim 1 are represented in the accused product by two different substances, ferrous sulfate heptahydrate and ferric oxide/hydroxide respectively. The language of Claim 1 supports this dichotomy—Claim 1 does not state that "said" salt of a metal (thus, the same "salt of a metal" that was reacted in solution) is dispersed; rather "a salt of said metal" (potentially, then, a different salt of the same metal) is dispersed.[25] Thus, the fact that Dr. SenGupta, in discussing the excerpt from the specification, distinguished the ferrous salts that are reacted in solution in the invention from the metal oxides that are dispersed is not surprising. Dr. SenGupta did not testify that the "salt of said metal" from Claim 1 cannot be iron oxide; indeed, such a statement would completely contradict the specification [100] for his patent. Moreover, even if Dr. SenGupta had so testified, such extrinsic evidence could not be considered to contradict a construction compelled by the patent itself. See Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp. v. Abbott Labs., 375 F.3d 1328, 1335 (Fed. Cir. 2004) (extrinsic evidence "may not be used to vary, contradict, expand, or limit the claim language from how it is defined, even by implication, in the specification or file history").

For these reasons, Dr. SenGupta's testimony does not provide evidence, in contravention of plaintiffs' [101] evidence that the accused product meets the limitations in Claim 1, that the ferric oxide dispersed in the accused product is not a "salt of said metal" as that term has now been interpreted by the Court. Accordingly, this defense fails as a matter of law; plaintiff's summary judgment motion is granted, and Purolite's summary judgment motion is denied, to that extent.

6. SUMMARY OF INFRINGEMENT ISSUES

Thus, with respect to the issue of infringement, the only issue remaining for trial is whether the iron that is dispersed to the core section of the beads in the accused product is iron oxide, as required for infringement of Claim 1 (and thus dependent Claims 7, 10, 11, 12, and 13). In all other respects, plaintiffs have established infringement of Claim 1 as a matter of law, subject to Purolite's sole remaining invalidity defense, see infra Part V.B.5. Plaintiffs have established infringement of Claim 15 to the same extent, although, as discussed below, Purolite is entitled to [25] Based on an agreed construction, the Court construed the term "salt of a metal" to mean "the compound formed when the hydrogen of an acid is replaced by a metal, such as a solution of a ferrous salt, such as ferrous sulphate, ferrous ammonium sulfate, ferrous chloride, or ferrous acetate." These examples from the Court's construction are the same examples of the "oxidizable salt of a metal" that is reacted in solution, from the specification excerpt that Dr. SenGupta discussed in his deposition. Clearly, then, the Court construed only the term "salt of a metal" from Claim 1, and did not construe the term "salt of said metal" found later in Claim 1.

summary judgment on its defense that Claim 15 is invalid, see infra Part V.B.6. [*1244] Accordingly, Purolite is awarded summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for infringement of Claim 15 of the patent.

B. Invalidity

1. LICENSE [102] ESTOPPEL

Purolite seeks summary judgment on plaintiffs' theory that license estoppel precludes Purolite's assertion of patent invalidity. Plaintiffs concede that this theory has been abolished. Accordingly, the Court grants Purolite summary judgment on plaintiffs' theory of license estoppel.[26]

2. SCOPE OF INVALIDITY DEFENSES

a. Purolite argues that plaintiffs have not substantively opposed its motion for summary judgment with respect to the issue of invalidity based on (i) 35 U.S.C. § 112 as applied to Claim 15; or (ii) 35 U.S.C. § 112 ¶ 2 as applied to all of the patent's claims. The Court agrees with plaintiffs, however, that Purolite did not preserve any such claims in the Pretrial Order. Purolite argues that it did cite to Section 112 in the Pretrial Order. In stating its contentions in that order, however, Purolite very specifically alleged three bases for invalidity: Claims 1-14 fail to meet the enablement requirement of Section 112 because Claim 1 describes an inoperable [103] process; the specification does not meet the written description and enablement requirements of Section 112 with respect to Claims 1-14 (i.e., Claim 1 and its dependent claims); and Claim 15 is anticipated and rendered obvious by prior art, pursuant to 35 U.S.C. §§ 102, 103. (See Pretrial Order ¶ 5.b.) Purolite thus gave notice that it intended to pursue only those specific theories of invalidity as applied to those specific claims. Purolite has not moved to amend the Pretrial Order to include any additional claim. Accordingly, Purolite may not assert these invalidity theories, and Purolite's motion for summary judgment on these theories is therefore denied.

b. In opposing plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment, Purolite notes the statement in plaintiffs' statement of facts that performance of the reactions in Claims 1-14 is basic chemistry that has been practiced for decades. Purolite argues that by that statement plaintiffs have admitted that Claims 1-14 are invalid as anticipated under 35 U.S.C. § 102. Again, however, this specific theory of invalidity has not been preserved in the Pretrial Order, and therefore Purolite may not rely on the theory.

3. INOPERABLE PROCESS (CLAIM 1)

The [104] patent in this case is presumed valid, and the burden of establishing invalidity rests on Purolite, the party asserting such invalidity. See 35 U.S.C. § 282. Purolite must establish invalidity by a heightened standard requiring clear and convincing evidence. See Microsoft Corp. v. i4i Ltd. Partnership, 131 S. Ct. 2238, 2244-49, 180 L. Ed. 2d 131 (2011); see also Pfizer, Inc. v. Apotex, Inc., 480 F.3d 1348, 1359 n.5 (Fed. Cir. 2007) ("The 'clear and convincing' standard is an intermediate standard which lies somewhere in between the 'beyond a reasonable doubt' and the 'preponderance of the evidence' standards of proof."). The "clear and convincing evidence" standard applies in the summary judgment context. See Invitrogen Corp. v. Biocrest Mfg., L.P., 424 F.3d 1374, 1378 (Fed. Cir. 2005).

[*1245] Purolite asserts that Claim 1 of the patent is invalid in a number of respects under 35 U.S.C. § 112, which provides in relevant part as follows:

> The specification shall contain a written description of the invention, and of the manner and process of making and using it, in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which it pertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, [105] to make and use the same, and shall set forth the best mode contemplated by the inventor of carrying out his invention.

[26] Plaintiffs argue that Purolite nonetheless may not use invalidity as a defense to plaintiffs' claim for royalties. Because that claim is not at issue in these motions, the Court does not address that argument.

Id. ¶ 1. Purolite first argues that Claim 1 does not comply with the "enablement" requirement of Section 112 because it recites an inoperable process. "A claimed invention having an inoperable or impossible claim limitation . . . lacks an enabling disclosure under 35 U.S.C. § 112." EMI Group N. Am., Inc. v. Cypress Semiconductor Corp., 268 F.3d 1342, 1348 (Fed. Cir. 2001) (citation omitted).

Purolite argues that the process in Claim 1 is inoperable and impossible because, under the Court's constructions, an "anionic oxidant" cannot react as required in the first step of the claimed method. In the claims construction process, the Court adopted the parties' agreed construction of the term "anionic oxidant" to mean "any anionic compound, such as potassium permanganate." Purolite relies on the opinion of its expert, Dr. Stack, that a compound is technically neutral and does not carry a charge, and thus cannot react with another material. Purolite therefore argues that an "anionic oxidant," as construed by the Court cannot participate in the required reaction.

Purolite also [106] points to dependent Claim 13, which claims the method from Claim 1 with a permanganate as the anionic oxidant. The Court previously adopted the parties' agreed construction of the term "permanganate" to mean "a salt containing the anion MnO4-, such as potassium permanganate." Dr. Stack also opines that a salt does not carry a charge and thus cannot engage in the reaction required in Claim 1's first step.

The Court concludes that the undisputed evidence demonstrates that Claim 1 is not inoperable as alleged by Purolite. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Clifford, has offered his opinion that the anionic oxidant, even though a compound or a salt, can react because the reaction may be done in a solution that dissociates the compound or salt into its charged constituent substances. Dr. Stack admitted in his deposition that compounds and salts may become charged (and thus able to react) after they are placed in a solution and undergo dissociation.[27] Claim 1 does not prohibit the first reaction from occurring in a solution (or prohibit the use of some other method to make the anionic oxidant able to react). The specification supports this construction of Claim 1 (an issue of law), as it repeatedly [107] refers to the use of a solution for this reaction. See Patent at 2:44-47 (summary of invention) ("The step of reacting the material that exhibits anion exchange behavior with an anionic oxidant is preferably carried out by passing a solution of the anionic oxidant through the material."), 3:15-19 (passing a solution through the resin), 4:66-5:1 (passing a permanganate solution through the bed), 6:8-11 (resin immersed in solution of potassium permanganate), 7:5-8 (resin immersed in solution).

Purolite points to dependent Claim 2, which recites Claim 1's method with the first reaction "carried out by passing a [*1246] solution of said anionic oxidant through said material." Purolite argues that the doctrine of claim differentiation requires that Claim 1 thus be construed not to require the use of a solution. The Court disagrees. Claim 2 does not merely refer to the use of a solution, but rather to the particular method of passing a solution through the material. Purolite has not responded to plaintiffs' point—with which the Court agrees—that there could [108] be other ways of using a solution to allow the reaction, including immersion as contemplated in multiple places in the specification. Thus, Purolite has not shown that Claim 1 must be construed to claim a reaction that does not require the use of a solution, and the Court declines to impose such a limitation that is not supported by the patent or any other evidence.

Because Dr. Stack has conceded that a compound or a salt may react if a solution is used, the process in Claim 1 would only be inoperable if the claim forbids the use of a solution for the first reaction. The Court does not construe Claim 1 in that manner. Accordingly, Purolite has not met its burden, as a matter of law, to show by clear and convincing evidence that Claim 1 is invalid under Section 112 as inoperable. Plaintiffs are awarded summary judgment on this invalidity defense, and Purolite's summary judgment motion is denied as it relates to this defense.

4. WRITTEN DESCRIPTION (CLAIM 1)

Purolite next argues that Claim 1 is invalid under 35 U.S.C. § 112 because the patent does not comply with the statute's requirement that "[t]he specification shall contain a written description of the invention." The Federal Circuit [109] recently described this requirement as follows:

[27] Dr. Stack also conceded that he had used the terms "compound" and "salt" imprecisely in articles to refer to substances that carry a net charge.

> An adequate written description reasonably conveys to those skilled in the art that the inventor had possession of the claimed subject matter as of the filing date. The hallmark of written description is disclosure. The specification must describe an invention understandable to a skilled artisan and show that the inventor actually invented the invention claimed. The purpose of the written description requirement is to ensure that the scope of the right to exclude, as set forth in the claims, does not overreach the scope of the inventor's contribution to the field of art as described in the patent's specification.

Atlantic Research Marketing Sys., Inc. v. Troy, 659 F.3d 1345, 1353-54 (Fed. Cir. 2011) (internal quotations omitted). "To overcome the presumption of the validity of patents, the accused must show that the claims lack a written description by clear and convincing evidence." Hynix Semiconductor, Inc. v. Rambus Inc., 645 F.3d 1336, 1351 (Fed. Cir. 2011). "While compliance with the written description requirement is a question of fact, this issue is amenable to summary judgment in cases where no reasonable fact finder could return [110] a verdict for the non-moving party." Atlantic Research, 659 F.3d at 1353 (internal quotations omitted).

The Federal Circuit has adopted the standard for this requirement set out in the guidelines promulgated by the United States Patent and Trademark Office (PTO), found at 66 Fed. Reg. 1099 (2001). See Invitrogen Corp. v. Clontech Labs., Inc., 429 F.3d 1052, 1072 & n. 19 (Fed. Cir. 2005). Those guidelines provide as follows:

> To satisfy the written description requirement, a patent specification must describe the claimed invention in sufficient detail that one skilled in the art can reasonably conclude that the inventor had possession of the claimed invention. An applicant shows possession of [*1247] the claimed invention by describing the claimed invention with all of its limitations using such descriptive means as words, structures, figures, diagrams, and formulas that fully set forth the claimed invention. Possession may be shown in a variety of ways including description of an actual reduction to practice, or by showing that the invention was "ready for patenting" such as by the disclosure of drawings or structural chemical formulas that show that the invention was complete, or by describing [111] distinguishing identifying characteristics sufficient to show that the applicant was in possession of the claimed invention.

PTO Guidelines, 66 Fed. Reg. at 1104 (footnotes omitted).

The Court concludes as a matter of law that the patent's specification satisfies this standard. The specification describes the invention in detail with respect to each limitation in Claim 1, and it contains numerous drawings, chemical formulas, and detailed descriptions of each step in the claimed method. Thus, the specification shows possession of the claimed invention. Moreover, each of the examples set forth in the guidelines is present here, as the specification describes actual reductions to practice, discloses drawings and formulas showing that the invention is complete and "ready for patenting," and describes in detail many identifying characteristics of the invention.

In arguing that the written description requirement is not met here, Purolite notes that although the specification focuses on the use of certain materials (specific polymeric anionic exchange resins, either potassium permanganate or sodium hypochlorite, and ferrous sulfate), Claim 1 is actually broader, claiming a method using "a material [112] that exhibits anion exchange behavior" (not merely the specific resins), "an anionic oxidant" (not merely permanganate or hypochlorite), and "a salt of a metal" (not merely ferrous sulfate). Thus, Purolite argues that the specification does not describe the full scope of the claim, which covers the use of any such material and oxidant and salt of a metal. See Cooper Cameron Corp. v. Kvaerner Oilfield Prods., Inc., 291 F.3d 1317, 1323 (Fed. Cir. 2002) ("a broad claim is invalid when the entirety of the specification clearly indicates that the invention is of a much narrower scope") (citing Gentry Gallery, Inc. v. Berkline Corp., 134 F.3d 1473, 1479-80 (Fed. Cir. 1998)).[28]

[28] Because Purolite has not preserved a defense under 35 U.S.C. § 112 ¶ 2, see supra Part V.B.2, the Court does not address Purolite's argument that Claim 1 is invalid pursuant to that paragraph's requirement that the specification claim the subject matter that the applicant "regards as his invention."

The Court rejects this argument. The specification clearly encompasses a broader scope than the embodiments that use the specific resins, permangante/hypochlorite, and ferrous sulfate. See Cordis Corp. v. Medtronic AVE, Inc., 339 F.3d 1352, 1365 (Fed. Cir. 2003) [113] ("A specification may, within the meaning of 35 U.S.C. § 112 para. 1, contain a written description of a broadly claimed invention without describing all species that the claim encompasses.") (quoting Utter v. Hiraga, 845 F.2d 993, 998 (Fed. Cir. 1988)). The specification does not state that the invention is limited to those particular materials, but rather describes the invention in the broader terms found in Claim 1. See, e.g., Patent at 2:36-60. More specifically, the specification states that although certain resins are preferred, a wide variety of resins may be used, see id. at 2:61-3:2, 9:67-10:12 (listing several examples); that "any anionic oxidizing agent can be used in [*1248] place of permanganate," see id. at 10:13-16 (listing several examples); and that a solution of ferrous salt is merely the preferred metal salt, see id. at 3:3. Thus, because the specification does not limit the scope of the claimed invention to the particular materials used in the embodiments described in the most detail, there is no violation of the written description requirement. See Cordis Corp. v. Medtronic AVE, Inc., 339 F.3d 1352, 1365 (Fed. Cir. 2003) (written description requirement was not violated [114] because "the patent disclosure provides ample support for the breadth of the term [and] it does not unambiguously limit the meaning of the term to the narrower embodiment") (quoting Johnson Worldwide Assocs., Inc. v. Zebco Corp., 175 F.3d 985, 993 (Fed. Cir. 1999)); cf. Tronzo v. Biomet, Inc., 156 F.3d 1154, 1159 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (requirement was violated because statements in the specification made clear that the patent disclosed only cups of a certain shape and nothing broader, without any suggestion that the patent encompassed other shapes or species of cup).

Purolite relies on the opinion of its expert, Dr. Stack. In his report, however, Dr. Stack noted the specification's language indicating that materials other than those used in the embodiments may be used. Moreover, Dr. Stack's opinion that "the specification would not convey to a person of ordinary skill in the art that the inventors were in possession of the alleged invention encompassed by the full scope of claim 1" is not supported by any analysis of the specification and its broad language.[29] At most, Dr. Stack states that the specification discloses two examples, but as the applicable caselaw makes clear, the specification [115] need not describe in detail all possible examples. Thus, the Court concludes that Dr. Stack's conclusory statement does not provide clear and convincing evidence to rebut the presumption that the written description requirement has been satisfied.

Purolite also cites Dr. SenGupta's denials of the following three requests for admission:

> The Patent-in-Suit describes the method of claim 1 using every "anionic oxidant" known as of January 21, 2004.
> The Patent-in-Suit describes the method of claim 1 using every "solution of a salt of a metal" known as of January 21, 2004.
> The Patent-in-Suit describes the method of claim 1 using every "material that exhibits anion exchange behavior" known as of January 21, 2004.

Purolite concedes that these denials do not have the conclusive effect given to admissions under Fed. R. Civ. P. 36, see, e.g., *Audiotext Communications Network, Inc. v. U.S. Telecom, Inc., 1995 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15395, 1995 WL 625744, at 7 (D. Kan. Oct. 5, 1995); nevertheless, Purolite argues that the denials at least have evidentiary [116] value and support its position that the patent does not satisfy the written description requirement. The Court, however, does not find Dr. SenGupta's bare denials, without further explanation, to be probative. The requests do not refer specifically to the written description requirement of 35 U.S.C. § 112, and Dr. SenGupta has not denied that the patent complies with the statute. Moreover, as previously stated, the fact that a patent does not describe every possible example (listing every possible combination of the possible materials) does not indicate non-compliance with the statute. Thus, the denials [*1249] do not provide clear and convincing evidence in support of Purolite's position.

For these reasons, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Purolite has failed to meet its burden to provide clear and convincing evidence to overcome the presumption that Claim 1 of the patent satisfies Section 112's written description requirement. Accordingly, the Court awards plaintiffs summary judgment on this invalidity defense asserted by Purolite, and it denies Purolite's motion for summary judgment as it relates to this defense.

[29] Dr. Stack's analysis of specific language in the specification and discovery from Dr. SenGupta related and is relevant only to his opinion on compliance with the enablement requirement.

5. ENABLEMENT (CLAIM 1)

Purolite next asserts that Claim 1 and its [117] dependent claims fail to satisfy the "enablement" requirement of 35 U.S.C. § 112. As noted above, Section 112 contains the following requirement:

> The specification shall contain a written description of the invention, and of the manner and process of making and using it, in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art to which it pertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make and use the same . . . .

Id. ¶ 1. "The enablement requirement is satisfied when one skilled in the art, after reading the specification, could practice the claimed invention without undue experimentation." Sitrick v. Dreamworks, LLC, 516 F.3d 993, 999 (Fed. Cir. 2008) (internal quotation omitted).

Whether a claim satisfies the enablement requirement of Section 112 is a question of law based on underlying facts. See id.; Transocean Offshore Deepwater Drilling, Inc. v. Maersk Contractors USA, Inc., 617 F.3d 1296, 1305 (Fed. Cir. 2010) (enablement "is a question of law with underlying questions of fact regarding undue experimentation"); AK Steel Corp. v. Sollac and Ugine, 344 F.3d 1234, 1245 (Fed. Cir. 2003) ("whether a patent complies with the enablement requirement [118] depends upon a factually intensive inquiry regarding the amount of experimentation required"); National Recovery Technologies, Inc. v. Magnetic Separation Sys., Inc., 166 F.3d 1190, 1197 (Fed. Cir. 1999) ("Whether making and using the claimed invention would have required undue experimentation is a legal conclusion based upon underlying facts."). Because a patent is presumed valid, the party asserting invalidity must show that the enablement requirement is not satisfied to a standard requiring clear and convincing evidence. See Sitrick, 516 F.3d at 999.

Purolite again notes that Claim 1, which is not limited to any particular "material that exhibits anion exchange behavior," "anionic oxidant," or "salt of a metal," is broader than the specification's two examples that use specific materials. Purolite thus argues that Claim 1 and the dependent claims are not enabled because the specification teaches only how to practice the invention with those particular combinations of materials, and does not explain which other combinations of materials may be used to produce a selective adsorbent capable of exchanging anions, as required by the claim. See id. ("The full scope of the claimed invention [119] must be enabled."); National Recovery, 166 F.3d at 1196 ("The scope of the claims must be less than or equal to the scope of the enablement.").

Plaintiffs argue that the specification's two detailed examples are sufficient for enablement here, based on the general principle that "the enablement requirement is met if the description enables any mode of making and using the invention." See Johns Hopkins Univ. v. CellPro, Inc., 152 F.3d 1342, 1361 (Fed. Cir. 1998) (quoting *Engel Indus., Inc. v. Lockformer Co., [1250] 946 F.2d 1528, 1533 (Fed. Cir. 1991)). Plaintiffs also rely on cases in which the court did not require the specification at issue to have described all possible species covered by the claim. See Atlas Powder Co. v. E.I. du Pont De Nemours & Co., 750 F.2d 1569, 1576 (Fed. Cir. 1984); In re Application of Angstadt, 537 F.2d 498, 502-03 (C.C.P.A. 1976).

The Court does not agree the specification's inclusion of the two detailed examples entitles plaintiffs to summary judgment on this issue. As Purolite has pointed out, the scope of Claim 1 is much broader and covers various other materials under the claim's broad categories. Thus, the two examples do not show how a practitioner could [120] practice the full scope of Claim 1 by using other materials covered by the claim. Moreover, although the specification lists alternative materials, the specification does not describe how any such alternative materials could be combined to allow the invention (as fully claimed) to be made and used. In cases in which the specification does not enable the full scope of a broad claim, the Federal Circuit has rejected similar arguments based on the "one mode" principle. See Automotive Technologies Int'l, Inc. v. BMW of N. Am., Inc., 501 F.3d 1274, 1285 (Fed. Cir. 2007); Liebel-Flarsheim Co. v. Medrad, Inc., 481 F.3d 1371, 1379-80 (Fed. Cir. 2007).

The other cases cited by plaintiffs, Angstadt and Atlas Powder, also suggest that further inquiry is needed. In Angstadt, the court stated that requiring disclosure of a test with every species covered by the claim would require the disclosure of information concerning thousands of catalysts and would force inventors to carry out a prohibitive number of actual experiments, thereby discouraging patent applications in unpredictable areas. See Angstadt, 537 F.2d at 502-03. The court proceeded, however, to examine whether the evidence showed that [121] one skilled in the art could make and use other material without undue experimentation. See id. at 503-04. In Atlas Powder, the defendant essentially made the same argument made by Purolite in this case:

> Du Pont argues that the patent disclosure lists numerous salts, fuels, and emulsifiers that could form thousands of emulsions but there is no commensurate teaching as to which combination would work. The disclosure, according to Du Pont, is nothing more than "a list of candidate ingredients" from which one skilled in the art would have to select and experiment unduly to find an operable emulsion.

Atlas Powder, 750 F.2d at 1576. The court agreed with the district court's conclusion that listing all operable emulsions would have been impossible and was unnecessary. See id. Such detail was unnecessary, however, because the district court had found that a particular scientific principle allowed those skilled in the art to know how to select the particular ingredient substances. See id. The court noted, however, that "if the number of inoperative combinations becomes significant, and in effect forces one of ordinary skill in the art to experiment unduly in order to practice the claimed invention, [122] the claims might indeed be invalid." See id. at 1576-77; see also Amgen Inc. v. Hoechst Marion Roussel, Inc., 314 F.3d 1313, 1335-37 (Fed. Cir. 2003) (affirming the district court's application of the "one mode" principle where the evidence showed that the claimed invention could be made and used "by experimentation falling short of undue").

Similarly in the present case, although the specification need not have listed every operable combination of materials covered by Claim 1, such combinations must be [*1251] able to be determined by one skilled in the art. As the Federal Circuit has stated:

> That is not to say that the specification itself must necessarily describe how to make and use every possible variant of the claimed invention, for the artisan's knowledge of the prior art and routine experimentation can often fill in gaps, interpolate between embodiments, and perhaps even extrapolate beyond the disclosed embodiments, depending upon the predictability of the art. But it does mean that, when a range is claimed, there must be reasonable enablement of the scope of the range.

AK Steel, 344 F.3d at 1244 (citations omitted).

Thus, the issue here becomes whether one skilled in the art could practice [123] the full scope of Claim 1, using materials other than those disclosed in the specification's detailed embodiments, without undue experimentation.

> The determination of what constitutes undue experimentation in a given case requires the application of a standard of reasonableness, having due regard for the nature of the invention and the state of the art. The test is not merely quantitative, since a considerable amount of experimentation is permissible, if it is merely routine, or if the specification in question provides a reasonable amount of guidance with respect to the direction in which the experimentation should proceed.

In re Wands, 858 F.2d 731, 737 (Fed. Cir. 1988) (citation and footnote omitted); accord Elan Pharmaceuticals, Inc. v. Mayo Foundation for Med. Educ. and Research, 346 F.3d 1051, 1055 (Fed. Cir. 2003) (quoting Wands). The following factors may be considered in determining whether a disclosure requires undue experimentation:

> (1) the quantity of experimentation necessary, (2) the amount of direction or guidance presented, (3) the presence or absence of working examples, (4) the nature of the invention, (5) the state of the prior art, (6) the relative skill of those in [124] the art, (7) the predictability or unpredictability of the art, and (8) the breadth of the claims.

ALZA Corp. v. Andrx Pharmaceuticals, LLC, 603 F.3d 935, 940 (Fed. Cir. 2010) (quoting Wands, 858 F.2d at 737).

The Court concludes that neither party is entitled to summary judgment on this defense on the present record before the Court. Purolite has presented evidence from its expert, Dr. Stack, who applied the factors set forth above and opined that undue experimentation would be required to practice the full scope of Claim 1 and its dependent claims. In particular, Dr. Stack cited the great number of possible combinations of materials, his opinion that the reason why some combinations would not work may not be apparent to one in the art, the lack of guidance and working examples in the specification, the patent's contention that the invention was pioneering, the unpredictable nature of the art, and the breadth of the claims. That evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Purolite, precludes summary judgment in favor of plaintiffs. Plaintiffs rely on the opinions of their own expert, Dr. Clifford, who disagrees with Dr. Stack's conclusions. Plaintiffs also cite to Dr. Stack's deposition, [125] in which he testified that various reactions and processes involved in practicing the invention are routine or constitute basic chemistry or are within the knowledge of one of ordinary skill in the art; that certain relevant data may be found in reference books or extrapolated by the practitioner; and that certain relevant results could be predicted by one in the art. This evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiffs, precludes summary [*1252] judgment in favor of Purolite on this issue.

Thus, the Court cannot rule on this issue of undue experimentation as a matter of law on the record presently before it. Accordingly, an issue of fact remains for trial, and both parties' summary judgment motions are denied as they relate to this defense of invalidity based on non-enablement.

6. ANTICIPATION BY PRIOR ART (CLAIM 15)

Purolite seeks summary judgment on its defense that Claim 15 of the patent is invalid as anticipated by prior art pursuant to 35 U.S.C. § 102. Claim 15 states as follows:

> 15. An adsorbent for the selective removal of ligands from fluids, said absorbent [sic] comprising a polymeric anion exchange resin containing particles of an oxygen-containing compound of iron dispersed [126] throughout the resin.

The Federal Circuit has described the anticipation defense as follows:

> Anticipation under 35 U.S.C. § 102 means lack of novelty, and is a question of fact. To anticipate, every element and limitation of the claimed invention must be found in a single prior art reference, arranged as in the claim. When a claim covers several structures or compositions, either generically or as alternatives, the claim is deemed anticipated if any of the structures or compositions within the scope of the claim is known in the prior art.

Brown v. 3M, 265 F.3d 1349, 1351 (Fed. Cir. 2001) (citations omitted).

Because of the statutory presumption of the validity of the patent, Purolite must prove anticipation by clear and convincing evidence. See Tokai Corp. v. Easton Enters., Inc., 632 F.3d 1358, 1367 (Fed. Cir. 2011). Moreover, if the particular prior art was considered by the PTO during examination of the patent application, the challenger bears an enhanced burden of overcoming the deference that is due to the PTO's decision. See id.[30]

As a preliminary matter, Purolite argues that the phrase in the preamble to Claim 15 that describes the claimed adsorbent as one "for the selective removal of ligands from fluids" does not constitute a limitation on the claim for purposes of the anticipation analysis.

> While it is true that preamble language is often treated as nonlimiting in nature, it is not unusual for this court to treat preamble language as limiting . . . . Preamble language that merely states the purpose or intended use of an invention is generally not treated as limiting the scope of the claim. However, we have stated that there is no "litmus test" for determining whether preamble language is limiting. To the contrary, we have stated the whether to treat a preamble as a claim limitation is determined on the facts of each case in light of the claim as a whole and the invention described in the patent.

[30] If a prior art reference was not before the PTO, there would, of course, be no deference, see Tokai, 632 F.3d at 1367; the clear-and-convincing evidence [127] standard still applies, however, although it may be easier to meet that standard with respect to a reference not before the PTO, see Microsoft Corp. v. i4i Ltd. Partnership, 131 S. Ct. 2238, 2251, 180 L. Ed. 2d 131 (2011).

Bicon, Inc. v. Straumann Co., 441 F.3d 945, 952 (Fed. Cir. 2006) (citations and internal quotations omitted). The [128] Federal Circuit has explained at some length the relevant considerations for construing a preamble:

> [*1253] Whether to treat a preamble as a limitation is a determination resolved only on review of the entire patent to gain an understanding of what the inventors actually invented and intended to encompass by the claim.
> In general a preamble limits the invention if it recites essential structure or steps, or if it is necessary to give life, meaning, and vitality to the claim. Conversely, a preamble is not limiting where a patentee defines a structurally complete invention in the claim body and uses the preamble only to state a purpose or intended use for the invention.
> No litmus test defines when a preamble limits claim scope. Some guideposts, however, have emerged from various cases discussing the preamble's effect on claim scope. For example, this court has held that Jepson claiming generally indicates intent to use the preamble to define the claimed invention, thereby limiting claim scope. Additionally, dependence on a particular disputed preamble phrase for antedcedent basis may limit claim scope because it indicates a reliance on both the preamble and claim body to define the claimed invention. [129] Likewise, when the preamble is essential to understand limitations or terms in the claim body, the preamble limits claim scope.
> Further, when reciting additional structure or steps underscored as important by the specification, the preamble may operate as a claim limitation.
> Moreover, clear reliance on the preamble during prosecution to distinguish the claimed invention from the prior art transforms the preamble into a claim limitation because such reliance indicates use of the preamble to define, in part, the claimed invention. Without such reliance, however, a preamble generally is not limiting when the claim body describes a structurally complete invention such that deletion of the preamble phrase does not affect the structure or steps of the claimed invention. Thus, preamble language merely extolling benefits or features of the claimed invention does not limit the claim scope without clear reliance on those benefits or features as patentably significant.
> Moreover, preambles describing the use of an invention generally do not limit the claims because the patentability of apparatus or composition claims depends on the claimed structure, not on the use or purpose of that structure. Indeed, [130] the inventor of a machine is entitled to the benefit of all the uses to which it can be put, no matter whether he had conceived the idea of the use or not. More specifically, this means that a patent grants the right to exclude others from making, using, selling, offering to sale, or importing the claimed apparatus or composition for any use of that apparatus or composition, whether or not the patentee envisioned such use. Again, statements of intended use or asserted benefits in the preamble may, in rare instances, limit apparatus claims, but only if the applicant clearly and unmistakably relied on those uses or benefits to distinguish prior art. Likewise, this principle does not mean that apparatus claims necessarily prevent a subsequent inventor from obtaining a patent on a new method of using the apparatus where that new method is useful and nonobvious.

Catalina Marketing Int'l, Inc. v. Coolsavings.com, Inc., 289 F.3d 801, 808-09 (Fed. Cir. 2002) (citations and internal quotations omitted). Whether the preamble is a limitation of the claim presents a question of law for the Court. See Intirtool, Ltd. v. Texar Corp., 369 F.3d 1289, 1293-94 (Fed. Cir. 2004).

[*1254] The Court concludes as [131] a matter of law, based on this guidance from the Federal Circuit, that the disputed portion of the preamble in Claim 15 ("for the selective removal of ligands from fluids") does not represent a limitation of that claim. On its face, the preamble describes the use of the invention—it is used for the selective removal of ligands from fluids. Plaintiffs argue that the patent and its specification show that the invention is a ligand-selective adsorbent. In that regard, they point to the title of the patent ("Hybrid Anion Exchanger for Selective Removal of Contaminating Ligands from Fluids . . .")[31] and the patent's first substantive sentence ("The invention relates to the manufacture and application of hybrid anion exchangers for selective removal of contaminants from ligands."). Those references do include the words "selective removal" with respect to ligands; however, they modify "hybrid anion exchanger" by stating the exchanger's use. Indeed, if the title has some relevance, as plaintiffs argue, it suggests only that the invention is the exchanger, the composition of which is described in the body of Claim 15. Similarly, the excerpts to the specification that plaintiffs cite refer to [132] the invention's use or purpose of ligand-selective removal. See Patent at 2:16-18, 2:36-37, 3:15-19, 3:28-32, 9:67-10:2. Thus, the patent does not indicate that the inventor considered a ligand-selective adsorbent or the disputed portion of the preamble to be part of the invention claimed in Claim 15. Plaintiffs have not argued or shown how the preamble is necessary to the claimed structure.

Moreover, the patent's prosecution history confirms that the preamble was not added to overcome or to distinguish any prior art. Plaintiffs note that the PTO examiner first rejected the similar preamble to Claim 1 on the basis that "selective" was indefinite (before ultimately acknowledging a particular definition and withdrawing the objection). Plaintiffs have not cited any authority, however, that would indicate that an examiner would not have lodged an indefiniteness objection unless the preamble was deemed a claim limitation. Nor have plaintiffs cited any authority supporting the argument that the Court should consider the examiner's thoughts in construing a claim.[32]

The other considerations cited by the Federal Circuit do not favor treatment of the preamble in Claim 15 as a limitation. The preamble is not essential to the structure described in the body of the claim, and the structure is complete without reference to the preamble. The body of the claim does not rely on the preamble as an antecedent to its terms, and the preamble is not essential to an understanding of the terms or limitations in the claim. The preamble does not recite an additional structure, and as noted above, the inventor did not rely on the preamble to distinguish prior art. Claim 15 is an apparatus or composition claim, and thus the patentability does not depend on the use of the invention. The Court concludes that this is not one of the "rare instances" in which a preamble to such a claim that states the invention's use should be deemed a limitation, and the Court construes Claim 15 [134] in that manner as a matter of law.

As another preliminary matter, the Court addresses the proper construction [*1255] of the term "adsorbent", which is found in various claims of the patent, including Claim 15. After the claim construction briefing and hearing, the Court construed "adsorbent" to mean "a substance that has the ability to condense or hold molecules of other substances on its surface." With respect to a number of prior art references, plaintiffs argue that the inventions described therein do not meet Claim 15's requirement of an "adsorbent" because they involve holding ions (in a process of ion exchange), which plaintiffs argue are distinct from the "molecules" required by the Court's construction.

The Court declines to interpret "adsorbent" in the patent claims to exclude holding ions. This particular issue was not raised by the parties at the claim construction stage, and thus the Court did not consider the issue in originally construing "adsorbent". In its claim construction order, the Court intended to construe "adsorbent" in accordance with its ordinary meaning in the art as reflected in a scientific dictionary. See Memorandum and Order of July 22, 2011, at 8 (Doc. # 344). [135] The Court followed Purolite's proposed construction, which had been taken from the dictionary's definition of "adsorbent" as "[a] substance which has the ability to condense or hold molecules of other substances on its surface." See id. The same dictionary defines "adsorption", however, to mean "[a]dherence of the atoms, ions, or molecules of a gas or liquid to the surface of another substance, called the adsorbent." That definition indicates that "adsorbent" and "adsorption" are related in scope and are not limited to some technical definition of "molecules" that could exclude ions or particular kinds of atoms. Moreover, in its prior ruling, the Court stated that "this same definition was cited by the applicant in the application process for the Patent." See id. That statement was not quite accurate, as the applicant had cited this dictionary's definition of "adsorption," while the Court adopted the dictionary's definition of "adsorbent". The fact that the applicant relied on a definition including "atoms, ions, and molecules," however, supports the Court's conclusion that the patent was not intended to exclude a substance that hold ions on the surface in referring to an "adsorbent".

[32] The [133] Court also rejects plaintiffs' argument based on Purolite's request for a construction by the Court of the word "ligand". The Court does not consider Purolite, by such request, to have admitted or to be estopped from disputing that the preamble should be deemed a claim limitation in Claim 15.

This [136] revised construction is further supported by the fact that plaintiffs' proposed construction of "adsorbent" would have included "an anion exchange resin" as an example. Indeed, at the claim construction hearing, plaintiffs' counsel conceded that the starting material—the "material that exhibits anion exchange behavior"—may be an adsorbent. The Court also noted in its prior order that the starting "material that exhibits anion exchange behavior" may be an adsorbent. See id. at 11. Finally, plaintiffs' expert concedes that practitioners in the art often include the process of ion exchange within the scope of the definition of adsorption.

For these reasons, the Court revises its prior construction, and it construes "adsorbent" in the patent's claims as a matter of law to mean "a substance that has the ability to condense or hold atoms, ions, or molecules of other substances on its surface."[33]

The Court then moves to the ten particular prior art references cited by Purolite [137] and its expert, Dr. Stack, as invalidating Claim 15 as anticipated under 35 U.S.C. § 102. Five of the references are [*1256] understood by the parties to relate to the same product, known as MIEX, manufactured by a company named Orica. The Court concludes that four of these five MIEX references show as a matter of law that Claim 15 is invalid as anticipated by prior art.

As an initial matter, plaintiffs do not dispute that these MIEX references were not placed before the PTO examiner. Accordingly, as recognized by the Supreme Court, Purolite may more easily satisfy the clear-and-convincing evidence standard with respect to these references. See Microsoft Corp., 131 S. Ct. at 2251.

In evidence submitted by Purolite, Dr. Stack has shown how these references satisfy each of the limitations contained in Claim 15. In response, plaintiffs and their expert, Dr. Clifford, make two primary arguments. First, they argue that these references do not describe an adsorbent that is selective for ligands. As the Court ruled above, however, Claim 15 does not include as a limitation the preamble's reference to the selective removal of ligands. Thus, that argument fails as a matter of law. Second, they argue that [138] the references do not describe an "adsorbent" because they instead describe ion exchangers. Again, however, the Court has rejected such an interpretation of "adsorbent" as a matter of law. Plaintiffs have not offered any other reasons why these references do not meet all of the limitations of Claim 15 as presently construed by the Court. In particular, plaintiffs do not dispute that these references, which are all described as containing an iron compound "throughout" the resin, satisfy the "dispersed throughout" limitation of claim 15.[34]

Therefore, the Court concludes as a matter of law that Purolite has shown, by clear and convincing evidence, that Claim 15 is invalid under 35 U.S.C. § 102 as anticipated by four of the MIEX references—the Nguyen patent, the Ballard patent, the Ballard patent application, and the MIEX product itself.[35] Accordingly, [139] Purolite is awarded summary judgment on this invalidity defense, and thus is also awarded summary judgment on plaintiffs' claim for infringement of Claim 15 of the patent.[36]

[33] Because of this construction, the Court need not construe the term "molecules" or determine whether that term excludes ions, as suggested by plaintiffs' expert, or whether it does include ions under its ordinary defintion.

[34] With respect to the fifth MIEX reference, the Singer and Bilyk article, the Court concludes that a question of fact remains whether the article, which refers only to iron oxide "integrated into the resin structure," satisfies the "dispersed throughout" limitation; thus, that reference does not support a finding of invalidity as a matter of law.

[35] The Court rejects plaintiffs' argument that the MIEX product was not "in public use or on sale in this country" early enough for consideration as prior art under 35 U.S.C. § 102(b). Orica's representative testified that the product was in public use before the relevant date, and plaintiffs' citation to evidence that the first sale was later does not controvert that testimony. Moreover, the representative was not required to have personal knowledge of that fact because the deposition was conducted pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(b)(6). See, e.g., *Payless Shoesource Worldwide, Inc. v. Target Corp., 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 28878, 2008 WL 973118, at 9 (D. Kan. Apr. 8, 2008) (Rule 30(b)(6) deponent's discharge of his duty does not require personal knowledge).

[36] Remaining issues of fact, particularly with respect to the "dispersed throughout" limitation, preclude reliance on the other five prior art references cited by Purolite for purposes of summary judgment on this defense.

7. OBVIOUSNESS (CLAIM 15)

Although the Court has ruled Claim 15 to be invalid, [140] the Court nonetheless addresses Purolite's alternative defense of obviousness. In its motion for summary judgment, Purolite has not made any argument that Claim 15 is invalid as obvious pursuant to 35 U.S.C. § 103. [*1257] In their own motion, plaintiffs note that Purolite's expert has not offered an opinion concerning Claim 15's obviousness, and they argue that Purolite cannot meet is burden to show by clear and convincing evidence that Claim 15 is obvious under Section 103. In response to that argument, Purolite cites the Federal Circuit's conclusion in Wyers v. Master Lock Co., 616 F.3d 1231 (Fed. Cir. 2010), that in appropriate cases (where the technology is easily understandable, for instance), expert testimony may not be necessary on the issue of obviousness. See id. at 1239-40. Purolite further notes that both sides' experts have offered opinions on prior art with respect to Claim 15 as it bears on the issue of anticipation. Purolite's sole argument, however, is that the obviousness inquiry is not complex here, and that plaintiffs "fail to show how any difference between claim 15 and any prior art reference of record would require recourse to anything beyond 'logic, judgment, and common [141] sense.'"

The Court concludes that Purolite has failed to provide evidence or even show by argument that Claim 15 is invalid as obvious in light of the prior art. The burden does not fall to plaintiffs to show that particular evidence is required. Purolite has not cited any expert opinion that Claim 15 is obvious, and in fact, Purolite's counsel represented at Dr. Stack's deposition that Purolite would not rely on any expert testimony for its assertion of obviousness. Purolite has not shown or even tried to explain how logic or common sense makes Claim 15 obvious in light of any particular prior art. Accordingly, Purolite has not met its burden in opposing summary judgment, including the heightened burden of proof on this issue, and summary judgment in plaintiffs' favor on this issue is therefore appropriate.

8. SUMMARY OF INVALIDITY ISSUES

With respect to Claim 1 of the patent, only Purolite's defense based on the enablement requirement remains for trial, and plaintiffs are awarded summary judgment on Purolite's other theories of invalidity. The Court rules that Claim 15 is invalid as anticipated by prior art as a matter of law, and Purolite is awarded summary judgment on that defense [142] and thus on plaintiffs' claim for infringement of Claim 15.

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT plaintiffs' motion to exclude expert testimony by Richard Troxel (Doc. # 426) is granted in part and denied in part; the motion is granted with respect to opinions concerning Layne's claim for royalties and Purolite's claim for unpaid invoices, but is denied as moot with respect to damages on Purolite's other counterclaims.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT plaintiffs' motion to exclude certain expert sur-rebuttal reports (Doc # 428) is denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT defendant Purolite's motion to exclude expert testimony by Dennis Clifford (Doc. # 430) is denied.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT plaintiffs' motion for leave to file a declaration by Dr. Clifford (Doc. # 542) is granted, and the proposed declaration is deemed filed.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT plaintiff Layne's motion for summary judgment on certain of Purolite's counterclaims (Doc. # 404) is granted, and Layne is awarded summary judgment on Purolite's counterclaims at issue in the motion, namely all claims for breach of contract other than Purolite's claim of a breach based on the [143] failure to pay for [*1258] product, and Purolite's claims for unfair competition, restraint of trade, and breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT Layne's motion for partial summary judgment on its claims for breach of contract (Doc. # 406) is granted in part and denied in part. As it relates to Layne's claim for damages for unpaid royalties, the motion is granted with respect to Purolite's liability, but denied with respect to the amount of damages. As it relates to Layne's claim for a permanent injunction for breach of Section 11.2 of the Agreement, the motion is granted, and Purolite is hereby permanently enjoined from making, selling, or using the product FerrIX

A33E or any substantially similar product that uses "Intellectual Property" (as defined in the Agreement) resulting from Purolite's activities under the Agreement.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on its claims of patent infringement (Doc. # 408) is granted in part and denied in part. The motion is granted with respect to the following, on which plaintiffs are awarded summary judgment: Purolite's theories that Claim 1 of the [144] patent is not infringed based on the "by the action of the oxidant" and "salt of said metal" limitations; and Purolite's invalidity defenses based on an inoperable process under 35 U.S.C. § 112 (Claim 1), the lack of a written description under 35 U.S.C. § 112 (Claim 1), and obviousness under 35 U.S.C. § 103 (Claim 15). The motion is denied in all other respects.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED BY THE COURT THAT Purolite's motion for summary judgment on certain of plaintiffs' claims (Doc. # 410) is granted in part and denied in part. The motion is granted with respect to the following, on which Purolite is awarded summary judgment: Layne's claim for breach of Section 10.1 of the Agreement, to the extent that such breach is based on an underlying breach of a separate non-disclosure agreement between SolmeteX and Purolite; with respect to patent infringement, plaintiffs' marking estoppel theory and any claims by plaintiff based on indirect infringement or the doctrine of equivalents; and with respect to patent invalidity, plaintiffs' license estoppel theory and Purolite's defense that Claim 15 of the patent is anticipated by prior art pursuant to 35 U.S.C. § 102—and thus also plaintiffs' claim [145] for infringement of Claim 15. The motion is denied is all other respects.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Opinion

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

I. INTRODUCTION

Plaintiffs filed the present suit against Defendant Cox Enterprises, Inc. ("Cox") alleging that Defendant illegally forces customers to rent a Cox set-top box ("STB") in order to gain full access to Cox's premium cable services in violation of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1. Presently, Plaintiffs move this Court to certify the class pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23.

II. BACKGROUND

Plaintiffs bring this action on behalf of themselves and the following putative class: All persons in the United States who subscribed to Cox for premium cable and paid Cox a monthly rental fee for an accompanying set-top box. [1] Additionally, Plaintiffs Elizabeth Ann Brady, John Joseph Brady, and Sharon Coughlin seek certification of the following subclass: All persons in the State of California who subscribed to Cox for premium cable and paid Cox a monthly rental fee for an accompanying set-top box.

Cox is one of the five largest cable providers of multi-channel video programming distribution ("MVPD") in the United States and provides cable service to customers across the nation in 19 different states. (Pls.' Compl., Dkt. No. 17, at 4; Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 10.) Cox offers several different tiers of cable packages, including basic cable and digital cable. [2] Before a customer may subscribe to digital video programming, that customer must subscribe to Cox TV Starter, formerly Cox Limited Basic ("basic cable"). Basic cable is primarily over-the-air broadcast stations, without interactive digital programming. (Class Certification Hr'g Tr. 110, Nov. 16, 2011.) Under Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") regulations, [*16] every cable subscriber must buy basic cable before being permitted to subscribe to premium cable.

Specific channels and digital cable tiers available to customers vary across Cox's national footprint, as do prices. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181 Ex. 11.) Unlike basic cable, customers need a device that will unscramble the encrypted signals in order to access digital programming. (Pls.' Compl., Dkt. No. 17, at 6-7.) One such device is a set-top box. Set-top boxes perform another function: they allow cable providers and their customers to communicate back and forth ("bi-directionally") so that customers can utilize features—Pay-Per-View ("PPV"), Video on Demand ("VOD"),

[1] Plaintiffs exclude the following people from their definition of the class: Plaintiffs' counsel; Defendant's employees; government [*15] agencies; this Court and the immediate family members and staff of the Court. Originally, Plaintiffs also excluded addresses where the consumer receives multi-channel video programming distribution ("MVPD") service from at least one other cable MVPD. However, Plaintiffs no longer exclude this category of people and offer to file another amended complaint to reflect this change. Because Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification is herein denied, this request is moot.

[2] For example, Cox customers can subscribe to various Paks based on their particular interests, like the Sports & Information Pak and the Movie Pak. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 11 & n.26 (describing the different channels available in the Sports and Information Pak depending on the region).)

and Interactive Programming Guide ("IPG")—that require such communication. While specific packages vary, all Cox customers who subscribe to digital video programming and rent a Cox set-top box have access to Cox's IPG, VOD, and PPV.

Originally, [*17] set-top boxes included integrated technology that would descramble the signal and allow customers to watch digital programming. In 2004, the FCC required cable operators to offer the descrambling technology in separate devices, called CableCards. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 209 Ex. 2, at 4 & n.13.) Instead of renting a set-top box, Cox customers could rent, for roughly two dollars per month, a CableCard from Cox that would descramble the encrypted signals. (Hr'g Tr. at 49; Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 18.) Unlike Cox's set-top box, however, CableCards do not grant access to Cox's interactive features, such as Cox's IPG or VOD. (Pls.' Compl., Dkt. No. 17, at 6-7.) Additionally, in order to function, CableCards require a reader slot, either directly into a CableCard ready television or other CableCard enabled device. (Id. at 11.) In 2007, the FCC prohibited cable companies from integrating the technology into set-top boxes and required that boxes have CableCard slots and separate CableCards. (Id.; Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 18.)

Instead of or in addition to renting a set-top box directly from Cox, Cox customers can purchase their own set-top box, such as TiVO or Moxi, which allows access [*18] to cable programming, but not Cox's interactive programming like IPG or VOD. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 17.) Additionally, other MVPD providers compete with Cox for digital programming subscriptions, including AT&T U-Verse, Qwest/CenturyLink, Verizon FiOS, EATEL, Wide Open West, LUS Fiber/Lafeyette Utility Services, and the direct broadcasting satellite ("DBS") providers, DISH Network and DirecTV. (Id. at 13-17.)

In 2009, multiple Cox premium cable subscribers filed class action suits in various jurisdictions against Cox for allegedly illegally tying its premium cable service to rental of a Cox set-top box. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160, at 4-5.) At Defendant's request, the United States Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation ("JPML") consolidated these actions and transferred them to this Court for resolution. (Order, Dkt. No. 1.) For two years following that transfer, the parties have conducted discovery and litigated this matter. On November 16 and 17, 2011, the Court held a hearing on Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification where the parties presented argument and their respective expert witnesses testified.

III. CLASS CERTIFICATION STANDARD

Before a plaintiff may represent a [*19] class in an action, the Court must first find that the plaintiff has satisfied the requirements of Rule 23. The first subpart of this Rule requires that

> (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all members is impracticable;
> (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class;
> (3) the claims or defenses of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and
> (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a). Once Rule 23(a) has been satisfied, then the plaintiff must show that it meets one of the three types of actions under Rule 23(b). Here, Plaintiffs assert that this action fits within subpart (b)(3), which requires:

> (3) the court finds that the questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b).

Before deciding whether to certify a class, the Court must conduct a "rigorous analysis" of whether Plaintiffs have met their strict burden of proof that the Rule 23 requirements have been [*20] met. Rex v. Owens ex rel. State of Okla., 585 F.2d 432, 435 (10th Cir. 1978). While conducting this analysis may involve considerations enmeshed in the factual and legal issues comprising a plaintiff's cause of action, the court is not to pass judgment on whether plaintiffs will prevail on the merits. Gen. Tel. Co. of Sw. v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 160, 102 S. Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740 (1982); Vallario v. Vandehey, 554 F.3d 1259, 1266 (10th Cir. 2009) (stating that "no 'impermeable wall' exists between the merits of a case and a district court's decision whether to certify a class."). "Rule 23 does not set forth a mere pleading standard. [Parties] seeking class certification must affirmatively demonstrate [their] compliance with the Rule—that is, [they] must be prepared to prove that there are in fact sufficiently numerous parties, common questions of law or fact, etc." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, __ U.S. __, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2551, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011).

IV. DISCUSSION

Before analyzing whether the Rule 23 requirements have been met, the Court must first determine whether the suit has been brought by "[o]ne or more members of [the] class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a); Paton v. N.M. Highlands Univ., 275 F.3d 1274, 1278 (10th Cir. 2002). [*21] All of the named Plaintiffs live within the United States, subscribed to Cox's premium cable, and rented a Cox set-top box during the relevant period. [3] Therefore, members of the class have brought the present suit, and the Court may proceed in its analysis of whether Plaintiffs have satisfied Rule 23's requirements.

A. Rule 23(a)

1. Numerosity

To satisfy this element, "[t]he burden is upon plaintiffs seeking to represent a class to establish that the class is so numerous as to make joinder impracticable." Peterson v. Okla. City Hous. Auth., 545 F.2d 1270, 1273 (10th Cir. 1976). The Tenth Circuit has not adopted a set number as presumptively sufficient to meet this burden, and there is '"no set formula to determine if the class is so numerous that it should be so certified."' Trevizo v. Adams, 455 F.3d 1155, 1162 (10th Cir. 2006) (quoting Rex v. Owens ex rel. State of Okla., 585 F.2d 432, 436 (10th Cir. 1978)). [*22] Whether a class satisfies the numerosity requirement is "a fact-specific inquiry" that district courts have "wide latitude" when determining. Id.

Here, the purported class includes more than three million current or former Cox customers, scattered across nineteen states, who subscribed to premium cable and rented a Cox set-top box. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 3, at 62.) Considering the large number of class members dispersed across the nation, Plaintiffs have established that the number is too great to render individual joinder of the class members practicable. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(a)(1).

2. Commonality

This requirement is generally established when the plaintiff's claims have "questions of law or fact common to the class." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2). However, it is not enough to allege that all members of the class "have . . . suffered a violation of the same provision of law." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., __ U.S. at __, 131 S. Ct. at 2551. Rather, the plaintiff must prove a common contention that can be remedied with classwide resolution. "Commonality requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the class members 'have suffered the same injury.'" [*23] Id. (quoting Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157). For purposes of commonality, "'[e]ven a single [common] question' will do." Id. at 2556 (alterations in original) (quoting id. at 2566 n.9 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting)).

Here, the same practices—namely, the alleged tie that Cox customers are required to rent a Cox set-top box to access Cox's interactive features—"touch and concern all members of the class." (quoting id. at 2566 n.7 (Ginsburg, J., dissenting)). The complained-of conduct is a common practice that Cox applied to all members of the class, regardless of what specific package they subscribed to or the geographic region in which they lived. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 13, 18, 19 (stating that "[i]n order to receive Interactive TV services offered by Cox, such as the Interactive Programming Guide, On Demand, and Pay-Per-View, and all programming options, you must rent a

[3] The named representatives include the following people: David Abdullah; Bobby Bowick; Elizabeth and John Brady; Sharon Coughlin; Jessica Diket; Bradley Gelder; Trevor Haynes; Michael Helmstetter, Jr.; Henry Holmes; Barksdale Hortenstine; Ernest Johnson; Sandra Prezgay; Danielle Smith; and Ron Strobo.

[Cox set-top box]").) It is this conduct that serves as the basis for Plaintiffs' illegal tying claim, and the resolution of multiple elements of this claim, such as whether the products are separate, would be common to the class. Because a common question—whether Cox illegally tied access to its interactive programming [*24] to rental of a Cox set-top box—arises as to all members of the class and a classwide proceeding will generate a common answer that drives the resolution of the litigation, the requirements of Rule 23(a)(2) are satisfied. [4] Wal-Mart, __ U.S. at __, 131 S.Ct. at 2551.

3. Typicality

Rule 23(a)'s commonality and typicality requirements "tend to merge," and both facilitate the determination of "whether under the particular circumstances maintenance of a class action is economical and whether the named plaintiff's claim and the class claims are so interrelated that the interests of the class members will be fairly and adequately protected [*25] in their absence." Falcon, 457 U.S. at 157-58 n.13. Typicality is satisfied when the class representatives' claims and proposed class members' claims are "based on the same legal or remedial theory." Adamson v. Bowen, 855 F.2d 668, 676 (10th Cir. 1988). Moreover, "differing fact situations of class members do not defeat typicality under Rule 23(a)(3) so long as the claims of the class representative and class members are based on the same legal or remedial theory." Id.

Here, Plaintiffs complain of one policy of conduct that they allege amounts to an illegal tie, which is the same claim of the named representatives and the class members. While Defendant argues that it will have different defenses against different class members, this difference does not preclude a finding that Plaintiffs have satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(a)(3). DG ex rel. Stricklin v. Devaughn, 594 F.3d 1188, 1199 (10th Cir. 2010) (finding that "typicality exists where, as here, all class members are at risk of being subjected to the same harmful practices, regardless of any class member's individual circumstances."). Nor does the fact that there may be a damage disparity mean that the claims of the class representatives [*26] and the class members are atypical. Charles Alan Wright & Arthur R. Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 1764, at 266-69 & n.13 (3d ed. 2005); see Milonas v. Williams, 691 F.2d 931, 938 (10th Cir. 1982). Named Plaintiffs' and the class members' claims are based on the same legal theories and arise from the same pattern of conduct by Defendant. Accordingly, Plaintiffs have satisfied this requirement.

4. Adequacy

Adequacy of representation depends on resolution of two questions: "'(1) do the named plaintiffs and their counsel have any conflicts of interest with other class members and (2) will the named plaintiffs and their counsel prosecute the action vigorously on behalf of the class?'" [5] Rutter & Wilbanks Corp. v. Shell Oil Co., 314 F.3d 1180, 1187-88 (10th Cir. 2002) (quoting Hanlon v. Chrysler Corp., 150 F.3d 1011, 1020 (9th Cir. 1998)). Lanner v. Wimmer, 662 F.2d 1349, 1357 (10th Cir. 1981) ("It is not fatal if some members of the class might prefer not to have violations of their rights remedied.") (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

Plaintiffs contend there are no conflicts between the named Plaintiffs and the class members, and Defendant has proffered none. For two years, the named Plaintiffs have pursued this litigation diligently and adequately represented all members of the class. Therefore, Plaintiffs have satisfied Rule 23(a)(4). Because the requirements of Rule 23(a) have been met, Plaintiffs must now establish that the case fits into one of the three categories under Rule 23(b). Here, Plaintiffs allege the case satisfies the requirements of Rule 23(b)(3).

[4] "In a class action brought under Rule 23(b)(3), the commonality requirement of Rule 23(a)(2) is subsumed under, or superseded by, the more stringent Rule 23(b)(3) requirement that questions common to the class predominate over other questions." Lienhart v. Dryvit Sys., Inc., 255 F.3d 138, 146 n.4 (4th Cir. 2001) (quoting Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 609, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997)) (internal quotation marks omitted). The Rule 23(b)(3) predominance requirement is "far more demanding" than Rule 23(a)(2)'s commonality requirement. Amchem Prods., 521 U.S. at 623.

[5] In 2003, Rule 23 was amended so that the determination of whether class counsel would fairly and adequately represent the class occurs [*27] after the class has been certified. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(g).

B. Rule 23(b)(3)

Under this subpart, Plaintiffs must show that the common issues will predominate over any individualized issues and that a class action is the superior method for adjudicating the action. Rule 23(b)(3) points to the following factors when making this determination: "the class members' interests in individually controlling the prosecution . . . of separate actions; . . . the extent and nature of any litigation concerning the controversy already begun by . . . class members; . . . the desirability or undesirability of concentrating the litigation of the claims in the particular forum; [*28] and . . . the likely difficulties in managing a class action." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3)(A)—(D).

1. Whether Common Issues Predominate

"The Rule 23(b)(3) predominance inquiry tests whether proposed classes are sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997). In order to determine whether common issues will predominate over individualized issues, the underlying elements of the substantive claim—here, the tying claim—must be identified. See, e.g., Alabama v. Blue Bird Body Co. Inc., 573 F.2d 309, 316 (5th Cir. 1978); Freeland v. AT&T Corp., 238 F.R.D. 130, 142 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("In making [the predominance] determination, a court considers whether the putative class members 'could establish each of the . . . required elements of [their] claim[s] . . . using common evidence.'" (quoting In re Visa Check/MasterMoney Antitrust Litig., 280 F.3d 124, 136 (2d Cir. 2001), superseded by statute on other grounds, Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, as recognized in Attenborough v. Constr. & Gen. Bldg. Laborers' Local 79, 238 F.R.D. 82, 100 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), and overruled on other grounds by In re Initial Pub. Offering Sec. Litig., 471 F.3d 24, 40 (2d Cir. 2006))).

a. [*29] The Tying Claim

In order to establish a violation of § 1, a party must show the existence of "'a contract, combination or conspiracy that unreasonably restrains trade in the relevant market.'" Full Draw Prods. v. Easton Sports, Inc., 182 F.3d 745, 756 (10th Cir. 1999) (quoting TV Commc'ns Network, Inc. v. Turner Network Television, Inc., 964 F.2d 1022, 1027 (10th Cir. 1992)); Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993) ("The purpose of the [Sherman] Act is not to protect businesses from the working of the market; it is to protect the public from the failure of the market.").

To succeed on their tying claim, Plaintiffs must establish the following elements: (1) two separate products or services are involved; (2) the sale or agreement to sell one product or service is coerced or conditioned upon the purchase of another; (3) the seller has sufficient power in the tying product market to enable it to restrain trade in the tied product market; and (4) a not insubstantial amount of interstate commerce in the tied product is affected. MultiState Legal Studies, Inc. v. Harcourt Brace Jovanovich Legal & Prof'l Publ'ns, Inc., 63 F.3d 1540, 1546 (10th Cir. 1995). Additionally, [*30] Plaintiffs must establish that the class has suffered an antitrust injury or impact.

"Tying arrangements are unlawful '[b]ecause they deny competitive access to the tied product market on the basis of the seller's leverage in the tying product market, and force buyers to forego free choice between sellers.'" Abraham v. Intermountain Health Care, Inc., 461 F.3d 1249, 1264 (10th Cir. 2006) (alteration in original) (quoting Ohio-Sealy Mattress Mfg. Co. v. Sealy, Inc., 585 F.2d 821, 834 (7th Cir. 1978)). "[T]he essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984), abrogated on other grounds by Ill. Tool Works Inc. v. Indep. Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 31, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006).

i. Separate Tying and Tied Products

"[T]he test for determining whether two components are separate products turns not on their function, but on the nature of any consumer demand for them." Multistate Legal Studies, Inc., 63 F.3d at 1547. "For two items at issue to be considered distinct products, 'there must be sufficient consumer demand [*31] so that it is efficient for a firm to provide [one] separate from [the other].'" Id. (quoting Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 462, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992)). "'The courts uniformly consider the issue whether the tying arrangement consists of separate tying and tied products to be common to all members of the class.'" In re Visa Check/Mastermoney Antitrust Litig., 192 F.R.D. 68, 87 (E.D.N.Y. 2000) (quoting Herbert Hovenkamp, Tying Arrangements and Class Actions, 36 Vand. L. Rev. 213, 220 (1983)).

Plaintiffs define the tying product as premium cable, or Advanced TV, and the tied product as the basic set-top boxes. Plaintiffs use "premium cable" as a label for digital offerings by MVPDs that provide interactive programming, which, Plaintiffs argue, is defined in light of the complained-of conduct. [6] This definition includes "the option to enjoy the interactive channel guide" or VOD, but not the actual downloaded movies or content. (Hr'g Tr. 32.) Plaintiffs' definition is not determined by the Paks or variations thereof to which customers may have subscribed. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Exs. 7-9.) Rather, these are additional features that are marginal to the Plaintiffs' understanding [*32] of premium cable. Plaintiffs define the tied product as the basic set-top box that allows the customer to access Cox's IPG and VOD, regardless of the additional features of the set-top box such as the HD and DVR features. (Id. at 19-20 & n.5.) Defendant asserts that "premium cable" is a term entirely of Plaintiffs' invention and that the services actually offered by Cox are too varied to operate under one label. Plaintiffs admit that Cox does not offer a service labeled "premium cable," but dispute that this lack of recognition impacts the use of premium cable as a label, or shorthand, for the tying product for litigation purposes.

Plaintiffs offer the following evidence to establish that these products are separate: Defendant's expert's, Michelle Burtis, statement that the set-top box and premium cable are separate products; [7] evidence of separate marketing, sales, and pricing of these products; and Cox materials [*33] reflecting the same. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Exs. 7, 16, 17 ("Q. Is there any circumstances under which you would say that a set-top box and Advanced TV are not separate products? A. I think they are separate products.").) Accordingly, while Defendant may disagree with Plaintiffs' conclusions, Plaintiffs have shown that the determination of whether the tied and tying products are separate can be established with common evidence.

ii. Condition or Coercion

Often, coercion is one of the determinative elements in evaluating whether common evidence predominates in tying claims. When the alleged restraint is in a written agreement, such as a contractual provision requiring purchase of the tied product, many courts have found that common proof predominated and class certification was appropriate. See Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434, 452 (1977); In re Visa Check, 192 F.R.D. at 88 [*34] ("[I]n cases such as this one, in which the alleged tie is the product of an undisputed contractual provision, the 'requisite coercion' is established."); see *George Lussier Enters., Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., No. Civ. 99-109-B, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12054, 2001 WL 920060, at 11-12 (D. N.H. Aug. 3, 2001). Likewise, when no contract exists and common proof of coercion was lacking, many courts have found that coercion must be shown on an individual basis rendering class certification inappropriate. Hewitt v. Joyce Beverages of Wis., Inc., 721 F.2d 625, 628-29 & nn.2-3 (7th Cir. 1983); Abrams v. Interco Inc., 719 F.2d 23 (2d Cir. 1983); Ungar v. Dunkin' Donuts of Am., Inc., 531 F.2d 1211, 1226 & n.17 (3d Cir. 1976).

Plaintiffs do not claim that Cox contractually ties the products. Rather, Plaintiffs allege that Cox degrades the quality of the tying product—by limiting the customer's access to Cox's interactive features—for customers who choose not to purchase the tied product, rent a Cox set-top box. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 at 24.) Therefore, Plaintiffs assert, Cox is forcing, or coercing, customers to comply with the tie and purchase the tied product from only Cox. Plaintiffs contend that Cox imposes [*35] a penalty price on the stand-alone tying product, premium cable, by degrading service if the customer chooses not to purchase the tied product. (Id.) As support for this argument, Plaintiffs rely on their expert, Dr. Singer, who concluded that Cox's imposition of this penalty price has the practical economic effect

[6] Plaintiffs also include the channels available through basic cable as an inframarginal feature, or a feature that you must subscribe to in order to subscribe to premium cable. (Hr'g Tr. 31, 112 (stating that subscribers to only basic cable would not be included in the class).)

[7] At the class certification hearing, Dr. Burtis testified that she did not intend to concede that premium cable and set-top boxes were separate products. (Hr'g Tr. 158.) This clarification does not influence the Court's decision for present purposes that common evidence could establish whether these products are separate.

of forcing Cox customers to rent a Cox set-top box. [8] (Id. Ex. 13.) Plaintiffs argue that Cox customers were coerced, even if they would have rented from Cox absent the tie, because the customer's choices were altered through Cox's requirement. (Hr'g Tr. 55.) Additionally, Plaintiffs offer statistics of the number of Cox customers that complied with the tie, roughly 99% of Cox customers, as indirect evidence of coercion. (Hr'g Tr. 42.)

Defendant argues that because no written contract exists requiring the purchase of the tied product, individualized proof is necessary to prove coercion in this case. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 23-24.) Defendant contends that in a practical effects tying case, coercion can only be established by deposing each class member to discern whether each was forced to rent a Cox set-top box. [9] As support for its conclusion that coercion can only be proven with individualized proof, Defendant cites Freeland, 238 F.R.D. 130, where the district court found class certification of the plaintiffs' tying claim improper. Here, however, unlike the defendant in Freeland, Defendant states that it required rental of a Cox set-top box in order to receive full access to all interactive digital [*37] features, and Plaintiffs point to Cox material stating as much as evidence of coercion. Freeland, 238 F.R.D. at 154 (describing that coercion is subject to generalized proof in two circumstances: (1) when the policy of conditioned sales is admitted to by the defendant; and (2) when a contractual provision requiring the tie applies to all members of the class); see also Hill v. A-T-O, Inc., 535 F.2d 1349, 1355 (2d Cir. 1976) (describing the defendants' admission "to a policy of never offering the FBP buying plan membership separately from the sale of the Compact cleaner"). (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 26.)

While there is no contractual provision requiring that Cox customers rent a Cox set-top [*38] box, there is direct, common evidence of classwide policies, practices, and statements that Cox customers had to rent a Cox set-top box in order to participate in the full panoply of digital services. [10] Cox stated on its website and other material that "[i]n order to receive interactive TV services offered by Cox, such as IPG, PPV, and all advanced TV programming options, you must rent a digital receiver." (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181 Ex. 26; Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 13, 18, 19 (stating that "[i]n order to receive Interactive TV services offered by Cox, such as the Interactive Programming Guide, On Demand, and Pay-Per-View, and all programming options, you must rent a [Cox set-top box]").) This requirement was constant across Cox's national footprint and advertised nationally. [11] See Freeland, 238 F.R.D. at 154 ("Because the ultimate question is whether the purchase of the tying product was in fact conditioned on the

[8] Dr. Singer relies on a method called revealed preferences to reach his conclusion that customers rent a set-top box to gain access to its interactive features and not its other features, such as the clock and outlet jacks, due to the low replacement costs of those features. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209, at 13-14, Ex. 8, at 33-35; Hr'g Tr. 103 ("That [Ms. Coughlin] was willing to incur an additional $3.25 per month to get into the interactive realm [*36] is—reveals that she values the option to make use of those features. Whether she ever made use of the features in actuality is a different method[that] . . . is not very relevant to my analysis.").) Defendant's expert disagrees with this conclusion and argues that the only way to determine which features the customer preferred is by conducting individual evaluations. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No 247, at 4-5, Ex. 2, at 4-5.)

[9] Defendant cites Ungar for the proposition that "[e]stablishing that buyers purchase products A and B from the seller does not establish that the seller ties the sale of product A to the purchase of product B. It merely establishes that buyers purchase products A and B from the seller." Ungar, 531 F.2d at 1225. While that may be true, here, Plaintiffs proffer common evidence that Cox allegedly provides a degraded product A when customers did not also purchase product B, which is a different scenario.

[10] Chase Parkway Garage, Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., 94 F.R.D. 330, 331-32 (D. Mass. 1982) (agreeing with the Third Circuit's analysis in Bogosian v. Gulf Oil Corp., 561 F.2d 434 (3d Cir. 1977), "that proof of coercion on an individual basis was not required where a seller expressly conditioned the sale of one product upon the purchase of another"); Ungar, 531 F.2d at 1222, 1226 & n.17 ("With regard to the doctrine of individual coercion we believe it is open to us to reject it, as the district court did, or to accept it. Having in mind the particular factual complex before us, we choose the latter course. . . . Where, as here, plaintiff franchisees place no reliance on express contractual tie-ins, each, individually, must prove that his purchases were coerced as an element of establishing a prima facie case of illegal tying.").

[11] While Cox also stated that its customers were free to rent a CableCard or obtain another set-top box, it explicitly stated that customers who chose this path would be unable to access certain [*40] interactive programming. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181 Exs. 25 & 26.)

purchase of the unwanted tied product, '[a]n unremitting policy of tie-in' will constitute coercion." (quoting Hill, 535 F.2d at 1355)); see also Martino v. McDonald's Sys., Inc., 81 F.R.D. 81, 88-89 (N.D. Ill. 1979) (finding that conditioning could be shown on a class-wide [*39] basis when common evidence showed a "firm policy" of conditioning). Accordingly, Plaintiffs have established that coercion is amenable to proof on a classwide basis.

iii. Market Power

"[I]n all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product." Ill. Tool Works Inc. v. Indep. Ink, Inc., 547 U.S. 28, 46, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006). "Market power is the power 'to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market.'" Kodak, 504 U.S. at 464 (quoting Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 14). "It has been defined as 'the ability of a single seller to raise price and restrict output.'" Id. (quoting Fortner Enters., Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 503, 89 S. Ct. 1252, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1969); United States v. E.I. duPont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956)). Evaluation of the relevant market requires evidence of both a product market and geographic market. Lantec, Inc. v. Novell, Inc., 306 F.3d 1003, 1026 (10th Cir. 2002).

> "There is no subject in antitrust law more confusing than market definition. One reason is that the concept, even in the pristine formulation of economists, is deliberately an attempt to oversimplify—for working purposes—the very complex economic interactions between a number of differently situated buyers and sellers, each [*41] of whom in reality has different costs, needs, and substitutes . . . ."

Telecor Communs., Inc. v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 305 F.3d 1124, 1131 (10th Cir. 2002) (quoting SCFC ILC, Inc. v. Visa USA, Inc., 36 F.3d 958, 966 (10th Cir. 1994) (internal quotation marks, citations, and alterations omitted in original)).

(a). Product Market

The product market is defined by reference to the "reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between the product [in question] and substitutes for it." Brown Shoe Co., Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962); see also Telecor, 305 F.3d at 1131. "'Interchangeability implies that one product is roughly equivalent to another for the use to which it is put; while there may be some degree of preference for the one over the other, either would work effectively.'" Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 437 (3d Cir. 1997) (quoting Allen-Myland, Inc. v. Int'l Bus. Machs. Corp., 33 F.3d 194, 206 (3d Cir. 1994) (internal quotations omitted in original)). Factors to be considered include price, use, and qualities. Id. "'Cross-elasticity of demand is a measure of the substitutability of products from the point of view [*42] of buyers. More technically, it measures the responsiveness of the demand for one product to changes in the price of a different product." Id. (quoting E. Thomas Sullivan and Jeffrey L. Harrison, Understanding Antitrust and its Economic Implications 217 (1994)).

Plaintiffs conclude that the relevant product market includes cable, satellite, and "telcos." (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160, at 26.) As support for their definition of the relevant product market, Plaintiffs rely on the conclusion of their expert economist, Dr. Singer, who defined the market by using FCC pricing reports, product-feature comparisons, and market-structure analyses. While Dr. Singer concluded that satellite and telco providers' digital offerings do not offer the same level of product as cable digital providers, [12] he nevertheless included them in his product market definition to be conservative. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 190, at 17.)

Plaintiffs and Defendant disagree whether over-the-top providers, such as Netflix, should be included in the [*43] product market. [13] While Plaintiffs concede that Netflix, and similar online video distributers, offers one aspect of premium cable comparable to VOD or PPV, Plaintiffs conclude that it is not a competitor with premium cable

[12] Dr. Singer concludes that DBS providers are not true competitors of premium cable because "DBS often has weaker two-way service than other forms of MVPD." (Dkt. No. 160, Ex. 13 at 77.)

[13] Over-the-top providers do not have their own infrastructure. Rather, these services ride over the top of another entity's infrastructure, such as a broadband or high-speed Internet infrastructure. (Hr'g Tr. 60.)

because it lacks critical components of premium cable, the interactive guide and live programming. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex .13, at 78; at 60-61.) Online video distributers do not provide the feature that is implicated by Cox's complained-of conduct which is "central to the definition of the relevant tying product market." (Id. Ex. 13 at 78). Nor do they offer the premium channels. (Id. at 79.) Therefore, Dr. Singer was "not convinced that at least in this case, with respect to the set of services that are being withheld here [by Cox], that Netflix represents a — close substitute for customers to turn, when Cox degrades their two-way interactive services." (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209 Ex. 8, at 68.)

Plaintiffs argue that Defendant's attempts to insert the [*44] consumer's subjective perception of what is "reasonably interchangeable" with premium cable are in error. Rather, Plaintiffs argue, this test is determined utilizing cross-elasticity of demand, not individual consumer's purchasing preferences. Defendant contends that Plaintiffs' description of the tying product as premium cable and the tied product as set-top boxes ignores the various cable packages available. Because of this variance, Defendant argues, the relevant product market definition cannot be proven with evidence common to the class.

Rather, Defendant argues that in order to determine the appropriate product market, consumers' different interests must be considered. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 38.) Specifically, Defendant points to the difference between named Plaintiff Barksdale Hortenstine, who has a great interest in movies and VOD, and named Plaintiff Sharon Coughlin, who has no interest in VOD. (Id. at 39.) Such an in-depth review of individual consumer's preferences is not necessary to determine the relevant product market. In re Live Concert Antitrust Litig., 247 F.R.D. 98, 127 (C.D. Cal. 2007) (stating that "the 'least reliable' evidence in predicting the effects [*45] of a hypothetical price increase is ""subjective"" testimony by customers that they would or would not defect in response to a given price increase."' (quoting Areeda & Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law ¶ 538b)). "[W]hen calculating the cross-elasticity of demand, economists examine the aggregate demand of consumers as represented by a demand curve rather than the purchasing decisions of an individual consumer." Id. For present purposes, it is enough that evidence common to the class will define the relevant product market.

(b). Geographic Market in Tying Product

"The geographic market is '"the narrowest market which is wide enough so that products from adjacent areas . . . cannot compete on substantial parity with those included in the market."'" Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1222 (10th Cir. 1986). The geographic market consists of the area of effective competition, and defining the relevant market is an issue of fact. Telecor, 305 F.3d at 1131. "The extent to which one market prevents exploitation of another market depends on the extent to which consumers will change their consumption of one product in response to a price change in another, i.e., the 'cross-elasticity [*46] of demand.'" Kodak, 504 U.S. at 469. Bacchus Indus., Inc. v. Arvin Indus., Inc., 939 F.2d 887, 893 (10th Cir. 1991).

"The size of the relevant geographic market depends on a number of factors, including '[p]rice data and such corroborative factors as transportation costs, delivery limitations, customer convenience and preference, and the location and facilities of other producers and distributors.'" Lantec, 306 F.3d at 1027 (quoting T. Harris Young & Assocs., Inc. v. Marquette Elecs., Inc., 931 F.2d 816, 823 (11th Cir. 1991). "In other words, 'the outer boundary of the relevant product market is reached, if one were to raise the price of the product or limit its volume of production, while demand held constant, and supply from other sources beyond the boundary could not be expected to enter promptly enough and in large enough quantities to restore the old price or volume.'" Westman, 796 F.2d at 1222 (quoting Satellite Television & Associated Res., Inc. v. Continental Cablevision of Va., Inc., 714 F.2d 351, 356 (4th Cir. 1983)).

Plaintiffs contend that the relevant geographic market is Cox's national footprint, which includes portions of Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, [*47] Georgia, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, and Virginia. (Pls.' Am. Compl., Dkt.

No. 17, ¶¶ 102-03.) [14] Plaintiffs also state in passing that an alternative market to the national one could be each local area individually. [15]

Defendant argues that due to the vast differences of competitors amongst the local markets, a national market is inappropriate. Defendant cites to and relies upon a Second Circuit case, Heerwagen v. Clear Channel Communications, 435 F.3d 219 (2d Cir. 2006), overruled on other grounds by Teamsters Local 445 Freight Division Pension Fund v. Bombardier, Inc., 546 F.3d 196, 200 (2d Cir. 2008), [*49] as support for its argument that the relevant geographic market is local, not national, despite Cox's nationally coordinated conduct. [16] Defendant contends that Plaintiffs' market analysis is divorced from a proper geographic market because it ignores the competitive variations amongst local cable markets.

As [*50] support for their conclusion that the relevant geographic market is national, not local, Plaintiffs rely heavily on Cox's nationally-coordinated conduct relating to its set-top box policies. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160, at 28, Exs. 26, 28, 29.) Similar to the plaintiffs in Heerwagen, Plaintiffs argue that the Supreme Court's decision in United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966), supports finding a national market and certifying the class.

In Grinnell, the Supreme Court found that the relevant geographic market for central service stations was national—despite service stations' limited service area of 25 miles—due to the defendant's national conduct, which included utilizing national agreements, nationally scheduling prices, rates, and terms, certification by national insurers, and nationwide contracting. Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 575-76. Plaintiffs state that evidence of Defendant's statements regarding and determination of its market power, [17] national decision-making regarding set-top box manufacturing

[14] In their First Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs state that "[t]he relevant geographic market is the area in which Cox provides Premium Cable. . . . Those areas are certain communities in: Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Idaho, Kansas, Louisiana, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, and Virginia." (Amend. Compl., Dkt. No. 17, at 20.)

[15] Defendant claims that Plaintiffs have not raised individual markets as possible geographic markets. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 36.) While Plaintiffs have stated that they seek certification based on numerous geographic subclasses, they have not supported this request with appropriate discussion. (Amend. Compl. Dkt. No. 17, at 21 ("In the alternative, each of the local areas in which Cox operates is a relevant geographic market."). In Plaintiffs' Motion to Certify the Class, they note that they "believe [*48] that one class that covers Cox's footprint is both the proper class to be certified and the most convenient. However, should the Court certify numerous classes that correspond to each of Cox's local markets, Plaintiffs respectfully request the opportunity to add class representatives who reside in those markets in which Plaintiffs have not yet named a class representative." (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160, at 31 n.9.) While Plaintiffs have stated in passing that the appropriate geographic market could be regional markets, they have not fleshed out this argument in the briefs sufficiently to establish that Rule 23 is satisfied as to each region, and the Court will not now undertake that responsibility itself. This, however, does not determine whether class actions would be appropriate at the regional market level. For present purposes, the Court only determines the market fully briefed: the national market.

[16] In Heerwagen, the Second Circuit upheld the district court's finding that a putative class of concert ticket buyers should not be certified because the defendant lacked "the power to control prices and exclude competition nationally." Id. at 224-25, 229 ("In light of the substantial non-common issues regarding market power, and because we review the district court's factual determination as to the bounds of the relevant geographic market for clear error, it was not error for the district court to conclude that individualized questions would predominate." (citations omitted)). Specifically, the Second Circuit upheld the district court's conclusion that the defendant's national conduct—namely, nationally coordinating concert tours—was not enough to establish that common issues would predominate under Rule 23(b)(3) when the relevant geographic market for concert tickets was local. Id. at 229.

[17] Cox's own upper management admits [*51] to having pricing power in its investor documents. Pat Esser, President of Cox, stated in a 2006 overview that "[w]e believe we have Pricing Power[;] We have record low churn rates[;] . . . We have majority share in video and HSI." (Pls.' Hr'g Ex. H.)

and policy, [18] and churn rates are common to the class and support a finding that the relevant geographic market is Cox's national footprint.

Plaintiffs acknowledge that local markets vary regarding competitors, but argue that limiting the market is nonsensical in light of the complained-of conduct, which is based on nationally coordinated conduct. While the different markets may have slight variations of competitors, Plaintiffs argue, the competitive alternatives are not so varied as to prevent aggregating the local markets into a national footprint. But see Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 574 (finding that no substitute service rose to "the same level as the central station service so as to meet the interchangeability test . . . .").

Basically, Plaintiffs assert, Cox customers face two rivals regardless of the local market [*52] in which they live: two direct broadcasting rivals, DirecTV and DISH Network. (Hr'g Tr. 58.) Dr. Singer stated that there was "no economic" reason why the relevant geographic market could not be national if the same competitive conditions existed in every market. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 13, at 86-87.) Despite agreeing that the competitive conditions in the markets vary—an additional 14% of Cox customers also have access to telco overbuilders, such as AT&T or Verizon—Dr. Singer concludes that such variations are not significant enough to affect Cox's market power. (Id.) But such a determination would require an evaluation of the actual competitive conditions of the market locally, not nationally.

Essentially, Plaintiffs ask the Court to ignore the economic reality that Cox customers face different options depending on where they live and that most customers will not relocate their homes in order to change their options for MVPD services. [19] Heerwagen, 435 F.3d at 228 ("In certain service industries, the geographic market may be confined by the fact that it can be impractical for consumers to travel great distances to procure particular services."). Cox's national conduct regarding [*53] set-top boxes does not convert a local geographic market into a national one, and the determination of Cox's market power should not be divorced from the appropriate geographic market. See TV Commc'ns Network, 964 F.2d at 1027 (holding a 15 U.S.C. § 1 unreasonable restraint of trade claim requires proof "the defendant entered a contract, combination or conspiracy that unreasonably restrains trade in the relevant market"); Lantec, 306 F.3d at 1026 (stating that "proof of relevant market requires evidence of both a product market and a geographic market").

While the Second Circuit in Heerwagen read the Grinnell decision as "stand[ing] for the proposition that in some cases involving services that tend to be provided locally, the market for purposes of antitrust law still could be

[18] Cox's national headquarters selected the manufacturer of the set-top box, the features of the set-top box, and determined the range of rates charged for the set-top box, with final approval over lease rates. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 42 at 11-12; Hr'g Tr. 302.)

[19] See In re Applications for Consent to the Assignment and/or Transfer of Control of Licenses, 21 FCC Rcd. 8203, 8235-36 (July 21, 2006) ("In the past, the Commission has concluded that the relevant geographic market for MVPD services is local because consumers make decisions based on the MVPD choices available to them at their residences and are unlikely to change residences to avoid a small but significant increase in the price of MVPD service. In order to simplify the analysis, the Commission has aggregated consumers that face the same choice in MVPD products into larger relevant geographic markets. We find it appropriate to continue [*54] this approach here. Because the major MVPD competitors in most areas are the local cable operator and the two DBS providers, and consistent with the Commission's approach in prior license transfer proceedings, we find that the franchise area of the local cable operator is the relevant geographic market for purposes of this analysis.") Jan. 18, 2011) ("A consumer purchasing video programming distribution services selects from those distributors offering such services directly to that consumer's home. . . . A consumer cannot purchase video programming distribution services from a wireline distributor operating outside its area because that firm does not have the facilities to reach the consumer's home. Consequently, although the set of video programming distributors able to offer service to individual consumers' residences generally is the same within each local community, that set differs from one local community to another and can even vary within a local community. The markets for video programming distribution therefore are local."). See also *In re Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litig., Nos. 08-MD-1995 & 08-CIV-7616(PKC), 2011 U.S. Dist. national," this is not such a case. The determination of which competitors Cox faced in each geographic region cannot be proven with evidence common to a national class. [20] Behrend v. Comcast Corp., 655 F.3d 182, 192 (3d Cir. 2011) ("Defining the relevant geographic market . . . is an issue of the merits"). Nor can the competitive market be easily divided into two categories given the varying regional competitors and options available to class members. (See Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181 at 13-17, 30 n.68 (describing the various competitors in different regions.) At the class certification stage, a court need only be satisfied that issues?including the definition of a geographic [*56] market—will be capable of proof through evidence common to the class, which has not been established here. Accordingly, the determination of Cox's market power is not amenable to proof on a classwide basis.

iv. Substantial Amount of Commerce

Finally, Plaintiffs must show that a substantial amount of commerce in the tied product is involved, which is evaluated in terms of dollar volume, not market percentage. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 16; Tic-X-Press, Inc. v. Omni Promotions Co. of Ga., 815 F.2d 1407, 1419 (11th Cir. 1987). This element was found more than satisfied when the dollar amount of commerce foreclosed by the tie was over two million dollars, with the dollar amount being measured by all sales subject to the tie, not just by the plaintiff's purchases. Fortner, 394 U.S. at 501-02. Here, [*57] Plaintiffs proffer evidence common to the class that since 2006, Cox received at least 250 million dollars' worth of revenue in set-top box leases per year. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 42, at 12.) Accordingly, whether Cox conducted a substantial amount of interstate commerce in the set-top box market can be proven with common evidence.

> b. Antitrust Injury or Impact
> Plaintiffs must prove antitrust injury, which is to say injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful. The injury should reflect the anticompetitive effect either of the violation or of anticompetitive acts made possible by the violation. It should, in short, be "the type of loss that the claimed violations . . . would be likely to cause."

Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (quoting Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 125, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969)). "Plaintiffs seeking class certification may carry their burden of establishing that injury is subject to generalized proof by submitting an expert report that 'posits class-wide injury resulting from every single class member's overpaying for [a tied product] [*58] as a direct result of the tie.'" Freeland, 238 F.R.D. at 143 (citation omitted and alteration in original) (quoting Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 137); Bell Atl. Corp. v. AT&T Corp., 339 F.3d 294, 302 (5th Cir. 2003) ("[W]e have repeatedly held that where fact of damage cannot be established for every class member through proof common to the class, the need to establish antitrust liability for individual class members defeats Rule 23(b)(3) predominance."). All that must be shown at this stage in the proceeding is that injury is capable of proof through common evidence, which is distinguishable from actually calculating the amount of damages.

Plaintiffs allege that they suffered an antitrust impact by paying supracompetitive prices for the tied product, an overcharge imposed by Cox on set-top box rentals. Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Singer, proposes the GRS Test—which "seeks to estimate the price effects of a particular vertical restraint, in this case, a bundled rebate or a tie-in"—as a method of evaluating the alleged tie's impact on Cox customers and a calculation of aggregate damages. [21] As an additional method of calculating aggregate damages, Dr. Singer proposes the Benchmark Method, which [*59] compares the prices that Canadian cable companies charge for set-top boxes with Cox's prices. (Pls.' Br.,

[20] Plaintiffs' expert attempts to explain away variances in the market by citing an FCC report suggesting that telcos do not constrain cable providers' prices. (Hr'g Tr. 285; Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181 Ex. 22 ¶ 85.) While Dr. Singer agreed that telcos initially affected cable pricing, he concludes that their impact now has little or no affect on cable pricing. (Hr'g Tr. 288-89.) See infra note 24.

[21] GRS is an acronym of the method's creators' last names, Patrick Greenlee, David Reitman, and Davis S. Sibley, who began a working paper in 2004 and ultimately published their method in 2008. Patrick Greenlee, David Reitman & Davis S. Sibley, An Antitrust Analysis of Bundled Loyalty Discounts, 26 Int'l J. Indus. Org. 1132, 1132 (2008).

Dkt. No. 160, at 37; Hr'g Tr. 74.) The GRS Test seeks to distinguish procompetitive bundles from anticompetitive bundles, from a consumer-welfare focus. (Hr'g Tr. 75.) Utilizing this methodology, Dr. Singer concluded that Cox's bundle of premium cable and set-top box rental was anticompetitive and that Cox customers were overcharged for the set-top boxes they rented. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160, at 37.)

At the recent hearing, the parties' respective expert economists debated at length the appropriateness of applying the GRS Test in this case. Prior to the Supreme Court's decision in Wal-Mart, Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, __ U.S. __, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011), the Court would have left Dr. Burtis's critiques of Dr. Singer's application of this method for resolution [*60] at the Daubert [22] motion stage. However, the Supreme Court recently suggested in dicta that Daubert applied to expert testimony at the class certification stage. [23] Id. at 2553-54 ("The District Court concluded that Daubert did not apply to expert testimony at the certification stage of class-action proceedings. We doubt this is so . . . .") (citation omitted). Therefore, the Court will evaluate Dr. Singer's use of the GRS Test in light of the requirements outlined in Daubert and its progeny.

Federal Rule of Evidence 702 provides:

> A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:
> (a) the expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;
> (b) the testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;
> (c) the testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and
> (d) the expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case.

Courts function as gatekeepers to ensure that all expert testimony admitted at trial is both relevant and reliable. Dodge v. Cotter Corp., 328 F.3d 1212, 1221 (10th Cir. 2003). The proponent of an expert bears the burden of demonstrating that the requisite admissibility requirements are met by a preponderance of the evidence. Fed. R. Evid. 702 advisory committee's note.

This gatekeeping role necessitates a two-part inquiry. Norris v. Baxter Healthcare Corp., 397 F.3d 878, 883 (10th Cir. 2005). First, courts [*62] must "'determine if the expert's proffered testimony . . . has "a reliable basis in the knowledge and experience of his discipline."'" Id. at 883-84 (quoting Bitler v. A.O. Smith Corp., 391 F.3d 1114, 1120 (10th Cir. 2004)). At this stage of the analysis, courts must conduct a preliminary inquiry into the expert's qualifications and the admissibility of the proffered evidence. Bitler, 391 F.3d at 1120. This entails an examination of "'whether the reasoning or methodology underlying the testimony is scientifically valid.'" Id. (quoting Daubert, 509 U.S. at 592-93). Second, courts must "inquire into whether proposed testimony is sufficiently 'relevant to the task at hand.'" Norris, 397 F.3d at 884 (quoting Daubert, 509 U.S. at 597). Here, courts examine whether the proposed testimony is logically related to a material issue and whether it would aid the trier of fact. Id. at n.2; Bitler, 391 F.3d at 1121. To assess the reliability of proffered expert testimony, courts should consider, among others, the following factors:

> (1) whether the opinion at issue is susceptible to testing and has been subjected to such testing; (2) whether the opinion has been subjected to peer review; (3) whether [*63] there is a known or potential rate of error

Dodge, 328 F.3d at 1222. Rather than assessing the reliability of an expert's conclusions, courts should instead focus on the methodology and reasoning employed. Id. The Court's function as gatekeeper does not replace the adversary system, and "the rejection of expert testimony is the exception rather than the rule." Fed. R. Evid. 702 advisory committee's note.

Dr. Singer is a well-qualified economist, which Defendant does not dispute. [24] The GRS Test estimates the overcharge Cox customers paid on set-top boxes by determining the difference between the actual price paid by Cox customers and the price Cox customers would have paid absent the alleged tie, in the but-for world. (Pls.' Br. Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 13, at 63.) The proposed aggregate damages are the overcharge times the number of set-top boxes rented. (Id.)

Defendant argues that this test was created for use when a monopolist bundles rebates and that application of the GRS Test is only appropriate when the subject firm is a monopolist, which Cox is not. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 61.) Plaintiffs counter that the GRS Test can be utilized when the subject firm faces a downward sloping demand curve for the tying product and the purchaser purchases multiple units of the tying product. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209, at 31-32.) Whether this test can be utilized in tying cases, and under what conditions, is an open question. See Patrick Greenlee, David Reitman & Davis S. Sibley, An Antitrust Analysis of Bundled Loyalty Discounts, 26 Int'l J. Indus. Econ. 1132, 1132 (2008) (finding that it is an "open question" whether their test applies in tying cases). While the test may be new, it was promulgated by serious economists who are experts in their field, peer reviewed, published and discussed in economic literature, [25] and previously used in other litigation. [26] These discussions, however, were in the context of a monopoly, which is not present here. Whether Dr. Singer's application of the GRS Test [*65] satisfies the requirements of Daubert is not easily resolved. However, because application of the GRS Test cannot be based on evidence common to the class, resolution at this point is unnecessary.

Whether the GRS Test can be utilized with common evidence is a separate issue. To implement this method, Dr. Singer relied on Cox's data on cable costs, academic estimates of elasticities of demand for premium cable service, and the Lerner equation to estimate the but-for price of premium cable. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 160 Ex. 13 at 117.) The two elasticities of demand upon which Dr. Singer relies are not Cox specific and were estimated in academic writings in 2001 and 2004 respectively. (Id. Muris et al., Antitrust and Bundled Discounts: An Experimental Analysis—A Reply, 77 Antitrust L.J. 683 (2011) (responding to Greenlee, Reitman, and Sibley's response).

[26] Dr. Singer previously applied the GRS Test in a § 2 monopoly case involving the sale of antiviral drugs. Meijer, Inc. v. Abbott Labs., No. C 07-5985 CW, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 78219, 2008 WL 4065839, at *1, (N.D. Cal. Aug. 27, 2008). In granting the class certification motion, the court determined that "Plaintiffs intend[ed] to prove the fact of injury to [*66] the class by evidence that [was] predominately generalized. In addition, Dr. Singer's conclusion that class members paid more, not the same or less, for at least some purchases of Norvir and Kaletra following Abbott's price increases, [was] eminently plausible." Id. at *9. Whether the court relied upon Dr. Singer's application of the GRS Test specifically is not known, since the court does not explicitly reference the GRS Test and Dr. Singer proffered other elements to determine proof of impact. (Hr'g Tr. 284 ("Q. So did your expert report in the Norvir case contain any other proof of impact other than the GRS test? A. There might have been other elements to it . . . .").)

(2001), and Austan Goolsbee & Amil Petrin, The Consumer Gains from Direct Broadcast Satellites and the Competition with Cable TV, 72 Econometrica 351 (2004)); Hr'g Tr. 134.)

Defendant argues that the elasticity of demand varies in different parts of the country and requires individualized market data to prove, not common evidence. (Hr'g Tr. 134-35.) And Plaintiffs' expert agreed. [27] (Id.) Because the elasticity of demand depends on the extent of competition in the market, which varies regionally, application of this factor in the GRS Test would not be conducive to evidence common to the class.

Plaintiffs expert also proffers another method for calculating aggregate damages, called the Benchmark method, where he compares rental rates of set-top boxes in the United States to rates in Canada. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209, at 37-38.) Defendant contends that this method is inappropriate given Dr. Singer's failure to evaluate the different Canadian and American regulations and the different costs of Canadian and American cable providers. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 66-67.) In light of the failure to consider the differences regarding regulations and costs imposed on Canadian and American cable providers, the application of the Benchmark method rests on unstable ground. However, due to the lack of common evidence regarding Plaintiffs' proffered method of determining [*69] injury, whether this method satisfies Daubert need not presently be determined. Additionally, different geographic regions are subject to different levels of pricing regulation by the FCC, which Defendant intends to raise as a defense against Plaintiffs' claims, and which requires further inquiry that cannot be established with common evidence. [28]

While doubts regarding whether certification is appropriate should be resolved in favor of certification, [*71] before named Plaintiffs may proceed as a class, they must show that Rule 23's requirements have in fact been satisfied. [29] See Esplin v. Hirschi, 402 F.2d 94, 99 (10th Cir. 1968) (stating that "if there is to be an error made, let it be in favor

[27] At the class certification hearing on redirect, Plaintiffs' expert attempted to minimize the impact of this by stating that "in the worst-case scenario, at most [he] could envision two implementations of the GRS test," one for markets with telcos and another for markets without telcos. (Hr'g Tr. 278.) Plaintiffs' insistence that such variations can be glossed over for present purposes is unpersuasive given that the determination of telcos' impact on cable [*68] pricing must be made regionally. As support for his conclusion that telcos do not impact cable pricing, Dr. Singer cites a 2011 FCC report. (Id.) FCC reports, however, calculate impact with pricing data provided by cable operators at rate card prices, not limited term prices, which vary regionally and temporally. (Hr'g Tr. 291-92.) Accordingly, determining the impact of telcos on cable pricing would require regional analysis.

[28] Defendant asserts that Plaintiffs' claims are barred, in whole or in part, because the complained-of conduct is regulated by the FCC. Crumley v. Time Warner Cable, 556 F.3d 879 (8th Cir. 2009); see Coll v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 642 F.3d 876, 890 (10th Cir. 2011) ("'[T]he focus for determining whether the filed rate doctrine applies is the impact the court's decision will have on agency procedures and rate determinations.' The dispositive question, then, is whether, if plaintiffs succeed on their damages claims, the court's determination will impact the agency's rate determinations. If so, the 'filed rate' doctrine will bar the claim." (quoting H.J. Inc. v. Nw. Bell Tel. Co., 954 F.2d 485, 489 (8th Cir. 1992))). Pursuant to FCC Form 1205, set-top box prices are regulated in communities where "cable systems . . . are not subject to such [*70] effective competition." 47 U.S.C. § 543(b)(3); 47 C.F.R. §§ 76.905(a), 76.910, 76.933.

Plaintiffs contend that this defense is not applicable because the complained-of conduct is tying, not overcharging on set-top box rentals. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209, at 38-39.) But Defendant raises this defense regarding Plaintiffs' alleged antitrust impact. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 49.) And Plaintiffs admit that if valid, determination of whether class members lived in regulated or nonregulated areas, or if any class member moved between the two during the relevant time period, would need to be made. (Pls.' Br., Dkt. No. 209, at 41 ("In the unlikely event that a class member moved to an unregulated area during the class period, then damages would be allowed only for the time that he or she leased a STB in an unregulated area. The only information relevant to this determination is the geographic location of the class members.").) But this inquiry could not be done with evidence common to the class, individual determinations of who lived where during the relevant time period would be required.

[29] Despite Defendant's questioning whether this doctrine survived the recent Supreme Court's decision Wal-Mart v. Duke, ___ U.S. ___, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011), until otherwise informed, the Court still finds it relevant. (Def.'s Br., Dkt. No. 181, at 23.) See *Lewis v. Alexander, 276 F.R.D. 421, __, 2011 WL 3678721, at 25 (E.D. Pa. Aug. 22, 2011) (applying this doctrine post-Wal-Mart); *Hershey v. ExxonMobil Oil Corp., No. 07-1300-JTM, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36317, 2011 WL 1234883, at 3-4 (D. Kan. Mar. 31, 2011) (finding this doctrine relevant three [*72] months prior to Wal-Mart); *Clay v. Pelle, No. 10-cv-01840-WYD-BNB, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 27630, 2011 WL 843920, at *1 (D. Colo. and not against the maintenance of the class action"). Because market power and antitrust injury are not amenable to proof with common evidence, Plaintiffs have not met their burden of establishing that common issues predominate pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3). Additionally, in light of the multiple regional analysis required to determine market power and impact, maintaining a class action on a national level would not be manageable.

V. CONCLUSION

Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have not met their burden of showing this case should proceed as a class action, and, therefore, Plaintiffs' Motion for Class Certification (Dkt. No. 160) is DENIED.

IT IS SO ORDERED this 28th day of December, 2011.

HN1[] Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices, Predatory Pricing

In cases in which a single firm, having a dominant share of the relevant market, cuts its prices in order to force competitors out of the market, or perhaps to deter potential entrants from coming in, "predatory pricing" means pricing below some appropriate measure of cost.

HN2[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

On a motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), courts are required to accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party. Contradictory factual assertions on the part of defendants must be ignored. Courts must determine whether, under any reasonable reading of the complaint, the plaintiff may be entitled to relief. But, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Determining whether the allegations in a complaint are plausible is a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. Courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions draped in the guise of factual allegations.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN3[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

While antitrust complaints are to be liberally construed, they are not altogether exempt from the federal rules. A pleading that offers labels and conclusions or a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do. Additionally, in evaluating a plaintiff's claims, generally a court looks only to the facts alleged in the complaint and its attachments without reference to other parts of the record.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN4[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In Twombly, the U.S. Supreme Court has set forth the plausibility standard for overcoming a motion to dismiss. It refined this approach in Iqbal. A complaint satisfies the plausibility standard when the factual pleadings allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. This standard requires showing more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. A complaint that pleads facts merely consistent with a defendant's liability, stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement of relief.

Civil Procedure > ... > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss > Failure to State Claim

HN5[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

To determine the sufficiency of a complaint under Twombly and Iqbal, the court must take the following three steps: First, the court must take note of the elements a plaintiff must plead to state a claim. Second, the court should identify allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Finally, where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Sherman Act

HN8[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

Plaintiffs asserting a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim must allege four elements: (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted actions were illegal; and (4) that it was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action. Existence of a contract, combination or conspiracy is the hallmark of a § 1 claim. Over the years, courts have limited their attention to two essential elements: (1) that the defendant was a party to a contract, combination or conspiracy and (2) that the conspiracy to which the defendant was a party imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN9[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

As to the first element of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim, plaintiffs must establish the existence of an agreement or concerted action, and therefore, in order to state a claim for conspiracy to engage in predatory pricing, a plaintiff must plead that the defendant and co-conspirators conspired to price below some measure of cost. Unilateral activity by a defendant, no matter the motivation, cannot give rise to a § 1 violation. An agreement exists when there is a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, a meeting of the minds, or a conscious commitment to a common scheme.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN10[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

In the context of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim, a plaintiff may plead an agreement by alleging direct or circumstantial evidence, or a combination of the two. Direct evidence of a conspiracy is evidence that is explicit and requires no inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted. Direct evidence of conspiracy, if credited, removes any ambiguities that might otherwise exist with respect to whether the parallel conduct in question is the result of independent or concerted action. If a complaint includes non-conclusory allegations of direct evidence of an agreement, a court need go no further on the question of whether an agreement has been adequately pled.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN11[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

In its evaluation of circumstantial evidence in an antitrust case, a court must apply special considerations so that only reasonable inferences are drawn from the evidence. The reason is that antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 case.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Cartels & Horizontal Restraints > Price Fixing

HN12[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

Certainly, an actionable horizontal conspiracy does not require direct communication among the competitors. But a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim of conspiracy predicated on parallel conduct should be dismissed if common economic experience, or facts alleged in a complaint itself, show that independent self-interest is an obvious alternative explanation for defendants' common behavior. Thus some courts have denominated certain factors which, if present, may indicate the existence of a conspiratorial agreement. These factors include: (1) evidence that the defendant had a motive to enter into a conspiracy; (2) evidence that the defendant acted contrary to its interests; and (3) 'evidence implying a traditional conspiracy. Courts have cautioned that the first two factors may indicate that defendants operate in an oligopolistic market, and because such a market contains very few sellers, each defendant would be aware of each other's actions. Evidence of action that is against self-interest or motivated by profit must go beyond mere interdependence. Evidence of the third factor is non-economic evidence that there was an actual, manifest agreement not to compete, which may include proof that the defendants got together and exchanged assurances of common action or otherwise adopted a common plan even though no meetings, conversations, or exchanged documents are shown.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN13[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

The second element of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 claim, an unreasonable restraint on trade, is analyzed under either the per se standard or the rule of reason standard. The per se illegality rule applies when a business practice on its face, has no purpose except stifling competition. A per se rule is applied when the practice facially appears to be one that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output. Agreements that fall under established per se illegality categories are conclusively presumed to unreasonably restrain competition. Paradigmatic examples are horizontal agreements among competitors to fix prices or to divide markets. Per se illegality is reserved for only those agreements that are so plainly anticompetitive that no elaborate study of the industry is needed to establish their illegality.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN14[] Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason, Sherman Act

Plaintiffs pleading exclusively per se violations, as opposed to pleading rule of reason violations in the alternative — must be careful. If the court determines that the restraint at issue is sufficiently different from the per se archetypes to require application of the rule of reason, the plaintiff's claims will be dismissed. This is particularly true with certain restraints of trade that are highly suspicious yet sufficiently idiosyncratic that judicial experience with them is limited. In those cases, per se condemnation is inappropriate, but at the same time, the "inherently suspect" nature of the restraint obviates the sort of elaborate industry analysis required by the traditional rule-of-reason standard.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Per Se Rule & Rule of Reason > Sherman Act

HN15[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

The rule of reason is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of 15 U.S.C.S. § 1. Under this rule, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition. Appropriate factors to take into account include specific information about the relevant business and the restraint's history, nature, and effect. Whether the businesses involved have market power is a further, significant consideration. In its design and function the rule distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and restraints stimulating competition that are in the consumer's best interest.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

HN16[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

Under the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit's three-step analysis of whether a plaintiff has sufficiently pled the conspiracy element of its predatory price-fixing theory, the Court begins by taking note of the elements of a conspiracy claim under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, which are (1) the existence of an agreement to engage in the alleged scheme, such as predatory (i.e., below-rate) price fixing and (2) that the conspiracy imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

HN17[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

To sufficiently plead the conspiracy element of its predatory price-fixing theory, a plaintiff must show the existence of an agreement among members of the conspiracy demonstrating a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, a meeting of the minds, or a conscious commitment to a common scheme. The unity of purpose must point to the common scheme alleged in the complaint. In the antitrust context, "predatory" means pricing below some measure of cost. To prevail on a predatory pricing claim, a plaintiff must demonstrate that the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs. In a typical predatory-pricing scheme, the predator reduces the sale price of its product (its output) to below cost, hoping to drive competitors out of business. The mechanism by which a firm engages in predatory pricing—lowering prices—is the same mechanism by which a firm stimulates competition; because cutting prices in order to increase business often is the very essence of competition, mistaken inferences are especially costly, because they chill the very conduct the antitrust laws are designed to protect.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN18[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

To sufficiently plead a conspiracy under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1, a plaintiff must plausibly allege that the conspirators agreed to enter a price fixing agreement for the purpose of pricing below a measure of cost. A party's failure to allege specifics as to the entrance and object of the agreement will lead to the dismissal of a conspiracy claim. In many cases where an agreement exists, parallel conduct—such as setting prices at the same level—is precisely the concerted action that is the conspiracy's object. Accordingly, the complaint must define the object of the horizontal agreement alleged in the complaint. The illegal object of a Sherman Act conspiracy must be identified in terms of an intended or achieved effect upon commerce in a relevant market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

HN19[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

At step two of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit's three-step analysis of whether a plaintiff has sufficiently pled the conspiracy element of its predatory price-fixing theory, the court identifies allegations that—without factual support—would not be entitled to the assumption of truth because they would be no more than mere conclusions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Actual Monopolization > Anticompetitive & Predatory Practices > Predatory Pricing

HN20[] Conspiracy to Monopolize, Elements

Step three of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit's three-step analysis of whether a plaintiff has sufficiently pled the conspiracy element of its predatory price-fixing theory is to determine whether the bare allegations are echoed elsewhere in the complaint by well-pled allegations, and whether those allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN24[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

The offense of monopoly has two elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN25[] Actual Monopolization, Monopoly Power

As to the first element of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 monopoly claim, the U.S. Supreme Court has defined "monopoly power" as the power to control prices or exclude competition. The existence of such power ordinarily may be inferred from the predominant share of the market.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN26[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

Monopoly power may be proven by direct or indirect evidence. The existence of monopoly power may be proven through direct evidence of supracompetitive prices and restricted output. To support an inference of monopoly power, a plaintiff typically must plead and prove that a firm has a dominant share in a relevant market, and that significant entry barriers protect that market. Barriers to entry are factors, such as regulatory requirements, high capital costs, or technological obstacles, which prevent new competition from entering a market in response to a monopolist's supracompetitive prices. Without barriers to entry it would presumably be impossible to maintain supracompetitive prices for an extended time.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN27[] Actual Monopolization, Monopoly Power

Proving the existence of monopoly power through indirect evidence requires a definition of the relevant market. The scope of the market is a question of fact as to which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof. Competing products are in the same market if they are readily substitutable for one another; a market's outer boundaries are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use between a product and its substitute, or by their cross-elasticity of demand. Failure to define the proposed relevant market in these terms may result in dismissal of the complaint (or claim).

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN28[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

As to the second element of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 claim, the acquisition or possession of monopoly power must be accompanied by some anticompetitive conduct on the part of the possessor. Anticompetitive conduct may take a variety of forms, but it is generally defined as conduct to obtain or maintain monopoly power as a result of competition on some basis other than the merits. Conduct that impairs the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way may be deemed anticompetitive. Conduct that merely harms competitors, however, while not harming the competitive process itself, is not anticompetitive. It is axiomatic that the antitrust laws were passed for the protection of competition, not competitors.

It is possible for a plaintiff to unsuccessfully plead a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 conspiracy claim but sufficiently plead a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 unilateral action claim in the same complaint.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

HN30[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

A sufficient pleading of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 claim requires something more, which may include the barriers to entry, the nature of the anticompetitive conduct, and the elasticity of consumer demand.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

HN31[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

It is true that a one-year contract, taken alone, does not violate the antitrust laws. However,a court should consider a defendant's anticompetitive conduct as a whole rather than considering each aspect in isolation.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Monopoly Power

HN32[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

The second element of a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 claim requires a showing of maintenance of the monopoly power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident. Conduct that would satisfy this element includes conduct that would foreclose competition, allow the defendant to gain a competitive advantage, or destroy a competitor.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Complaints > Requirements for Complaint

HN33[] Complaints, Requirements for Complaint

Pleading contradictory facts to support different claims is grounds for dismissal of those claims.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN34[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

To state a claim for attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must establish (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Conspiracy to Monopolize > Elements

HN35[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

As to the first element of a claim for attempted monopolization, a firm engages in anticompetitive conduct when it attempts to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency or when it competes on some basis other than the merits. Conduct that impairs the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way may be deemed anticompetitive. "Anticompetitive conduct" can come in too many different forms, and is too dependent upon context, for any court or commentator ever to have enumerated all the varieties. Allegations raised under 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 may be a proper basis on which to predicate a 15 U.S.C.S. § 2 claim.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN36[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

As to the second element of a claim for attempted monopolization—specific intent to monopolize--a mere intention to prevail over rivals or improve market position is insufficient. Even an intent to perform acts that can be objectively viewed as tending toward the acquisition of monopoly power is insufficient, unless it also appears that the acts were not predominantly motivated by legitimate business aims. Direct evidence of specific intent need not be shown; it may be inferred from predatory or exclusionary conduct.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Attempts to Monopolize > Elements

HN37[] Attempts to Monopolize, Elements

As to the third element of a claim for attempted monopolization, a dangerous probability of monopoly may exist where the defendant firm possesses a significant market share when it undertakes the challenged anticompetitive conduct. However, alleging market share alone is insufficient to properly plead attempted monopolization. A sufficient pleading requires something more, which may include the strength of competition, probable development of the industry, the barriers to entry, the nature of the anti-competitive conduct, and the elasticity of consumer demand. The existence of monopoly power may be proven through direct evidence of supracompetitive prices and restricted output.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > Leave of Court

HN38[] Amendment of Pleadings, Leave of Court

Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2) allows a party to amend its pleading by leave of court when justice so requires. Leave to amend pleadings is to be freely given. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). The decision to grant leave to amend rests within the discretion of the court. Leave to amend may be denied on the basis of undue delay or bad faith. Only when these factors suggest that amendment would be unjust should the court deny leave.

Civil Procedure > ... > Pleadings > Amendment of Pleadings > Leave of Court

HN39[] Amendment of Pleadings, Leave of Court

In determining whether an amendment should be denied for undue delay, the court must focus on the plaintiffs' motives for not amending their complaint to assert the proposed claim earlier. There is no presumptive period in which a motion for leave to amend is deemed timely or in which delay becomes undue. The passage of time, without more, does not require that a motion to amend a complaint be denied; however, at some point, the delay will become undue, placing an unwarranted burden on the court. Delay may become undue when a movant has had previous opportunities to amend the complaint. In other words, the court should also consider whether new information came to light or was available earlier to the moving party.

HN40[] Amendment of Pleadings, Leave of Court

Allegations of bad faith must pertain to plaintiff's motives for not amending sooner, not to plaintiff's alleged litigation strategy. The question of undue delay, as well as the question of bad faith, requires that the court focus on the plaintiffs' motives for not amending their complaint to assert this claim earlier; the issue of prejudice requires that we focus on the effect on the defendants.

SALAS, DISTRICT JUDGE

This matter is before the Court by way of Bankrate Inc.'s ("Bankrate") Motion to Dismiss BanxCorp's Fourth Amended Complaint ("4AC") pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). (D.E. 210). This Court has jurisdiction pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331 and 1337(a), as well as 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2. Venue is proper pursuant to 28 U.S.C. §§ 1391(b), (b)(2), as well as 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 and 22. The Court's decision is based on its review of the briefs and exhibits related to Bankrate's motion to dismiss, and the Court hereby decides the motion without oral argument pursuant [*2] to Fed. R. Civ. P. 78. For the following reasons, Defendant's motion to dismiss is GRANTED as to the First Claim and DENIED as to the Second, Third, and Fifth claims.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Parties and Claims

The underlying issue in this case is whether Defendant Bankrate has engaged in anticompetitive practices in violation of federal and state antitrust laws, resulting in economic injury to Plaintiff BanxCorp.

BanxCorp is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Delaware with its office located in Scarsdale, New York. (4AC, D.E. 204 ¶ 1). Plaintiff owns and operates the website BanxQuote.com. (Id. ¶ 1). "From its inception in 1984 until the present, Plaintiff has done business under the trade name and registered trademark 'BanxQuote.'" (Id.). BanxCorp is a provider of bank rate tables listing interest rates from financial institutions. (Compl., D.E. 1 ¶ 14). It publishes those rates in print as well as online. (Def. Moving Br., D.E. 7 at 5, 7).

Defendant Bankrate is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of Delaware, with its principal executive offices located in North Palm Beach, Florida. [1] (4AC ¶ 2). Primarily, Bankrate publishes financial data and advice online, [*3] controlling numerous websites that aggregate financial information. (Def. Moving Br., D.E. 210 at 6). It also owns and operates FastFind.com, a lead rate aggregation company. (Def. Moving Br. at 5). Individually and in partnership with various major website operators, Bankrate also operates websites on which financial institutions such as banks and mortgage brokers list their rates for various financial products, including certificates of deposit and mortgage notes. When consumers visit these websites—such as Bankrate's own Bankrate.com—to view the rates, they are able to click on the name of the financial institution listing the rate in order to get more information or transact business with the financial institution. (4AC ¶¶ 36-49).

BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate, with its co-branding partners or its distributors, has engaged in price-fixing, predatory price-fixing, and exclusionary conduct that would guarantee Bankrate a monopoly in the Bank Rate Website market. [2] (Id. ¶¶ 279-297). Its alleged partners [*4] in these schemes—its network—include approximately [1] On September 28, 2011, this Court entered an Order substituting Bankrate, Inc., a Delaware Corporation, as successor-in-interest to Bankrate, Inc., a Florida Corporation. (D.E. 282).

130 co-branding partners, which together control more than 300 partner sites that compete against each other and against Bankrate.com. (Id. ¶ 19). These partner-competitors include, among others, Dow Jones & Co., The New York Times, CNBC, CNN, MSNBC, Fox News, AOL, and Move Inc. (Id. ¶ 20). Plaintiff alleges that the co-branding partnership agreements granted Defendant the sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings to its customers on the Internet at the same price on behalf of Defendant's "network," first on a flat fee basis (from the late 1990s until October 1, 2005), and after October 1, 2005, on a cost-per-click ("CPC") basis. (Id. ¶ 21). According to BanxCorp, "CPC or Cost-Per-Click is a fee paid by customers—the financial service providers—to list their rates on a Bank Rate Website. CPC transactions are consummated and charged every time an end user—a consumer—clicks on a hyperlinked rate listing at a Bank Rate Website." (Id. ¶ 21 n.3).

BanxCorp further alleges that since the late 1990s, Bankrate began giving away free rate listings to financial service providers and commingling free rate listings with paid rate listings, allowing Bankrate to charge far less than its competitors, often at a loss. (Id. ¶ 19). This alleged predatory pricing [3] essentially left most competitors with one of two choices: either exit the market or join Bankrate's network. (Id. ¶ 22). As Bankrate's predatory pricing scheme became effective, its network grew and some competitors, including BanxCorp, were left behind.

B. Procedural History

This case has a lengthy procedural history. BanxCorp originally filed suit against Bankrate on July 20, 2007, alleging violations of federal and state antitrust laws based on various types of anticompetitive conduct. (Compl., D.E. 1 ¶ 14). That complaint alleged exclusive dealing, bundling, tie-in, and predatory pricing in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. (Id. ¶¶ 167-196). The Court ordered BanxCorp to amend the complaint to address significant deficiencies in its definition of the relevant market. See *BanxCorp v. Bankrate, Inc. ("BanxCorp I"), 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51756, 15 (D.N.J. July 7, 2008) (D.E. 20). It also granted leave to amend the bundling, tie-in, and LendingTree theories. *2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51756 at 31. [4]

On August 21, 2008, BanxCorp filed its First Amended Complaint. ("1AC", D.E. 25). Subsequently, before the Court could rule on the pending motion to dismiss, BanxCorp withdrew that complaint and filed its Second Amended Complaint ("2AC", D.E. 37), alleging predatory price-fixing, exclusive dealing, bundling, vendor lock-in, and tie-in arrangements with competitors or distributors, as well as monopoly and attempted monopolization. (2AC ¶¶ 114-146). In a September 14, 2009 opinion, the court granted BanxCorp leave to correct deficiencies in its market definition "one final time" and "one—and only one—" opportunity to correct deficiencies in its tying, bundling, and vendor lock-in theories. See *BanxCorp v. Bankrate, Inc. ("BanxCorp II"), 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84151, 9 (D.N.J. Sept. 14, 2009) [*8] (D.E. 75). The Court then stated that "[l]eave is not granted to amend portions of the complaint

[2] As defined by BanxCorp, the Bank Rate Website market "is the market for fee-based aggregated bank rate table listings with interactive functionalities on the Internet. It [*5] is often referred to as the 'Internet-based consumer banking marketplace,' or, simply, bank rate websites ("Bank Rate Websites"). The relevant geographic market for Bank Rate Websites is the whole of the United States." (4AC ¶¶ 35-36). These websites provide services and products similar to those offered by Bankrate, as described above. See Part I.A.

[3] Throughout this Opinion, the Court refers to "predatory pricing" or "predatory price-fixing." "This term has been used chiefly in cases in which a single firm, having a dominant share of the relevant market, cuts its prices in order to force competitors out of the market, or perhaps [*6] to deter potential entrants from coming in." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co., Ltd. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585 n.8, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986) (citation omitted). HN1[ ] "In such cases, 'predatory pricing' means pricing below some appropriate measure of cost." Id. (citation omitted).

[4] In this action and a related action, BanxCorp v. LendingTree LLC, No. 10-2467, BanxCorp alleged that in 2007, Bankrate "entered into an anticompetitive agreement with LendingTree, a competitor with a dominant position [*7] in the mortgage lead generation and aggregation ('Mortgage Lead Aggregation') market. Defendant and Lending Tree combined, conspired to form a cartel, and agreed to divide and allocate revenues, Internet traffic and clicks, customers, accounts, and products in the savings sub-market for Bank Rate Websites, in exchange for revenues, Internet traffic and clicks in the Mortgage Lead Aggregation market." (4AC ¶ 27).

not addressed in this Opinion." *2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84151 at 12. The Court held that the price-fixing and exclusive dealing theories were adequately pled. *2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84151 at 9.

On October 19, 2009, BanxCorp filed its Third Amended Complaint ("3AC", D.E. 82), abandoning its tying and bundling theories but elaborating on its massive price-fixing conspiracy theory, the new centerpiece of BanxCorp's lawsuit. (3AC ¶¶ 15, 116-149). It alleged a conspiracy between Bankrate and more than 100 co-branding partners that also allegedly entered into improper exclusive dealing relationships with Bankrate. (Id. ¶ 280-287).

Discovery commenced in 2009 and is ongoing. (See Sept. 1, 2011 Letter Order re: Pretrial Scheduling, D.E. 280). During discovery, "thousands" of documents have changed hands. (Def. Moving. Br. at 9). On July 13, 2010, Judge Wigenton denied Bankrate's motion to dismiss the 3AC. See BanxCorp v. Bankrate, Inc. ("July 13, 2010 Order") (D.N.J. Sept. 14, 2009) (D.E. 121).

On April 1, 2011, BanxCorp filed its 4AC (D.E. 204)—the complaint at issue in the instant motion—in which BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate consciously engaged [*9] in (1) illegal restraint of trade in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1; (2) illegal mergers and acquisitions in violation of § 7 of the Clayton Act; and (3) conspiracy in restraint of trade in violation of § 56:9-3 of the New Jersey Antitrust Act, N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:9-1 et seq. (4AC ¶¶ 279-313). In the 4AC, BanxCorp offers two theories of liability: (1) a predatory price-fixing conspiracy between Bankrate and its competitors, pursuant to which the parties allegedly conspired to set prices charged to financial institutions for rate table listings below Bankrate's average variable cost; and (2) exclusionary conduct based on Bankrate's contractual exclusive right to sell rate table listings for inclusion on rate tables that appear on co-branded web pages of online media outlets. (4AC ¶ 280).

Subsequently, on April 11, 2011, Defendant Bankrate filed this motion pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6) for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. (D.E. 210). Specifically, Bankrate seeks an order dismissing: the First Claim for Relief (§ 1 of the Sherman Act), except as it pertains to alleged agreements with LendingTree LLC; the Second and Third Claims [10] for Relief (§ 2 of the Sherman Act*) except as they pertain to alleged predatory pricing based on Bankrate's switch to cost-per-click pricing; and the Fifth Claim for Relief (the New Jersey Antitrust Act) consistent with Claims 1 through 3. [5] (Def. Moving Br. at 1).

For the following reasons, Defendant's motion to dismiss is granted as to the First Claim and denied as to the Second, Third, and Fifth claims.

C. Arguments

Bankrate argues that BanxCorp's predatory price-fixing conspiracy and exclusive dealing claims are new claims never raised before and must therefore be dismissed because [*11] they violate Judge Wigenton's September 14, 2009 opinion and order in this case. These claims, Defendant argues, are not based on newly discovered evidence or facts learned during the course of discovery. (Id. at 3-4).

Bankrate also argues that the predatory price-fixing claim is legally defective. First, BanxCorp fails to allege that any of Bankrate's co-conspirators agreed with Bankrate to set prices below cost in order to drive out competition. Second, BanxCorp fails to provide any evidence that Bankrate priced its product below average variable cost or even market value. Third, the claim is based on contradictory and conclusory allegations. Fourth, the predatory pricing theory is economically implausible, or makes no economic sense, and should therefore be dismissed on that basis alone. (Id. at 13-20).

[5] Bankrate's only reference to the New Jersey antitrust claims is the following: "Bankrate respectfully seeks an Order, pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), dismissing . . . the Fifth Claim for Relief (the New Jersey Antitrust Act) consistent with Counts One through Three." (Def. Moving Br. at 1). Bankrate never revisits the New Jersey claims in its moving papers, and does not provide any guidance on whether analysis under the New Jersey statutes would be the same as under the federal statutes. In light of the foregoing, the Court will not address the sufficiency of the pleading as to the New Jersey claims.

Next, Bankrate argues that the exclusionary conduct claim is equally legally defective. First, BanxCorp seemingly makes two contradictory statements. For purposes of the price-fixing claim, it alleges that the co-conspirators are also competitors; for purposes of the exclusionary dealing claim, it alleges that they are "distribution channels" for the product. These two distinct characterizations [*12] are, according to Bankrate, mutually exclusive. Further, even if the two characterizations could be harmonized, BanxCorp fails to provide proof of market foreclosure—a necessary element of the claim. (Id. at 20-25).

Finally, Bankrate argues that the "new" predatory price-fixing conspiracy and exclusionary conduct theories were brought in bad faith and with undue delay and the claims should therefore be dismissed on that basis alone. (Id. at 25-31).

In response, Plaintiff BanxCorp asserts that the predatory price-fixing and exclusionary dealing claims are not new and were in fact raised in the 3AC. The claims are simply pled here with more particularity based on facts recently discerned through discovery, from documents that were secretly withheld by Defendant. (Pl. Opp. Br., D.E. 214 at 2-3, 29). Therefore, its claims were not brought in bad faith or with undue delay. (Id. at 32).

Further, BanxCorp argues that inquiries into purpose, power, and effects are unnecessary once a particular restraint has been found to be a per se violation of § 1. BanxCorp asks this Court to find that the price-fixing and exclusionary dealing claims are per se violations of § 1. (Id. at 7, 10-13).

Further, [*13] BanxCorp asks this Court to bifurcate the per se issues presented here because bifurcation will "greatly narrow the scope of discovery," "streamline the issues to be decided at trial," and "serve the interests of judicial economy. (Id. at 8). It also asks this Court for leave to file a motion for summary judgment as an alternative to converting Defendant's Motion to Dismiss to a summary judgment motion. (Id. at 9). Finally, it asks this Court to consolidate this action with BanxCorp v. LendingTree LLC, No. 10-2467 (D.N.J. June 2, 2005). (Id. at 32-34). Importantly, Plaintiff does not directly address any of Defendant's others arguments. The Court more specifically outlines and addresses the parties' arguments below.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

HN2[] On a motion to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6), "courts are required to accept all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true and draw all reasonable inferences in favor of the non-moving party." Phillips v. Cnty. of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 234 (3d Cir. 2008); Burrell v. DFS Servs., LLC, 753 F. Supp. 2d 438, 440 n.1 (D.N.J. Dec. 6, 2010) (holding that contradictory factual assertions on the part of defendants must be ignored). Courts must "determine [*14] whether, under any reasonable reading of the complaint, the Plaintiff may be entitled to relief." Pinker v. Roche Holdings, Ltd., 292 F.3d 361, 374 n.7 (3d Cir. 2002). But, a complaint "must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to 'state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'" Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). Determining whether the allegations in a complaint are "plausible" is "a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1950, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). "Courts are not required to credit bald assertions or legal conclusions draped in the guise of factual allegations." *McCargo v. Hall, No. 11-553, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 146449, 2011 WL 6725613, 1 (D.N.J. 2011) (citing In re Burlington Coat Factory Sec. Litig., 114 F.3d 1410, 1429 (3d Cir. 1997)). And HN3[] while antitrust complaints are to be liberally construed, they are not altogether exempt from the federal rules. See Com. of Pa. ex rel. Zimmerman v. PepsiCo, Inc., 836 F.2d 173, 179 (3d Cir. 1988) (citations omitted). A pleading that offers "labels and conclusions" or a "formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not [*15] do." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (citations omitted). Additionally, in evaluating a plaintiff's claims, generally "a court looks only to the facts alleged in the complaint and its attachments without reference to other parts of the record." Jordan v. Fox, Rothschild, O'Brien & Frankel, 20 F.3d 1250, 1261 (3d Cir. 1994).

HN4[] In Twombly, the Supreme Court set forth the "plausibility" standard for overcoming a motion to dismiss. It refined this approach in Iqbal. A complaint satisfies the plausibility standard when the factual pleadings "allow[] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. at 1949 (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). This standard requires showing "more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Id. A complaint that pleads facts "'merely consistent with a defendant's liability, stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement of relief.'" Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 557).

HN5[] To determine the sufficiency of a complaint under Twombly and Iqbal, the Court must take the following three steps:

> First, the court must "tak[e] note of the elements a plaintiff must [*16] plead to state a claim." Second, the court should identify allegations that, "because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth." Finally, "where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief."

Burtch v. Milberg Factors, Inc., 662 F.3d 212, 221 (3d Cir. 2011) (citations omitted).

The Court now proceeds with its analysis claim-by-claim, element-by-element under the three-step method set forth by the Third Circuit, granting the motion to dismiss as to the First Count based on Plaintiff's failure to plausibly allege the "object" of the conspiracy, and denying the motion to dismiss as to the Second, Third, and Fifth claims for relief.

With this standard in mind, the Court analyzes the parties' arguments on dismissal.

III. DISCUSSION

A. Threshold/Preliminary Matters

As a [*17] preliminary matter, Bankrate argues that BanxCorp's predatory pricing conspiracy and exclusive dealing claims are new claims, and therefore must be dismissed. BanxCorp responds that these claims were in fact discussed in the 3AC and are now being fleshed out based on new documents—some of them secretly withheld by Defendant—acquired through discovery after the filing of the 3AC. Notably, BanxCorp does not indicate which documents, when these documents were obtained, or what specific factual allegations they support in the 4AC. Under the following analysis, the Court finds that Plaintiff offers only a self-serving statement with nothing to support it.

Specifically, Bankrate argues that in the 3AC, BanxCorp alleged "that Bankrate and more than 100 online media outlets conspired to fix prices charged to financial institutions for hyperlinked interest rate table listings at above market levels." Now, according to Bankrate, Plaintiff abandons that theory and alleges "that Bankrate and more than 100 online media outlets conspired to charge below-cost prices for the advertising product at issue . . . for some (unidentified) period of time in order to drive competitors out of the market, then [*18] agreed to raise prices in order to recoup unidentified losses." (Def. Moving. Br. at 1-2). In other words, Bankrate argues that BanxCorp changed its theory from price-fixing to predatory pricing. This is simply not so.

The 3AC contains numerous paragraphs where its claim of predatory pricing, or pricing below average variable cost, is discussed in some detail. For example, BanxCorp alleges:

> Then, [Bankrate] secured CPC rate listing contracts with hundreds of financial service providers, most of them listing their rates exclusively on Bankrate.com and its network of Mirror Sites, by offering them predatory prices and free rate listings. It retained their loyalty and de-facto exclusivity by switching from a flat fee to a CPC system, and continued to price below its average variable cost—and at a significantly lower price than what any remaining competitor could afford to charge, because the volume of traffic on Bankrate-dot-com and its Mirror Sites was large enough that it generated significant long-term profits, allowing Defendant to quickly start recouping its earlier losses in excess of $53 million. (3AC ¶ 91) (emphasis added).

> A key to the development of its alleged monopoly was Bankrate's [*19] predatory pricing scheme. In order to survive, Plaintiff BanxQuote and any other remaining struggling competitors were left with only two undesirable options: either charge the same CPC as Bankrate—below any reasonably expected average variable or other measure of cost—while having less traffic to offer to potential advertisers, or charge a lower CPC than Bankrate and lose even more money on each transaction.

(Id. ¶ 102 (emphasis added); see also id. ¶¶ 19(e), 19(g), 223-230, 240, 246). Because the 3AC explicitly contains allegations of below-cost pricing, it cannot be said that claims in the 4AC allege below-cost pricing for the first time. [6]

Bankrate further argues that the exclusive dealing claim in the 4AC is new. According to Bankrate, in its 3AC, BanxCorp alleged that Defendant "entered into 'exclusive dealing' arrangements with those same online media outlets." (Def. Moving Br. at 1-2). In the 4AC, Plaintiff alleges that "Bankrate's contracts with the online media outlets resulted in exclusion of BanxCorp from necessary distribution outlets, and are thus violative of antitrust laws prohibiting exclusionary conduct." (Id. at 2). Below, in Part III.C, the Court more fully discusses the exclusionary conduct allegations in the 4AC; however, the Court briefly notes that it finds that the allegations made in the 4AC are similar to the ones made in the 3AC. (Compare 3AC ¶ 280 ("Bankrate has established de-facto exclusive dealing partnerships with approximately 100 co-branded Mirror Sites, thus foreclosing competition in the relevant market."), with 4AC ¶ 164 ("Defendant's 130 co-branding partnership agreements granted Bankrate the exclusive right to sell Internet rate table listings to financial service providers nationally[.] . . . Subsequently . . . independent competitors were driven [*21] out of the market . . . ."). On July 13, 2010, Judge Wigenton denied Bankrate's motion to dismiss, and therefore the claim survived. See BanxCorp v. Bankrate, Inc. ("July 13, 2010 Order") (D.N.J. Sept. 14, 2009) (D.E. 121).

Finally, Bankrate alleges that the claims in the 4AC are "new," and therefore violate Judge Wigenton's September 14, 2009 opinion and order prohibiting new claims and setting forth which claims could be amended and which could not. Based on its review of Judge Wigenton's opinion, the Court is satisfied that the claims at issue in this motion are not barred by that ruling, in which amendments were permitted to the "definition of the relevant market and related sub-markets, [as well as claims related to] tying, bundling, and vendor lock-in." Id. n.1. Judge Wigenton also found that the exclusive dealing claims were adequately pled. Additionally, Judge Wigenton found that predatory price-fixing was a theory BanxCorp raised in the 3AC, and she did not determine the sufficiency of these related claims. Therefore, as long as the predatory price-fixing and exclusionary conduct claims in the 4AC are not facially different from the claims in the 3AC, Judge Wigenton's order [*22] would not have precluded claims in the 4AC. Based on this Court's review, the predatory price-fixing and exclusionary conduct theories raised in the 3AC do not appear to be facially different from the theories raised in the 4AC, and therefore the Court finds that the claims raised in the 4AC do not violate the September 14, 2009 order. [7] The Court now proceeds to its primary analysis.

B. Sherman Act § 1: Contract or Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade

[6] Alternatively, Bankrate also argues—for the first time in its reply brief—that BanxCorp changed its theory from unilateral predatory pricing-fixing in the 3AC to a predatory price-fixing conspiracy in the 4AC. (See Def. Reply Br. at 5). Because Bankrate raises this argument on reply, the Court declines to address it here. See [Dana Transp., Inc. v. Ableco Fin., LLC, No. 04-2781, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18086, at *16 (D.N.J. Aug. 17, 2005)] (HN6[]) "The purpose of the reply brief is to respond to the opposition brief or explain a position that the respondent [*20] has refuted.") (citations omitted).

[7] The Court also notes that on April 5, 2011, Judge Arleo granted BanxCorp's motion to amend the 3AC. That order did not limit BanxCorp's ability to modify the claims in its 3AC or bring new claims. (See Order Granting Motion for Leave to File an Amended Complaint, D.E. 209).

BanxCorp brings its predatory price-fixing claim under § 1 of the Sherman Act. Section 1 provides: HN7[] "Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is declared to be illegal." 15 U.S.C. § 1. Thus, HN8[] plaintiffs asserting a § 1 claim "must allege four elements: '(1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced [*23] anti-competitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted actions were illegal; and (4) that it was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action.'" Howard Hess Dental Labs. Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 602 F.3d 237, 253 (3d Cir. 2010). Existence of a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy" is the hallmark of a § 1 claim. In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 315 (3d Cir. 2010) (citations omitted). Over the years, courts have limited their attention to two essential elements: (1) that the defendant was a party to a "contract, combination . . . or conspiracy" and (2) that the conspiracy to which the defendant was a party imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade. See Burtch, 662 F.3d at 221 (citing In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 315).

HN9[] As to the first element, plaintiffs must establish the existence of an agreement or "concerted action," and therefore, in order to state a claim for conspiracy to engage in predatory pricing, BanxCorp must plead that the defendant and co-conspirators "conspired" to "price below some measure of cost." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 585, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). "Unilateral [*24] activity by a defendant, no matter the motivation, cannot give rise to a section 1 violation." InterVest, Inc. v. Bloomberg, L.P., 340 F.3d 144, 159 (3d Cir. 2003). "An agreement exists when there is a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, a meeting of the minds, or a conscious commitment to a common scheme." West Penn Allegheny Health Sys. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010) (citing Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 771, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984)); Howard Hess Dental Labs. Inc., 602 F.3d at 254).

HN10[] A plaintiff may plead an agreement by alleging direct or circumstantial evidence, or a combination of the two. Direct evidence of a conspiracy is "evidence that is explicit and requires no inferences to establish the proposition or conclusion being asserted." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 324 n.23 (citations omitted). "[D]irect evidence of conspiracy, if credited, removes any ambiguities that might otherwise exist with respect to whether the parallel conduct in question is the result of independent or concerted action." Id. at 324. "If a complaint includes non-conclusory allegations of direct evidence of an agreement, a court need go no further on the question of whether [*25] an agreement has been adequately pled." West Penn, 627 F.3d at 99 (citing In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 323).

Examples of direct proof of conspiracies that the Third Circuit has found sufficient include:

> (1) a direct threat to the plaintiff from a competitor that if he went into business his competitors would do anything they could to stop him, including cutting prices or supplies;
> (2) advising distributors that a supplier would cut off access if the distributor failed to maintain a certain price level;
> (3) a memorandum produced by a defendant conspirator detailing the discussions from a meeting of a group of alleged conspirators; and
> (4) a public resolution by a professional association recommending that its members withdraw their affiliation with an insurer.

InterVest, 340 F.3d at 162-63 (citations omitted).

HN11[] In its evaluation of circumstantial evidence in an antitrust case, the Court must apply special considerations so that only reasonable inferences are drawn from the evidence. InterVest, 340 F.3d at 160. The reason is that "antitrust law limits the range of permissible inferences from ambiguous evidence in a § 1 case." Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 588. HN12[] Certainly, "an actionable horizontal [*26] conspiracy does not require direct communication among the competitors." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 331. But a § 1 claim of conspiracy "predicated on parallel conduct should be dismissed if 'common economic experience,' or facts alleged in a complaint itself, show that independent self-interest is an 'obvious alternative explanation' for defendants' common behavior." Id. at 326. Thus some courts have denominated certain factors which, if present, may indicate the existence of a conspiratorial agreement. See id. at 321. These factors include: "(1) evidence that the defendant had a motive to enter into a [conspiracy]; (2) evidence that the defendant acted contrary to its interests; and (3) 'evidence implying a traditional conspiracy." Id. Courts have cautioned that the first two factors may indicate that "defendants operate in an oligopolistic market," and because such a market contains very few sellers, each defendant would be aware of each other's actions. In re Baby Food Antitrust Litig., 166 F.3d 112, 121, 135 (1999) ("[E]vidence of action that is against self-interest or motivated by profit must go beyond mere interdependence."). Evidence of the third factor is "non-economic [*27] evidence that there was an actual, manifest agreement not to compete, which may include proof that the defendants got together and exchanged assurances of common action or otherwise adopted a common plan even though no meetings, conversations, or exchanged documents are shown." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 322 (citations and quotations omitted).

HN13[] The second element of a § 1 claim, an unreasonable restraint on trade, is analyzed under either the per se standard or the rule of reason standard. The per se illegality rule applies when a business practice "on its face, has no purpose except stifling competition." Eichorn v. AT & T Corp., 248 F.3d 131, 143 (3d Cir. 2001); In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 316 (citations omitted) ("A per se rule is applied when the practice facially appears to be one that would always or almost always tend to restrict competition and decrease output."). Agreements that fall under established per se illegality categories are "conclusively presumed to unreasonably restrain competition." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 316 (citation and quotations omitted). "Paradigmatic examples are 'horizontal agreements among competitors to fix prices or to divide markets.'" [*28] Id. (citing Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 886, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007)). Per se illegality "is reserved for only those agreements that are so plainly anticompetitive that no elaborate study of the industry is needed to establish their illegality." Deutscher Tennis Bund v. ATP Tour, Inc., 610 F.3d 820, 830 (3d Cir. 2010) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).

But HN14[] plaintiffs pleading exclusively per se violations?as opposed to pleading rule of reason violations in the alternative [8] —must be careful. "If the court determines that the restraint at issue is sufficiently different from the per se archetypes to require application of the rule of reason, the plaintiff's claims will be dismissed." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 317; see also Texaco Inc. v. Dagher, 547 U.S. 1, 7 n.2, 126 S. Ct. 1276, 164 L. Ed. 2d 1 (2006) (rejecting per se analysis and declining to conduct a rule of reason analysis where plaintiffs "ha[d] not put forth a rule of reason claim"). This is particularly true with certain restraints of trade that are "highly suspicious yet sufficiently idiosyncratic that judicial experience with them is limited." In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 317 (quotations omitted). In those cases, [*29] per se "condemnation is inappropriate, but at the same time, the 'inherently suspect' nature of the restraint obviates the sort of 'elaborate industry analysis' required by the traditional rule-of-reason standard." Id.

2. Plaintiff's Failure to Sufficiently Plead [*30] the Conspiracy Element of Its Predatory Price-Fixing Theory

HN16[] Under the Third Circuit's three-step analysis, the Court begins by taking note of the elements of a conspiracy claim under § 1, which are (1) the existence of an agreement to engage in the alleged scheme, here, predatory (i.e., below-rate) price fixing and (2) that the conspiracy imposed an unreasonable restraint on trade. See Burtch, 662 F.3d at 221. Because the Court finds that Plaintiff has insufficiently pled element one, the Court does

[8] The Supreme Court has explained the rule of reason as follows:

> HN15[] The rule of reason is the accepted standard for testing whether a practice restrains trade in violation of § 1. Under this rule, the factfinder weighs all of the circumstances of a case in deciding whether a restrictive practice should be prohibited as imposing an unreasonable restraint on competition. Appropriate factors to take into account include specific information about the relevant business and the restraint's history, nature, and effect. Whether the businesses involved have market power is a further, significant consideration. In its design and function the rule distinguishes between restraints with anticompetitive effect that are harmful to the consumer and restraints stimulating competition that are in the consumer's best interest.

Leegin Creative Leather Prods., Inc. v. PSKS, Inc., 551 U.S. 877, 885-86, 127 S. Ct. 2705, 168 L. Ed. 2d 623 (2007) (citations and internal quotations omitted).

not analyze the second element. Before moving to step two of the Third Circuit's three-step analysis, the Court briefly sets forth the standard for Plaintiff's required showing and the parties' arguments as to that showing.

HN17[] To sufficiently plead the conspiracy element of its claim, Plaintiff must show the existence of an agreement among members of the conspiracy demonstrating "a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, a meeting of the minds, or a conscious commitment to a common scheme." West Penn Allegheny Health Sys. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010) (citing Copperweld Corp. v. Indep. Tube Corp., 467 U.S. 752, 771, 104 S. Ct. 2731, 81 L. Ed. 2d 628 (1984)); Howard Hess Dental Labs. Inc., 602 F.3d at 254). [*31] The "unity of purpose" must point to the "common scheme" alleged in the complaint. See id. In this case, Plaintiff's 4AC alleges that the common scheme was predatory pricing. In the antitrust context, "predatory" means pricing below some measure of cost. Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 574; Pac. Bell Tel. Co. v. Linkline Commc'n, Inc., 555 U.S. 438, 451, 129 S. Ct. 1109, 172 L. Ed. 2d 836 (2009) ("[T]o prevail on a predatory pricing claim, a plaintiff must demonstrate that . . . 'the prices complained of are below an appropriate measure of its rival's costs'") (citation omitted); Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., Inc., 549 U.S. 312, 318, 127 S. Ct. 1069, 166 L. Ed. 2d 911 (2007) ("In a typical predatory-pricing scheme, the predator reduces the sale price of its product (its output) to below cost, hoping to drive competitors out of business."); Brooke Grp. Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 226, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993) ("The mechanism by which a firm engages in predatory pricing—lowering prices—is the same mechanism by which a firm stimulates competition; because cutting prices in order to increase business often is the very essence of competition[,] mistaken inferences are especially costly, because they chill the very conduct the antitrust [*32] laws are designed to protect.") (internal quotations and citation omitted).

Therefore, HN18[] to sufficiently plead a conspiracy among Bankrate and its co-branding partners, BanxCorp must plausibly allege that the conspirators agreed to enter a price fixing agreement for the purpose of "pricing below a measure of cost." Id. A party's failure to allege specifics as to the entrance and object of the agreement will lead to the dismissal of a conspiracy claim. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 595-96 (evidence that defendants agreed to fix minimum prices did not suggest predatory pricing conspiracy because such agreement indicated that defendants were seeking to place a floor under prices rather than to lower them, and evidence that tended to support the conspiracy "[said] little, if anything, about the existence of a conspiracy to charge below-market prices"); Summit Health, Ltd. v. Pinhas, 500 U.S. 322, 340, 111 S. Ct. 1842, 114 L. Ed. 2d 366 (1991) (affirming dismissal of a complaint where evidence indicated that defendants had abolished the featherbedding practice that was the "object of [the] conspiracy"); St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Barry, 438 U.S. 531, 535, 98 S. Ct. 2923, 57 L. Ed. 2d 932 (1978) ("The object of the conspiracy was to restrict St. Paul's [*33] policyholders to 'claims made' coverage by compelling them to 'purchase medical malpractice insurance from one insurer only, to wit defendant, St. Paul, and that [such] purchase must be made on terms dictated by the defendant, St. Paul.'"); In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 321 ("[I]n many cases where an agreement exists, parallel conduct—such as setting prices at the same level—is precisely the concerted action that is the conspiracy's object. Accordingly, we must define the object of the horizontal agreement alleged in the complaint.") (citation omitted); Great W. Mining & Mineral Co. v. Fox Rothschild LLP, 615 F.3d 159, 179 (3d Cir. 2010) ("Specifically, Great Western has failed to allege except in general terms the approximate time when the agreement was made, the specific parties to the agreement . . . the period of the conspiracy, or the object of the conspiracy."); Toledo Mack Sales & Serv., Inc. v. Mack Trucks, Inc., 530 F.3d 204, 226 (3d Cir. 2008) ("Toledo also presented sufficient evidence that "the objects of and the conduct pursuant to th[e] contract or conspiracy were illegal."); United States v. Sargent Elec. Co., 785 F.2d 1123, 1127 (3d Cir. 1986) ("The illegal object [*34] of a Sherman Act conspiracy must be identified in terms of an intended or achieved effect upon commerce in a relevant market.").

Under this standard, BanxCorp argues that it has adequately alleged that Bankrate engaged in predatory price-fixing—that is, pricing below some measure of cost—with its partner-competitors, a per se violation of § 1. (Pl. Opp. Br. at 10-14). [9] At its core, BanxCorp's theory rests on agreements between Bankrate and its co-branding partners to switch pricing methods for the purpose of creating below-market rates that made it impossible for competitors to sustain their business. After clearing competitors from the field, Bankrate could, and did, increase its prices at will, thereby harming consumers. (Id. at 14-16). Bankrate argues that BanxCorp has failed to sufficiently plead that Bankrate and its co-branding partners shared a "unity of purpose" to price below any measure of cost, i.e., to enter into a predatory price-fixing conspiracy. (Def. Moving Br. at 14-15). The Court finds that Defendant has the better of this argument.

[9] Although it briefly mentions rule of reason analysis in the alternative in the 4AC, BanxCorp argues exclusively under the per se rule [*35] in its opposition brief. (See Pl. Opp. Br. at 1, 10-14) (4AC ¶ 281) ("Defendant's horizontal market allocation and predatory price-fixing conduct constitutes a per se violation of the Sherman Act, since the restraints are presumptively

HN19[] At step two of the Third Circuit's three-step analysis, the Court identifies allegations that—without factual support—would not be entitled to the assumption of truth because they would be no more than mere conclusions. See Burtch, 662 F.3d at 221. The following is a list of predatory price-fixing allegations from the First Claim in the 4AC:

> Defendant has illegally restrained trade in [*36] the market for Bank Rate Websites in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act as follows:
> a. by engaging in predatory pricing;
> b. by entering into approximately 130 exclusionary agreements with partners and competitors that granted Defendant the sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at a fixed price on behalf of Defendant's cartel, also referred to as a "network";
> c. by forming a predatory Price-Fixing Cartel with more than 100 partners and competitors that together control more than 300 websites;
> d. by colluding and entering into agreements to divide markets, and allocate revenues, customers, products and Internet traffic with approximately 130 partners and competitors that together control more than 300 websites, including promotional, placement and/or minimum payment guarantees;
> Defendant's horizontal market allocation and predatory price-fixing conduct constitutes a per se violation of the Sherman Act, since the restraints are presumptively anticompetitive due to their predictable and pernicious anticompetitive effect, and limited potential for procompetitive benefit. (4AC ¶¶ 280-281).

These allegations are conclusory with respect to the alleged [*37] predatory price-fixing conspiracy. They merely allege that Bankrate engaged in predatory pricing, formed a predatory price-fixing cartel, and colluded with partners to enter into agreements to divide the market. Without more, these allegations evince no "unity of purpose" among Bankrate and its co-branding partners to depress prices. Such conclusory allegations are not entitled to the presumption of truth. See Burtch, 662 F.3d at 221. Therefore, the Court proceeds to HN20[] step three of the Third Circuit's analysis to determine whether these bare allegations are echoed elsewhere in the 4AC by well-pled allegations, and whether those allegations "plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief." Id. In its analysis below, the Court finds that although BanxCorp includes numerous allegations related to a conspiracy to fix prices, Plaintiff fails to adequately plead that the purported conspirators agreed to join a predatory price-fixing conspiracy for the purpose of forcing prices below a measure of cost, the key requirement under Plaintff's chosen theory.

The following is a list of allegations in the 4AC related to the nature of the conspirators' agreements from which the Court must determine [*38] whether Bankrate and its co-branding partners shared the requisite "unity of purpose":

> [C]o-branding partnership agreements granted Defendant the sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at the same price on behalf of Defendant's cartel or "network," first on a flat fee basis (from the late 1990s until October 1, 2005), and after October 1, 2005 on a cost-per-click ("CPC"). . . . This enabled Defendant to essentially charge any fixed price across its "network" at will, either through predatory fixed pricing below cost until any remaining independent competitor was (a) forced to join Defendant's cartel; (b) forced to exit the relevant market; or (c) driven out of business; or by charging supra-competitive fixed prices, as Defendant subsequently did after 2006. (4AC ¶¶ 21-22).

anticompetitive due to their predictable and pernicious anticompetitive effect, and limited potential for procompetitive benefit. In the alternative, these claims would require an analysis under the quick look approach, or at a minimum, under the rule of reason."). This is a risky strategy. In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 319 n. 16 (acknowledging that plaintiff permanently abandoned its rule of reason analysis argument where it pled rule of reason in its first amended complaint but argued exclusively for per se analysis in the second amended complaint and moving papers).

> In order to create a monopoly, Defendant's Hyperlink CPC ("Hyperlink CPC") rate listing prices were fixed in lockstep throughout its network and initially set below Defendant's average variable cost. Then, after Defendant found itself secure in its monopoly, it started to ratchet up its prices. (Id. ¶ 23).
> Defendant started providing its rate tables to The Wall Street Journal's [*39] print edition and the WSJ.com co-branded website enabled Defendant's Central Sales Force to control and subsequently fix the CPC prices charged to financial service providers, in parallel with its network of Partner Sites. (Id. ¶ 142).
> In addition to its own organic traffic websites Bankrate.com, Interest.com and Bankaholic.com, Defendant has assembled an Online Network of more than 300 Partner Sites through partnership agreements with approximately 130 competing counterparties. (Id. ¶ 155).
> These approximately 130 co-branding agreements granted Defendant the sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at a fixed price and collect and allocate CPC revenues on behalf of Defendant's cartel or "network" consisting of more than 300 websites. (Id. ¶ 156).
> The purpose of the contracts, combination and conspiracy between Bankrate.com and the approximately 130 members of Defendant's cartel or "network," was to coordinate pricing for the mutual benefit of the members of the cartel, at the expense of independent competitors or potential competitors, buyers and sellers, and other market participants. (Id. ¶¶ 175).

In each of these paragraphs, BanxCorp fails to [*40] adequately allege the conspirators' intention to join a below-rate, predatory price-fixing scheme. For example, although BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate developed a co-branded website with WSJ.com that "enabled Defendant's Central Sales Force to control and subsequently fix the CPC prices charged to financial service providers," the allegation fails to explain how Defendant used its "control" to push down the CPC prices it charged to financial providers. Additionally, the allegation fails to evince an intention by WSJ.com to enter into the agreement so that Bankrate could push down pricing in a predatory manner. (See id. ¶ 142). Although Plaintiff alleges that Bankrate entered into co-branding agreements with 130 partners that "granted Defendant the sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at a fixed price," the allegation fails to explain how Defendant used its exclusive authority to drive prices below some measure of cost. The allegation also fails to show how providing Bankrate with exclusive discretion over sales and pricing could mean that the purported co-conspirators had any intention of signing the contract for the purpose of having Bankrate [*41] push prices down. (See id. ¶ 156). Similarly, Plaintiff's allegation that Bankrate set prices "for the mutual benefit of the members of the cartel," does not evince an intention on the part of the co-conspirators to have Bankrate set prices in a predatory, below-cost manner. (See id. ¶ 175).

In an effort to support its allegations with direct evidence, BanxCorp further alleges that Bankrate and its purported co-conspirators planned and carried out its anticompetitive conduct by:

> a. Participating in meetings, conversations and communications with competitors to discuss the CPC prices to be charged to financial service providers for listing their rates on a Bank Rate Website;
> b. Agreeing with competitors at the same level of market structure to charge Bank Rate Website Hyperlink CPC prices at certain levels to be sold to certain financial service providers;
> c. Issuing CPC price quotations in accordance with the agreements reached;
> d. Agreeing to let Bankrate sell Bank Rate Website Hyperlinks on behalf of each partner in the Price-Fixing Cartel at CPC prices they knew to be fixed pursuant to the conspiracy described above . . . . (Id. ¶ 161) (emphasis added).
> [F]acilitat[ing] explicit or tacit [*42] collusion through practices such as the exchange or disclosure of competitively sensitive information or through increased market concentration. (Id. ¶ 177(k)).

In further support of these allegations, BanxCorp cites to a series of contracts and meetings that supposedly demonstrate the requisite "unity of purpose" among Bankrate and its co-branding partners. The Court first evaluates the contracts, and then the meetings.

As to the contracts, BanxCorp cites language like the following, which appears in numerous co-branding contracts:

> Bankrate shall have the exclusive right to sell and collect fees for advertisements, including Hyperlink Advertisements within Rate Tables and Display Advertisements on the Rate Query Pages, the Rate Results Pages, the Linked Bankrate Site, and, with the exception of the Leaderboard, the Bankrate Content Pages (collectively, the "Bankrate Advertisements"). MSI shall not interfere with Bankrate Advertisements in any manner. (4AC Ex. A, D.E. 169-1, at *1, 33) (Contracts between Move Sales, Inc. and Bankrate dated July 24, 2007 and August 1, 2008).

For two reasons, the Court finds that the exclusivity provisions of these contracts—the only provisions that arguably [*43] evince direct evidence of the co-conspirators' intent—fall short of providing adequate support that the purported co-conspirators entered into the agreements for the purpose of pricing below-market. First, the exclusivity provision—"Bankrate shall have the exclusive right to sell and collect fees"—gives discretion to Bankrate, but does not explain whether Bankrate is to increase prices, decrease prices, or keep them the same. This provision, therefore, shows no intention on the part of the co-branding partner to enter an agreement so that Bankrate would push prices in any particular direction. Additionally, the agreement does not demonstrate an intention to give Bankrate pricing discretion so that they would alter pricing for purposes of driving competitors out of business. Second, the provision explicitly states that the purported co-conspirator "shall not interfere with Bankrate Advertisements in any manner." Based on this language, even if Bankrate alone had the intention to use its discretion to price below a particular measure of cost to drive competitors from the marketplace, the agreement explicitly demonstrates how such a choice would be Bankrate's alone, and nothing in the [*44] complaint demonstrates that Bankrate's co-branding partners had any knowledge of this hypothetical intention. The exclusivity provision of the contracts—providing discretion to Bankrate to set prices in no particular direction, and explicitly forbidding the co-branding partner from interfering at all with the prices—clearly falls short of the types of direct evidence set forth in Intervest. See 340 F.3d at 162-63 (listing threats to cut prices or cut off supply as examples of direct evidence that demonstrate a predatory price-fixing conspiracy). Here, the exclusivity provisions demonstrate only an intention by co-branding partners to give discretion to Bankrate.

As to meetings, Intervest explains that HN21[] "a memorandum produced by a defendant conspirator detailing the discussions from a meeting of a group of alleged conspirators" would be sufficient direct evidence of a predatory price fixing conspiracy. Id. at 163. Here, the meetings discussed in the complaint fall short of that standard:

> There is enough factual matter . . . to prove that Defendant Bankrate and approximately 130 horizontal competitors and partners [have engaged in anticompetitive conduct by] [p]articipating in meetings, [*45] conversations and communications with competitors to discuss the CPC prices to be charged to financial service providers for listing their rates on a Bank Rate Website. (4AC ¶ 161);

> This plan was summarized by [Bankrate's CEO, Tom] Evans, during its Q3 2006 Earnings Conference Call, as follows: "Our plan is to grow our paid search budget in a methodical and thoughtful way so that the money is spent in concert with ad sales demand so as to generate high rates of return. We expect to grow that spending, quarter by quarter, until we reach the point where we see returns diminishing below a targeted level. The benefits of doing so are pretty obvious. It drives additional traffic to the site that we are working concurrently to monetize. As we grow this capability, it should increase both our traffic and our revenue." (Id. ¶ 194) (Statement by CEO Evans during Q3 2006 Earnings Conference Call).

These two allegations are the closest BanxCorp comes to providing evidence of meetings where discussions about anticompetitive activity may have been held between Bankrate and the co-conspirators. Any other mentions of meetings in the 4AC concern Board meetings or merger discussions between Bankrate [*46] and BanxCorp, (id. ¶¶ 30 n.9, 125-28, 146 n.34, 269 n.47). The allegations above, reviewed in connection with BanxCorp's other allegations, fall short of providing adequate support that the purported co-conspirators met, conversed, or communicated for the purpose of pricing below-market. First, BanxCorp offers no evidence that the object of the conspiracy was discussed at these meetings. Second, they offer no evidence that would tend to prove that co-branding partners were even present at these meetings. Indeed, the allegation relating to Mr. Evans's statement during the Q3 Earnings Conference Call demonstrates, at most, an intent on Bankrate's part to price below cost.

There is no mention in either of these paragraphs of any role played by co-branding partners in Bankrate's pricing determinations. BanxCorp's allegation of "meetings, conversations, and communications" is entirely conclusory and is not the type of direct evidence of a predatory price-fixing conspiracy that the Third Circuit has found sufficient. See InterVest, 340 F.3d at 162-63 (citations omitted) (listing "a memorandum produced by a defendant conspirator detailing the discussions from a meeting of a group of alleged [*47] conspirators" and "a public resolution by a professional association recommending that its members withdraw their affiliation with an insurer" as sufficient to prove this element).

In an effort to support its allegations of a predatory agreement with circumstantial evidence, BanxCorp generally alleges that before the execution of co-branding agreements, prices were higher, but after executing the co-branding agreements, prices decreased, and therefore the agreements must have been executed with the intention of predatory pricing:

> Prior to October 1, 2005 Defendant as well as Plaintiff and other Bank Rate Websites charged financial service providers a flat monthly fee to list their rates. (4AC ¶ 178).
> On October 1, 2005, exercising Defendant's sole authority and exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at a fixed price on behalf of its entire cartel or "network" of Partner Sites, Bankrate introduced a predatory CPC pricing structure, thus taking unfair advantage of its dominant position in the relevant market and suppressing competition even further. . . . After October 1, 2005 participating financial service providers now pay Bankrate each time a consumer clicks on [*48] its Bank Rate Websites' rate listings or telephone number icons. (Id. ¶ 179-180).
> Based on the foregoing, the structure of the relevant market at the time and other related cost factors, Bankrate's CPC price starting on October 1, 2005 was set below its average variable cost. (Id. ¶ 182).

The Court finds that the allegations fall short of adequately showing an intention on the part of the co-branding partners to join a conspiracy for the purpose of pushing prices down, because the mere existence of similar contracts signed by numerous parties during the same time frame does not on its own demonstrate intent. See In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 322 (citing Elevator Antitrust Litig., 502 F.3d 47, 51 (2d Cir. 2007) ("finding that allegations that the defendants used similar contractual language did not plausibly imply conspiracy because 'similar contract language can reflect the copying of documents that may not be secret'"). Additionally, because BanxCorp does not allege that the co-conspirators set prices themselves, or played a role in setting prices, there is no circumstantial evidence suggesting parallel conduct from which the Court can discern a possible price-reduction agreement. [*49] See In re Ins. Brokerage, 618 F.3d at 322 (discussing parallel conduct as circumstantial evidence of conspiracy).

Plaintiff fails to provide any evidence—direct or circumstantial—plausibly suggesting a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, or a meeting of the minds among Bankrate's partner-competitors to engage in predatory pricing, i.e., pricing below cost. Accordingly, because the Plaintiff has failed to adequately allege the first element of its § 1 claim, the Court will not address the second element.

Although the Court has found that Plaintiff's § 1 claims based on its predatory price-fixing theory should be dismissed, it will briefly address Bankrate's remaining arguments.

3. Contradictory Statements

Bankrate argues that the predatory price-fixing claim is premised on contradictory allegations, because the 4AC alleges, on the one hand, that Bankrate's pre-2002 pricing scheme was predatory and, on the other hand, the market remained competitive at the same time. Specifically, Bankrate argues:

> Bankrate began pricing below average variable cost in 2005. Notwithstanding that allegation, BanxCorp also pleads that Bankrate began providing "free Internet rate listings . . [*50] . to financial service providers since 1996" as well as "below-cost rate listing fees." BanxCorp further alleges that before 2002 the relevant market > was competitive; no single market participant had a greater than 25% market share; and "participating financial service providers were charged competitive flat monthly fees to list their rates on a Bank Rate Website.

(Def. Moving Br. at 16) (citations omitted). Bankrate argues that these seemingly contradictory factual allegations "make it impossible to understand the basis for the predatory price-fixing claim and thus render the claim meaningless." Id. Bankrate cites to Ninth and Eleventh Circuit cases to support its argument. BanxCorp does not address the argument in its brief.

The quoted paragraphs, read alone and in the context of the Complaint and the conspiracy alleged, indicate that these paragraphs and allegations do not contradict each other. It appears that BanxCorp is alleging that Bankrate initially charged below variable cost beginning in the mid-1990s with its monthly flat fee model. The market remained healthy as Bankrate attempted to set up its field-clearing predatory pricing scheme until at least 2002, when the market [*51] became anti-competitive. Then by 2005, when Bankrate had successfully cleared competitors from the field, they began pushing up rates. This story, when accepted as true, would not be contradictory on its face, and would be supported by the evidence alleged by BanxCorp: that Bankrate entered its first anticompetitive contract with The Wall Street Journal in 2002 (4AC ¶¶ 26, 137, 139, 140, 141) (the Wall Street Journal contract); that Bankrate became profitable thereafter (4AC ¶ 131) (profitability in 2002); and that rate increases followed. (4AC ¶ 71) (rate increases).

4. Economic Implausibility

Bankrate argues that even if BanxCorp's predatory price-fixing theory was adequately pled, the claim is still subject to dismissal because it would make no economic sense for Bankrate's partner-competitors to join in a predatory price-fixing scheme where they share 50% of profits made from charging incredibly low rates. (Def. Moving Br. at 17).

The Court need not address the merits of Bankrate's economic motive argument. It is well settled that HN22[] at the summary judgment stage a court may dispose of an antitrust conspiracy claim in "the [*52] absence of any plausible motive to engage in the conduct charged[.]" Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 596 (1986). Matsushita and Regency Oldsmobile, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 723 F. Supp. 250 (D.N.J. 1989), on which Bankrate relies, were both postured at summary judgment. See Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 576; Regency, 723 F. Supp. at 252. The Court is unaware of any case in this Circuit that allows for dismissal of a claim based on implausible economic theories at the pleading stage. In any case, the facts pled here are not so implausible as to affect the sufficiency of the pleading. (See 4AC ¶ 109) ("Therefore, these independent website operators no longer had any incentive or a need to handle their own redundant back-office services."); Neither party has offered any cases to the contrary, or even addressed this issue in its brief. The Court sees no reason to address the issue now. Similar to the Third Circuit's approach in Howard Hess, the Court sees no reason to decide which line of cases—those addressing economic implausibility at the pleading stage, versus those addressing it at the summary judgment stage—is correct. See Howard Hess, 602 F.3d at 257 n. 9) ("We need not decide here which [*53] line of cases has it right.") (emphasis added).

C. Sherman § 2: Monopolization or Attempt to Monopolize

1. Legal Standard: Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2

BanxCorp brings its monopolization claim under § 2 of the Sherman Act, which provides: HN23[] "Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States . . . shall be deemed guilty of a felony." 15 U.S.C. § 2 (2006). HN24[] The offense of monopoly has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966).

HN25[] As to the first element, the Supreme Court has defined monopoly power as "the power to control prices or exclude competition." United States v. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391, 76 S. Ct. 994, 100 L. Ed. 1264 (1956). "The existence of such power ordinarily may be inferred from the predominant share of the market." Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. at 571 ("87% of the accredited central station service [*54] business leaves no doubt that the congeries of these defendants have monopoly power"); see, e.g., Am. Tobacco Co. v. United States, 328 U.S. 781, 797, 66 S. Ct. 1125, 90 L. Ed. 1575 (1946) ("over two-thirds of the entire domestic field of cigarettes" and "over 80% of the field of comparable cigarettes" constituted "a substantial monopoly").

HN26[] Monopoly power may be proven by direct or indirect evidence. "'The existence of monopoly power may be proven through direct evidence of supracompetitive prices and restricted output.'" Broadcom Corp. v. Qualcomm Inc., 501 F.3d 297, 307 (3d Cir. 2007) (citations omitted). "To support an inference of monopoly power, a plaintiff typically must plead and prove that a firm has a dominant share in a relevant market, and that significant 'entry barriers' protect that market." Id. (citations omitted). "Barriers to entry are factors, such as regulatory requirements, high capital costs, or technological obstacles, [which] prevent new competition from entering a market in response to a monopolist's supracompetitive prices." Id. (citing Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 591 n.15 ("[W]ithout barriers to entry it would presumably be impossible to maintain supracompetitive prices for an extended time.")).

HN27[] "Proving [*55] the existence of monopoly power through indirect evidence requires a definition of the relevant market." Id. "The scope of the market is a question of fact as to which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof." Id. (citations omitted). "Competing products are in the same market if they are readily substitutable for one another; a market's outer boundaries are determined by the reasonable interchangeability of use between a product and its substitute, or by their cross-elasticity of demand." Id. (citing Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)). Failure to define the proposed relevant market in these terms may result in dismissal of the complaint (or claim). See Queen City Pizza v. Domino's Pizza, 124 F.3d 430, 436. (3d Cir. 1997).

HN28[] As to the second element, "the acquisition or possession of monopoly power must be accompanied by some anticompetitive conduct on the part of the possessor." Broadcom, 501 F.3d at 308 (citing Verizon Communs., Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis v. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 407, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004)). "Anticompetitive conduct may take a variety of forms, but it is generally defined as conduct to obtain or maintain monopoly power as a result of competition on some [*56] basis other than the merits." Id. (citation omitted). "Conduct that impairs the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way may be deemed anticompetitive." Id. (citing Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 604-05, 105 S. Ct. 2847, 86 L. Ed. 2d 467 (1985)). "Conduct that merely harms competitors, however, while not harming the competitive process itself, is not anticompetitive." Id. (citing Brooke Grp., 509 U.S. at 224 (1993) ("It is axiomatic that the antitrust laws were passed for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'") (citations omitted)).

2. Sufficiency of Plaintiff's § 2 Monopoly Claim

BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate has obtained a monopoly in the relevant market. [10] Specifically, it alleges:

> Bankrate has monopoly power in the market for Bank Rate Websites, having since 2003 captured and maintained a market share of approximately 95%. (4AC ¶ 287).
> Bankrate is maintaining and extending its monopoly power through the predatory and exclusionary conduct described above, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. (Id. ¶ 288).

[10] Based on this Court's review of the moving papers, Bankrate does not appear to be challenging the definition of the relevant market. Therefore, the Court accepts BanxCorp's definition of the relevant market for purposes of deciding this motion.

> Substantial barriers to entry exist in the relevant market. (Id. [*57] ¶ 289).
> There is no legitimate business justification for Bankrate's monopolization conduct. (Id. ¶ 290).
> Defendant's anticompetitive conduct has had a significant adverse effect on competition in the market for Bank Rate Websites, causing direct and proximate harm to financial service providers—the customers—and to consumers—the end users. (Id. ¶ 291).
> The anticompetitive actions of Defendant have directly injured BanxQuote in its business and property and its injuries and damages are ongoing. (Id. ¶ 292).

Bankrate challenges this monopolization claim "except as [it] pertain[s] to alleged predatory pricing based on Bankrate's switch to cost-per-click ("CPC") pricing." However, it makes the Court's job in evaluating the challenge particularly difficult by not discussing the specific elements of a monopoly claim. Instead, it attacks the theories underpinning the claims themselves. Bankrate does not direct any arguments at the monopoly claims specifically. [*58] Raising such global pleading arguments makes it unclear to the Court which arguments relate to which claims, and therefore, the specific basis on which Bankrate believes that BanxCorp has failed to plead particular elements of either the § 1 or § 2 claims. See *In re Hypodermic Prods. Antitrust Litig., No. 05-1602, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47437, 2007 WL 1959224, 9 (D.N.J. June 29, 2007). Discussing the specific elements of a § 2 monopoly claim is particularly important because HN29[] it is possible for a plaintiff to unsuccessfully plead a § 1 conspiracy claim but sufficiently plead a § 2 unilateral action claim in the same complaint. See, e.g., Barr Laboratories, Inc. v. Abbott Laboratories, 978 F.2d 98, 110-12 (3d Cir. 1992) (considering § 2 of the Sherman Act claims after rejecting claims based on the same evidence under § 1 of the Sherman Act). Nevertheless, the Court attempts to evaluate BanxCorp's claims in light of Bankrate's arguments. Importantly, in its opposition brief, BanxCorp responds to Bankrate's challenge by discussing a supposed distinction between monopoly and monopoly power and reiterating evidence presented in the 4AC. (Pl. Opp. Br. at 26-28).

BanxCorp offers statistics to support the first element, possession of [*59] monopoly power. Specifically, BanxCorp alleges:

> BanxQuote's market share and consequential revenues have declined at a rate of approximately 25% annually, year after year, for at least four years, while its costs of capital increased and its access to the capital markets was foreclosed. Furthermore, Defendant drove Plaintiff out of business, as well as any other independent competitors, who did not either agree to be acquired or join its "network" or cartel, such as for example Bankaholic, MMIS/Interest.com, LendingTree, Move.com, Realtor.com, Ratecatcher.com and BankCD.com. (4AC ¶ 258).
> Bankrate controls over 95% of the relevant market share. (Id. ¶ 91(a)).
> In January 1999, approximately 44% of the total traffic to Bankrate.com originated from its co-branding partners. (Id. ¶ 135).

One of BanxCorp's exhibits also indicates that by 2002, only 30% of Bankrate's total traffic originated from its co-brand sites. (Id. Ex. B at 1). Finally, it describes the current market after monopolization to be:

> a. Market Concentration: Bankrate controls over 95% of the relevant market share.
> b. Price-Fixing Cartel: more than 300 competing Partner Sites joined Bankrate's Price-Fixing Cartel.
> c. Lack of Competitive [*60] Pricing: Prices charged to customers became inelastic.
> d. Independent Competitors Pushed Out or Acquired: Independent Bank Rate Websites were forced to join Bankrate's Price-Fixing Cartel or exit the market, or were bought out by Bankrate, as in the case of MMIS/Interest.com and more recently Bankaholic. (4AC ¶ 91).

The allegations above, when accepted as true, are sufficient to plead the first element of this claim. The level of market share, 95%, is higher than what the Supreme Court has found sufficient to establish monopoly power. [11] The fact that less and less of Bankrate's traffic comes from its partners—and more and more results come from its own conduct—also supports the idea that Bankrate is dominant in the market.

BanxCorp's allegations also sufficiently answer each of Bankrate's arguments relating to exclusionary conduct. The first argument—that BanxCorp has failed to sufficiently plead that it was foreclosed from selling its products in the relevant market—is adequately rebutted by the following statements by BanxCorp: its statement of market share and revenue loss (id. ¶ 258); Mr. Evans's statement that "Bankrate does not have direct competitors" [*61] (id. ¶ 146); and Mr. Evans's statement that "one of the things that is a tremendous gating item for [Bankrate], we believe is in terms of competition, and barriers for competition, is how does anybody else break into this, if we have tied up all the best newspaper relations, the best co-brand relationships." (Id. ¶ 87).

Bankrate's second argument is that there was no market foreclosure. The plausibility of market foreclosure is supported by the inelasticity in the market described by Mr. Evans when he states that, despite a number of rate increases within three years, lenders "don't vote with their feet. They don't leave. They are not canceling. They are not finding alternatives." (Id. ¶¶ 69). See Crossroads Cogeneration Corp. v. Orange & Rockland Utilities, Inc., 159 F.3d 129, 141 (3d Cir. 1998) (HN30[] "A sufficient pleading 'requires something more, which may include . . . the barriers to entry, the nature of the anti-competitive conduct, and the elasticity of consumer demand.'") (citation omitted). Market foreclosure is further supported by Mr. Evans's statements implying market foreclosure, such as: "How does anybody else get into this business and compete with Bankrate? I look at it [*62] as both an offensive marketing opportunity, as well as a defensive opportunity." (4AC ¶ 87).

Bankrate's final argument—that a one-year contract is not restrictive to the effect condemned by the antitrust laws—is correct, but that fact alone is insufficient to negate the second element of a § 2 antitrust claim. As Bankrate argues, HN31[] it is true that a one-year contract, taken alone, does not violate the antitrust laws. See LePage's Inc. v. 3M, 324 F.3d 141, 180 (3d Cir. 2003) ("Even assuming, however, that 3M did have exclusive contracts with some of the customers, LePage's has not demonstrated that 3M acted illegally, as one-year exclusive contracts have been held to be reasonable and not unduly restrictive.") (citation omitted). However, the mere fact that the one-year exclusivity provision in the co-branding agreement does not violate the antitrust laws does not mean that BanxCorp's allegations do not demonstrate that Bankrate unreasonably restrained competition, when viewed in totality. See id. at 162 (holding that a court should consider a defendant's anticompetitive conduct "as a whole rather than considering each aspect in isolation"); Fed. Trade Comm'n v. Motion Picture Adver. Serv. Co., 344 U.S. 392, 395-96, 73 S. Ct. 361, 97 L. Ed. 426, 49 F.T.C. 1730 (1953) [*63] (stating that the FTC had found that the term of one-year exclusive contracts had become a standard practice and would not be an undue restraint on competition, but holding that evidence sustained the Commission's finding that the distributor's exclusive screening agreements with theater operators unreasonably restrained competition). As in Federal Trade Commission, allegations in the 4AC, taken together, when accepted as true, plausibly support a showing of the first element, monopoly power. See id. at 396-97.

HN32[] The second element requires a showing of maintenance of the monopoly power "as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 570-71. Conduct that would satisfy this element includes conduct that would foreclose competition, allow Bankrate to gain a competitive advantage, or destroy a competitor. BanxCorp's allegations of price-fixing and exclusionary conduct, as discussed above, clearly support this element enough to present a claim that is plausible on its face, because "conduct that impairs the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does [*64] so in an unnecessarily restrictive way may be deemed anticompetitive." Broadcom, 501 F.3d at 308 (citation omitted). For example, Plaintiff alleges:

> During the summer of 2002, Bankrate offered WSJ to enter into a revenue-sharing agreement, waiving the annual license fees that WSJ had been paying BanxQuote, in order to break up and take over the WSJ-

[11] See Part III.C.1 above.

> BanxQuote contracts, by persuading WSJ to join Defendant's "network." This agreement essentially granted Defendant the exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet on behalf of WSJ.com on a "network" basis. Defendant's conduct did not make any economic sense but for the harm it caused to Plaintiff and other competitors. (4AC ¶ 137).

This allegation mentions conduct—an agreement that allowed Bankrate to set rates in exchange for waiving annual license fees—that would certainly impair the opportunities of rivals for whom waiving license fees was not feasible and who were, as a consequence, excluded from doing business with the Wall Street Journal. Taken as true, this practice would either foster anticompetitive behavior or not further competition because it would force competitors to suffer losses until either Bankrate or its [*65] competitor was driven out of the market.

The closest Bankrate comes to challenging this element is its argument that the exclusionary conduct theory is legally defective because the factual allegations underlying the theory "are at odds with the facts alleged in the balance of the 4AC, and with the facts alleged in this case in every version of the complaint filed since 2008." (Def. Moving Br. at 20). Bankrate argues that in its conspiracy claim, BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate and its media co-branding partners are competitors who entered into per se illegal horizontal price fixing agreements through the co-brand contracts. In the exclusionary conduct claim, however, BanxCorp alleges that it was denied access to an essential distribution channel—the media outlets—as a result of Bankrate's agreements with those media outlets. Bankrate argues that these allegations are mutually exclusive. Id. It is not possible, Bankrate argues, for the media outlets to be horizontal competitors of Bankrate and BanxCorp in the relevant market, but at the same time to be the "key internet traffic pipeline" needed to "permit Plaintiff and other independent firms to compete in the relevant market." Id. (citation [*66] omitted). "Stated another way, co-brand contracts that provided Bankrate with the 'sole authority and/or exclusive right to sell rate table listings on the Internet at a fixed price . . .' cannot be a per se illegal price-fixing agreements between [horizontal] competitors and also be the very same [vertical] gating item that prevents BanxCorp from distributing its product." (Def. Moving Br. at 20) (citing 4AC ¶ 280(b)). Plaintiff does not address this argument in its opposition brief.

It is true that HN33[] pleading contradictory facts to support different claims is grounds for dismissal of those claims. See Bailey-El v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 246 F. App'x 105, 109 (3d Cir. 2007); *Georges v. Ricci, No. 07-5579, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38315, 2008 WL 2036799, at 3 (D.N.J. May 9, 2008). But BanxCorp does not appear to be advancing completely contradictory theories. BanxCorp appears to be arguing that Bankrate engaged in both horizontal and vertical exclusionary conduct with a whole host of entities. Horizontally, it engaged in anticompetitive conduct with its competitors—i.e., other businesses, such as LendingTree—that aggregated rate tables and offered the same services to their customers as Bankrate. (See, e.g., 4AC Ex. [*67] A at 1, Contracts between Move Sales, Inc. and Bankrate dated July 24, 2007 and August 1, 2008). Vertically, it allegedly engaged in exclusionary conduct through exclusive dealing contracts with media outlets such as the New York Times. (See 4AC ¶ 159 ("Bankrate has locked up the largest and most important newspapers for print distribution of its rate tables, consisting of 500+ newspapers nationwide, which are linked through credit captions to its website Bankrate.com, thus providing significant brand value, publicity and promotional support for its Bank Rate Website."); ¶ 160 (alleging that BanxCorp also provides a geographic breakdown of the media outlets)). Although BanxCorp's horizontal/vertical distinction is not a model of clarity, the allegations do not appear to be contradictory in the way Bankrate describes. Therefore, the Court finds that BanxCorp has sufficiently pled its monopoly claim under § 2.

3. Sufficiency of Plaintiff's § 2 Attempted Monopoly Claim

HN34[] To state a claim for attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must establish "(1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability [*68] of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456, 113 S. Ct. 884, 122 L. Ed. 2d 247 (1993).

HN35[] As to the first element, "a firm engages in anticompetitive conduct when it attempts to exclude rivals on some basis other than efficiency" or when it competes "on some basis other than the merits." West Penn, 627 F.3d at 108-09 (citing Aspen Skiing, 472 U.S. at 605). "Conduct that impairs the opportunities of rivals and either does not further competition on the merits or does so in an unnecessarily restrictive way may be deemed anticompetitive." Id. at 108 (citing Broadcom, 501 F.3d at 308). "'Anticompetitive conduct' can come in too many different forms, and is too dependent upon context, for any court or commentator ever to have enumerated all the varieties." LePage's, 324 F.3d at 152 (citation omitted). Allegations raised under § 1 may be a proper basis on which to predicate a § 2 claim. See, e.g., Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 590 ("These observations apply even to predatory pricing by a single firm seeking monopoly power."); Advo, Inc. v. Phila. Newspapers, Inc., 51 F.3d 1191, 1198-99 (3d Cir. 1995) (determining whether plaintiff satisfied this element by analyzing only plaintiff's allegation [*69] of § 1 predatory pricing conspiracy).

HN36[] As to the second element—specific intent to monopolize?"a mere intention to prevail over rivals or improve market position is insufficient. Even an intent to perform acts that can be objectively viewed as tending toward the acquisition of monopoly power is insufficient, unless it also appears that the acts were not 'predominantly motivated by legitimate business aims.'" Penn. Dental Ass'n v. Med. Serv. Ass'n of Penn., 745 F.2d 248, 260-61 (3d Cir. 1984) (quoting Times Picayune Publ'g Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 627, 73 S. Ct. 872, 97 L. Ed. 1277 (1953)). "Direct evidence of specific intent need not be shown; it may be inferred from predatory or exclusionary conduct." Penn. Dental Ass'n, 745 F.2d at 261 (citing Interstate Circuit, 306 U.S. at 208, 59 S. Ct. 467, 83 L. Ed. 610).

HN37[] As to the third element, "'[a] dangerous probability of monopoly may exist where the defendant firm possesses a significant market share when it undertakes the challenged anticompetitive conduct.'" Barr Labs., 978 F.2d at 112 (quotation and citation omitted). However, alleging market share alone is insufficient to properly plead attempted monopolization. Crossroads Cogeneration, 159 F.3d at 141. A sufficient pleading "requires [*70] something more, which may include 'the strength of competition, probable development of the industry, the barriers to entry, the nature of the anti-competitive conduct, and the elasticity of consumer demand.'" Id. (citation omitted). The existence of monopoly power may be proven through direct evidence of supracompetitive prices and restricted output. Broadcom, 501 F.3d at 307.

The allegations discussed under the Court's § 1 analysis sufficiently support the first element of this claim. BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate purposefully predatorily priced its rate listings below cost—and sometimes for free—in order to acquire customers from competitors and drive competitors out of the market. It further alleges that Bankrate entered into agreements with its distributors who gave Bankrate the exclusive right to advertise its tables throughout the United States. This predatory pricing theory is the type of conduct that the Third Circuit has found sufficient to satisfy this element. See, e.g., Advo, 51 F.3d at 1198-99 (determining whether plaintiff satisfied this element by analyzing only plaintiff's allegation of § 1 predatory pricing conspiracy). Mr. Evans's statements—"[w]e think we are in [*71] some cases under priced relative to the value. And we think that we will try to reconcile that and rectify that over time" (4AC ¶ 69), and "[s]ome of the guys that are our partners, they're also competitors" (id. ¶ 169)—support a unilateral predatory pricing theory under this element because they serve as acknowledgement on Bankrate's part that its prices were below what is needed to attract customers; Bankrate intended to increase its prices after reaching a certain threshold; and it was doing business with competitors in the same market. [12]

The second element—specific intent to obtain a monopoly—is equally satisfied. BanxCorp offers several statements by Bankrate's CEO, Tom Evans, which would indicate a specific intent on the part of Bankrate to obtain a monopoly. The statements include:

> And some people have better business models and obviously better at converting than others, but because of that, we are pretty confident about our ability to push rates. And again, nobody calls us and goes, hey, thanks for the rate increase, can I have another? [*72] But the fact is that they don't vote with their feet. They don't leave. They are not canceling. They are not finding alternatives. We think we are a fair value. (4AC ¶ 69).

[12] Defendant's attacks on the predatory pricing and exclusionary conduct theories are dealt with throughout this opinion and are not addressed here.

> [T]he fact is we really haven't seen any exodus of advertisers. In fact, it's been just the opposite. We continue to grow our rate table-advertising base and have more lenders on the table than we did last quarter, and more than we had last year. . . . As of yesterday, August 1, we had 811 advertisers on our rate tables. Given that strength, given that demand, you are aware that we previously announced a 15% price increase for mortgage and home equity hyperlink clicks effective July 1. As Ed said, there's more news on the pricing front. This last week we announced to deposit advertisers a price increase effective August 15 of 25% per CD click, and 20% per money market click. . . . And you should know that neither increase has resulted in a decline in the number of advertisers."

(Id. ¶ 76; see also id. ¶ 87 ("One of the things that is a tremendous gating item for us, we believe is in terms of competition, and barriers for competition, is how does anybody else break into this, if we have tied up all the best newspaper [*73] relations, the best co-brand relationship[.]"); id. ¶ 146 ("Defendant's CEO Tom Evans acknowledged at a board meeting that Bankrate does not have direct competitors."); id. ¶ 81 (reporting more than a thousand advertisers in the first quarter of 2008)). Defendant does not raise any argument tailored to attacking this element.

The last element—that there is a dangerous probability of success—has also been sufficiently pled. The allegations found sufficient to satisfy the first element of the monopoly claim apply here with equal force. They include BanxCorp's allegation of Bankrate's 95% market share, Bankrate's ability to drive independent, non-compliant competitors—such as Bankaholic, MMIS/Interest.com, LendingTree, Move.com, Realtor.com, Ratecatcher.com and BankCD.com—out of the market, and the increase in traffic from 1999 to 2002 to Bankrate.com from sources other than Bankrate's co-branding partners. Mr. Evans's statements, referenced above for the propositions that the market is inelastic and that Bankrate has no direct competitors as a result of Bankrate's conduct also support this claim. The same is true for Mr. Evans's statements tracking an increase of advertisers from 811 [*74] in 2007 to more than 1,000 in 2008. (4AC ¶¶ 76-81). Defendant's argument that Plaintiff has failed to sufficiently plead market foreclosure, and that there was no market foreclosure, are unpersuasive for the same reasons as explained earlier in this opinion in Part III.C.2, where the Court discussed the sufficiency of BanxCorp's § 2 monopoly claim.

IV. DISMISSAL WITHOUT PREJUDICE

HN38[] Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2) allows a party to amend its pleading by leave of court when justice so requires. Leave to amend pleadings is to be freely given. Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2); see also Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962). The decision to grant leave to amend rests within the discretion of the court. Id. Leave to amend may be denied on the basis of undue delay or bad faith. Id. "Only when these factors suggest that amendment would be 'unjust' should the court deny leave." Arthur v. Maersk, Inc., 434 F.3d 196, 203 (3d Cir. 2006) (internal citations omitted).

HN39[] In determining whether an amendment should be denied for undue delay, the Court must "focus on the plaintiffs' motives for not amending their complaint to assert [the proposed] claim earlier[.]" Adams v. Gould, 739 F.2d 858, 868 (3d Cir.1984). "There [*75] is no presumptive period in which a motion for leave to amend is deemed 'timely' or in which delay becomes 'undue.'" *Coulson v. Town of Kearny, No. 07-5893, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3711, 2010 WL 331347, 3 (D.N.J. Jan. 19, 2010). "The passage of time, without more, does not require that a motion to amend a complaint be denied; however, at some point, the delay will become 'undue,' placing an unwarranted burden on the court[.]" Adams, 739 F.2d at 868. "Delay may become undue when a movant has had previous opportunities to amend the complaint." Cureton v. NCAA, 252 F.3d 267, 273 (3d Cir.2001). In other words, the Court should also consider whether "new information came to light or was available earlier to the moving party." In re Adams Golf, Inc. Secs. Litig., 381 F.3d 267, 280 (3d Cir. 2004).

HN40[] Allegations of bad faith must pertain to Plaintiff's motives for not amending sooner, not to Plaintiff's alleged litigation strategy. See Adams, 739 F.2d at 868 ("The question of undue delay, as well as the question of bad faith, requires that we focus on the plaintiffs' motives for not amending their complaint to assert this claim earlier; the issue of prejudice requires that we focus on the effect [*76] on the defendants.").

Bankrate argues that Plaintiff's new claims should be dismissed because of BanxCorp's undue delay and bad faith in bringing its current claims, and that "BanxCorp has not added claims it inadvertently omitted, of which it was unaware, or which it only learned of through discovery." (Def. Moving Br. at 27). Rather, it has attempted "to reformulate theories of liability that it has admitted are unsupportable (namely, price-fixing and exclusive dealing), and to change the elements of another claim (predatory pricing) that is implausible as pled. Id. Bankrate also argues that BanxCorp's bad faith is reflected in its pleading the exclusionary conduct claim in a conclusory manner. Id. at 29. "No specific facts are alleged in support of the claim because BanxCorp knows it cannot do so in good faith." Id. BanxCorp does not offer any factual allegations that "explain in any way how Bankrate's agreements with its co-brand[ing] partners prevented BanxCorp and competitors from selling their product to financial service providers." Id. at 30.

BanxCorp responds that there was no undue delay or bad faith on its part in bringing these claims because it could not have raised them [*77] earlier. It argues that the very documents on which its claims in this complaint were based were "secretly kept in the exclusive possession of Defendant and its partners." Further, the passage of time alone did not unfairly disadvantage or deprive Bankrate of the opportunity to present facts or evidence that it would have offered had the claims been raised earlier. (Pl. Opp. Br. at 28-30).

As explained in its discussion of previous decisions in this action, BanxCorp's claims do not appear to be new or different. In this complaint, BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate conspired with its partner-competitors, under § 1, to engage in predatory pricing. Under § 2, BanxCorp alleges that Bankrate unilaterally obtained a monopoly or attempted to obtain a monopoly through predatory pricing and exclusionary conduct. Based on the Court's review of the 3AC, it appears that these claims were also raised in the previous pleading. In that pleading, for example, BanxCorp alleged:

> The centerpiece of this action is a massive predatory pricing and price-fixing conspiracy between Bankrate and 100 of America's leading websites. More specifically, Bankrate has engaged in predatory pricing and price-fixing agreements [*78] with competitors, entered into a market division agreement, and engaged in mergers and acquisitions with other competitors that have helped create and enhance its monopoly power in the relevant market. (3AC ¶ 15).
> Bankrate's exclusionary conduct has effectively boxed BanxQuote and other competitors out of the market for Bank Rate Websites. The few remaining competitors in the relevant market at the moment are weak and increasingly starved of opportunities to attract meaningful traffic, transaction volume, and revenues. (Id. ¶ 100).
> Bankrate's exclusionary practices, combined with its monopoly power, have been used by Defendant as leverage to gain market share, foreclose competition, and potentially extend its dominance beyond the relevant market. (Id. ¶ 107(p)).

The sufficiency of that pleading is not for this Court to determine. The Court is satisfied that these claims and theories were raised before and were not dismissed by Judge Wigenton. See *"BanxCorp II", 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 84151 at 2 (holding that predatory price-fixing conspiracy and exclusive dealing theory were adequately pled).

As to Bankrate's argument that BanxCorp has acted in bad faith by pleading the exclusionary conduct theory in a [*79] conclusory manner, the Court has already determined that this theory, as it relates to the § 2 claims, has been adequately pled and therefore the bad faith issue is moot.

Finally, the Court notes Bankrate's frustration with BanxCorp's pleading strategy:

> Given that this is BanxCorp's fifth attempt to plead the complaint, what was once deemed as sloppy pleading can now be seen for the strategic ploy that it is. BanxCorp uses imprecision and vagueness in order to intentionally muddle its pleadings to make the motion to challenge the pleading more complex, and as an excuse to expand the scope of discovery beyond the relevant market identified in interrogatories. Underlying all else, BanxCorp uses imprecision to keep an avenue open, so that when BanxCorp later decides on a new permutation of a theory of liability, it will point to a stray allegation in the complaint as a purported basis for the new theory. It should not be allowed to continue that game. (Def. Moving Br. at 31).

BanxCorp should take heed that the Court will not be amenable to any attempts by BanxCorp to shift its theories of liability this late in the game. But, for the foregoing reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiff has [*80] not unduly delayed in bringing the claims.

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Defendant's motion is GRANTED as to the First Claim and DENIED as to the Second, Third, and Fifth claims. Plaintiff's § 1 predatory pricing conspiracy claim is dismissed without prejudice. The Court grants BanxCorp fifteen days to amend its First Claim, and only its first claim. An appropriate Order will follow.

BUMB, United States District Judge:

Plaintiff Deborah Heart and Lung Center ("Plaintiff"), a not-for-profit charity hospital, alleges two claims against the Defendants - Virtua Health, Inc. and Virtua Memorial Hospital Burlington County (the [*2] "Virtua Defendants"), Presbyterian Medical Center of the University of Pennsylvania Health System, University of Pennsylvania Health System, Penn Cardiac Care at Cherry Hill, and Clinical Health Care Associates of New Jersey, P.C. (the "Penn Defendants"), and The Cardiology Group, P.A. ("Defendant CGPA").

First, Plaintiff claims that the Defendants conspired with one another, in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, to exclude Plaintiff from the market for certain critical, advanced cardiac interventional procedures, thereby restricting consumers' choice of providers for these procedures, and forcing consumers to pay higher prices.

Second, Plaintiff claims that these efforts were part of an overlapping conspiracy by the Defendants, in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, for the Virtua Defendants to monopolize the market for emergent/primary angioplasties - a submarket of the larger market for advanced cardiac interventional procedures that is the subject of the first alleged conspiracy. Defendants have moved to dismiss on a number of grounds. [1]

For the reasons that follow, Defendants' motion to dismiss is DENIED with respect to Plaintiff's Section 1 claim and GRANTED with respect to Plaintiff's Section 2 Claim.

I. Background

A. The Plaintiff

Plaintiff is a 139-bed hospital located in Burlington County, New Jersey and is nationally renowned for the quality of its cardiology and pulmonary services, as well as its high scores for patient satisfaction. [2] Uniquely, Plaintiff is one of only three hospitals in the United States that are legally exempt from collecting insurance co-pays and deductibles from patients. Prior to 2010, Plaintiff lacked an emergency [*4] room and Defendant Virtua Memorial Hospital was the primary and, at times, only emergency room in what Plaintiff contends is the relevant geographic market for emergency care.

B. The Competitive Landscape

Plaintiff competes with the much larger Virtua Defendants, who operate three hospitals in the area with nearly 900 beds. Since 2005, the Virtua Defendants have made Defendant CGPA the exclusive provider of cardiology services at Defendant Virtua Memorial Hospital, one of the three hospitals the Virtua Defendants operate.

Until 2007, the Virtua Defendants were unable, under New Jersey law, which regulates what procedures hospitals may perform based on area need by issuing Certificates of Need, to provide any of the advanced cardiac interventional procedures that are at issue in this litigation. Those procedures fall in to two broad categories: (1) elective - non-emergent angioplasty, electrophysiology, and cardiac surgery (the "Elective Procedures"); and (2) emergency - emergent/primary angioplasty (the "Emergency Procedures"). Plaintiff contends that the relevant geographic [*5] market for the Elective Procedures consists of Burlington County, New Jersey, as well as parts of Atlantic, Camden, Mercer, and Ocean Counties, also in New Jersey, and the Philadelphia area. As for the relevant geographic market for Emergency Procedures, Plaintiff claims that the market is slightly smaller and consists of Burlington County, as well as portions of Camden, Mercer, and Ocean Counties, but not Atlantic County or the Philadelphia area.

[1] In briefing on the motions to dismiss, Plaintiff moved for leave to file a sur-reply in further opposition to the motions, attaching [*3] the sur-reply brief. Plaintiff's attachment of the brief was improper and Plaintiff is cautioned that, going forward, it is to obtain this Court's permission before filing any supplemental briefing. As such, this Court has not considered the improperly filed sur-reply brief. The Court previously exercised its discretion to deny the motion to file the sur-reply brief. See Docket No. 48; *Fenza's Auto, Inc. v. Montagnaro's Inc., No. 10-3336, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29696, 2011 WL 1098993, at 4 (D.N.J. Mar. 21, 2011)("[T]he court has broad discretion to consider supplemental briefing as appropriate and fair.").

[2] The allegations contained in Plaintiff's Amended Complaint are accepted as true for purposes of the motion to dismiss.

Historically, because the Virtua Defendants were largely unable to perform the procedures at issue [3], Virtua transferred patients requiring these procedures to other area hospitals. These hospitals included New Jersey hospitals who had obtained a Certificate of Need, like Plaintiff and two other hospitals who also compete with Plaintiff - Cooper Hospital University Medical Center ("Cooper") and Our Lady of Lourdes Medical Center ("Lourdes"). They also included, for Elective Procedures, Defendant Presbyterian Medical Center of the University of Pennsylvania Health System ("Penn Presbyterian"), a Philadelphia-based hospital, which was entitled to perform the procedures under Pennsylvania law. According to Plaintiff, patients requiring Emergency [*6] Procedures were generally not transferred to Penn Presbyterian because the transit time would have been considered unacceptable due to the need for these patients to receive more immediate care. Most patients, for both Elective and Emergency Procedures, however, were simply transferred to Plaintiff.

All this changed when, according to Plaintiff, the Defendants conspired to exclude Plaintiff and, ultimately, drive it out of business and allow Defendant Virtua Memorial Hospital to monopolize the market for Emergency Procedures.

C. The Alleged Conspiracies

According to Plaintiff, Defendants entered into an anticompetitive conspiracy in 2007 premised on two interlocking written agreements: first, between the Virtua Defendants and Defendant CGPA, making CPGA the exclusive provider of cardiology services at Virtua; and second, between CGPA and the Penn Defendants, making the Penn Defendants the exclusive recommended referral of CGPA. These agreements, Plaintiff contends, form the building blocks [*7] of the larger conspiracies to exclude Plaintiff from receiving transfers from the Virtua Defendants, drive it out of the market, and allow the Virtua Defendants to monopolize the Emergency Procedures market. Plaintiff claims that, as a result of these conspiracies, the Virtua Defendants transferred almost all patients requiring advanced cardiac care to the Penn Defendants. Plaintiff claims that, to enforce this larger agreement, the Virtua Defendants monitored, and reported to the other Defendants, instances of "leakage" - occasions when Virtua Defendants' patients were transferred to other hospitals besides those of the Penn Defendants. [4]

Plaintiff alleges that, in many instances, in contravention of patients' rights under the New Jersey Patients' Bill of Rights, patients of the Virtua Defendants had their requests to transfer to Plaintiff denied, or were coerced not to transfer through the use of false and malicious statements. According to Plaintiff, the Virtua Defendants attempted to compensate for the greater distance to Penn Presbyterian, which previously made Penn an unattractive choice for patients requiring Emergency Procedures, by utilizing helicopter transfers. However, Plaintiff alleges that the helicopter transfers still regularly exceeded medically recommended transfer time limits.

Plaintiff claims that these actions resulted in harm to both Plaintiff and consumers: Plaintiff lost business to the Penn Defendants and consumers faced higher costs, [*9] less choice, and greater medical risk. In particular, according to Plaintiff, patients transferred to the Penn Defendants faced higher fees in the form of: "out of pocket expenses related to insurance co-pays and deductibles and balance billing" which do not occur at Deborah. Medicare, Medicaid, and third party insurers also faced increased costs from lengthier ambulance transportation to Penn Presbyterian and helicopter transport. Patients and insurers were both harmed because, according to Plaintiff, the conspiracy enabled the Penn Defendants to charge supracompetitive prices for the procedures at issue. Finally,

[3] In 2007, the Virtua Defendants, who previously lacked a Certificate of Need to perform any of the procedures at issue, were authorized to perform a limited number of procedures on an emergency basis.

[4] Plaintiff submitted an email discussing a "leakage report" in an exhibit attached to its opposition to the motions to dismiss. Because the exhibit, and Plaintiff's other attachments submitted in opposition to the motion to dismiss, are consistent with the facts plead in the Amended Complaint, this Court may exercise its discretion to consider them without converting the motions to dismiss into motions for summary judgment. Help at Home, Inc. v. Medical Capital, L.L.C., 260 F.3d 748, 752-53 (7th Cir. 2001)("A plaintiff need not put all of the essential [*8] facts in the complaint; he may add them by affidavit or brief in order to defeat a motion to dismiss if the facts are consistent with the allegations of the complaint."(quotation and citation omitted); Kulwicki v. Dawson, 969 F.2d 1454, 1462 (3d Cir. 1992)("A trial judge has the discretion to consider evidence outside the complaint in ruling on motions to dismiss.").

Patients were deprived of their choice in hospital and, in the case of Emergency Procedures, subjected to unnecessary medical risk because of the lengthier transport time.

II. Standard

To survive a motion to dismiss, "a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Sheridan v. NGK Metals Corp., 609 F.3d 239, 262 n.27 (3d Cir. 2010) (quoting Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (internal quotations omitted)). "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual [*10] content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Id. (quoting Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949).

The Court conducts a three-part analysis when reviewing a claim:

> First, the court must take note of the elements a plaintiff must plead to state a claim. Second, the court should identify allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Finally, where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.

Santiago v. Warminster Twp., 629 F.3d 121, 130 (3d Cir. 2010)(quotations and citations omitted); see also Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203, 211 (3d Cir. 2009)(" . . . [A] complaint must do more than allege the plaintiff's entitlement to relief. A complaint has to 'show' such an entitlement with its facts.").

III. Analysis

Plaintiff makes two claims: (1) that Defendants have violated Section 1 of the Sherman Act (conspiracy to restrain trade); and (2) that Defendants have violated Section 2 of the Sherman Act (conspiracy to monopolize the Emergency Procedures market). [*11] [5] Defendants have moved for dismissal of both claims based on lack of antitrust standing and failure to meet the elements of Section 1 and 2 claims. The Court first turns to the standing issue.

A. Plaintiff Has Antitrust Standing To Maintain Its Claims.

Defendants argue that Plaintiff lacks antitrust standing to pursue its claims. The Third Circuit applies a 5-factor test to assess antitrust standing. The factors are:

> (1) the causal connection between the antitrust violation and the harm to the plaintiff and the intent by the defendant to cause that harm, with neither factor alone conferring standing;
> (2) whether the plaintiff's alleged injury is of the type for which the antitrust laws were intended to provide redress;
> (3) the directness of the injury, which addresses the concerns that liberal application of standing principles might produce [*12] speculative claims;
> (4) the existence of more direct victims of the alleged antitrust violations; and
> (5) the potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of damages. Angelico v. Lehigh Valley Hosp., Inc., 184 F.3d 268, 274 (3d Cir. 1999)(citation omitted).

The first two factors relate to whether Plaintiff has suffered an "antitrust injury." See Daniel v. Am. Bd. of Emergency Med., 428 F.3d 408, 443 (2d Cir. 2005). The final three factors relate to whether Plaintiff would be an "efficient enforcer" of the antitrust laws whose interest would be "aligned with those of consumers generally." Id.; *Reddy v. Puma, No. 1:06CV1283, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67848, 2006 WL 2711535, at 5 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 21, 2006).

[5] The Amended Complaint's pleads a Section 2 claim with respect to both the Elective and Emergency Procedures markets. However, in Plaintiff's motion to dismiss opposition briefing, Plaintiff solely addressed the Emergency Procedures market and, at oral argument, Plaintiff confirmed that its Section 2 claim was limited to the Emergency Procedures market.

Importantly, in assessing these factors, this Court assumes the alleged conduct would constitute an antitrust violation. Steamfitters Local Union No. 420 Welfare Fund v. Philip Morris, Inc., 171 F.3d 912, 926 n.7(3d Cir. 1999)("assum[ing] for the sake of assessing plaintiffs' antitrust standing that the conduct in which defendants allegedly engaged would constitute such a violation."); Daniel, 428 F.3d at 437 (assuming that alleged conduct was antitrust violation in assessing antitrust violation to avoid [*13] blurring antitrust standing and merits); *Glaberson v. Comcast Corp., No. 03-6604, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 62672, 2006 WL 2559479, at 4-5 (E.D.Pa. Aug. 31, 2006)(citing Antitrust Law by Phillip E. Areeda and Herbet Hovenkamp for the proposition that "[t]o test standing in a private suit . . . the court should assume the existence of a violation and then ask whether the [standing elements] are shown"). In light of this principle, the "antitrust injury" analysis does not depend on whether Plaintiff has plausibly alleged anticompetitive harm to the market. *St. Clair v. Citizens Financial Group, No. 08-1257, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92135, 2008 WL 4911870, at 5 (D.N.J. Nov. 12, 2008)(holding that harm to the market "is not required for antitrust standing, but instead is relevant to show restraint of trade when proving the merits of an antitrust claim."). That factor goes to the merits and whether a violation occurred, not a plaintiff's standing. Id. Applying these factors, Plaintiff has suffered an antitrust injury and would be an efficient enforcer of the antitrust laws. Plaintiff therefore has antitrust standing.

First, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that Defendants' conspired to harm Plaintiff and that that conspiracy caused Plaintiff harm in [*14] the form of lost patient revenues. Second, Plaintiff's loss of revenues from its exclusion is among the types of harm the antitrust laws were designed to prevent. Angelico, 184 F.3d at 274 ("Turning to the second element, whether Angelico's alleged injury is of the type the antitrust laws were meant to redress, we conclude that the injury he suffered, when shut out of competition for anticompetitive reasons, is indeed among those the antitrust laws were designed to prevent."). Third, Plaintiff's injuries are "clearly [a] direct (and substantial) . . . result of the alleged conspiracy" as patients that likely would have transferred to Plaintiff were instead sent to the Penn Defendants. Id. at 275. Fourth, there are no more direct victims of the alleged conspiracy. Other excluded hospitals are in the same position as Plaintiff. Insurers and individual consumers harmed by the alleged antitrust violations are no more direct and the latter are less likely to sue for this type of violation, absent a class action, given the small amount of damages each would have sustained on an individual basis. Fifth, and finally, there is no potential for duplicative recovery or complex apportionment of [*15] damages since the other hospitals and consumers would have wholly separate and independent damages. Id. More generally, Plaintiff's interest is aligned with consumers because both are interested in protecting consumer choice and access to a lower cost and, in the case of Emergency Procedures, medically superior hospital.

Therefore, Plaintiff has antitrust standing to maintain its claims and this Court must turn to whether Plaintiff has plausibly alleged the elements of its antitrust claims.

B. Plaintiff Has Plausibly Alleged A Section 1 Claim.

"To establish a violation of Section 1, a plaintiff must prove: (1) concerted action by the defendants; (2) that produced anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets; (3) that the concerted actions were illegal; and (4) that it was injured as a proximate result of the concerted action." *Black Box Corp. v. Avaya, Inc., No. 07-6161, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72821, 2008 WL 4117844, at 7 (D.N.J. Aug. 29, 2008)(quotation and citation omitted). Defendants have vigorously challenged Plaintiff's allegations with respect to each of these elements. However, because Plaintiff has satisfied each of these elements, Defendants' motions will be denied.

1. Plaintiff [*16] Has Plausibly Alleged Concerted Action By The Defendants.

"Concerted action is established where two or more distinct entities have agreed to take action against the plaintiff." Gordon v. Lewistown Hosp., 423 F.3d 184, 204 (3d Cir. 2005). Entities agree where they share "a unity of purpose, a common design and understanding, a meeting of the minds, or a conscious commitment to a common scheme." West Penn Allegheny Health System, Inc. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010). Agreement may be plead through "direct or circumstantial evidence, or a combination of the two." Id.

Plaintiff has adequately plead, through both direct and circumstantial evidence, that Defendants are engaging in concerted action to exclude Plaintiff from receiving patient transfer from the Virtua Defendants. Directly, Plaintiff has demonstrated that there are two interlocking written agreements: first, between the Virtua Defendants and Defendant CGPA, making CPGA the exclusive provider of cardiology services at Virtua; and second, between CGPA and the Penn Defendants, making the Penn Defendants the exclusive recommended referral of CGPA. According to Plaintiff, these interlocking agreements, in practice, make the [*17] Penn Defendants the exclusive advanced cardiac procedural referral of the Virtua Defendants. This direct evidence of agreement is supported by four strong pieces of circumstantially pled evidence: (1) the powerful shift in the Virtua Defendants' transfer pattern (Am. Compl. ¶¶ 75, 77); (2) that the shift in patients needing Emergency Procedures was made despite increased medical risks and costs (Am. Compl. ¶¶ 181-185, 208); (3) coercive conduct by the Virtua Defendants and CGPA to prevent patients from exercising their choice of hospital, in the face of a statutory obligation to allow that very choice (Am. Compl. ¶¶ 78-174) [6]; and (4) the Defendants' dissemination and discussion of leakage reports. (See Certification of Thomas Kane in Support of Plaintiff's Opposition to Motions to Dismiss, Ex. D).

The Virtua Defendants and CGPA argue that Plaintiff has failed to establish concerted action because Plaintiff failed to show that the events at issue are more plausibly the result of concerted action than of parallel conduct because they lacked an economic motive to engage in the alleged concerted action. The Court rejects that argument for three reasons.

First, Defendants overstate the Plaintiff's burden on a motion to dismiss. To survive a motion to dismiss, a plaintiff's "allegations need not rule out all potential alternative explanations" and instead must only adduce enough factual material taken as true to plausibly suggest an agreement was made. See *In re Magnesium Oxide Antitrust Litig., No. 10-54983, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 121373, 2011 WL 5008090, at 15 (D.N.J. Oct. 20, 2011). As described above, Plaintiff has plainly met this burden.

Second, Plaintiff has, in fact, plausibly and specifically alleged economic incentive from these Defendants. The Virtua Defendants and CGPA both stood to gain from the potential elimination of a rival. In an e-mail, CGPA's President contemplated the possibility of Plaintiff being driven out of business and hypothesized that that process could be [*19] accelerated by no longer transferring certain cardiac patients there. Plaintiff's exit from the market would result in new patients and an enhanced possibility of the Virtua Defendants being awarded a Certificate of Need to perform additional cardiac interventional procedures - a possibility the Virtua Defendants are alleged to have considered and studied.

Third, these Defendants have failed to offer a plausible explanation that the events at issue were the result of independent conduct, rather than the result of an agreement.

Finally, the Penn Defendants argue that a Section 1 claim requires, and they lacked, a unity of purpose with the other Defendants, since the alleged goal of their co-defendants was to shutdown Deborah, and their economic motivation was not predicated on Deborah's shutdown, but on a the "influx of new patients" as a result of the transfers - a legitimate business interest. But the complaint need not have alleged "that the parties to an agreement had identical motives" or that a party's motive was anti-competitive - only that they "had a plausible reason to participate in the conspiracy." *Trans World Techs., Inc. v. Raytheon Co., No. 06-5012, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 82118, 2007 WL 3243941, at 4 (D.N.J. Nov. 1, 2007); [*20] Paladin Assocs., Inc. v. Montana Power Co., 328 F.3d 1145, 1153-54 (9th Cir. 2003)(holding that the plaintiff "need not prove intent to control prices or destroy competition to demonstrate the element of an agreement . . . among two or more entities.")(quotation and citation omitted). [7] Therefore, even if the Penn Defendants had no desire to eliminate Plaintiff and were merely motivated

[6] The Penn Defendants contend that the alleged coercive conduct amounts to no more than "garden-variety business torts" that do not rise to the level of antitrust claims. That some of the conduct allegedly employed by Defendants in furtherance of the alleged antitrust conspiracy was also tortious is immaterial to the viability of Plaintiff's antitrust claims. Tortious and anticompetitive conduct [*18] are not mutually exclusive.

[7] See also Petruzzi's IGA Supermarkets v. Darling-Delaware Co., 998 F.2d 1224, 1243 (3d Cir. 1993)("However, we have made it clear that the defendants need not share the same motive. Rather, all that is required is they each have a motive to conspire."); Acme Markets, Inc. v. Wharton Hardware and Supply Corp., 890 F. Supp. 1230, 1239 (D.N.J. 1995)(holding [*21] that alleged co-conspirators may have "independent motivations" so long as they "acted in concert to restrain competition through their

by economic self-interest, Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that the Penn Defendants participated in the alleged conspiracy and their reason for participation: the large influx of new patients. Fineman v. Armstrong World Indus., Inc., 980 F.2d 171, 212-14 (3d Cir. 1992)(explaining that a conspirator in a scheme to eliminate plaintiff did not need to share a commitment to the elimination of the rival and could instead simply be motivated by its own financial incentives).

Accordingly, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged the first element of a Section 1 claim.

2. Plaintiff Has Plausibly Alleged Anticompetitive Effects Within The Relevant Product And Geographic Markets.

A plaintiff may demonstrate that concerted action produced adverse, anticompetitive effects within the relevant product and geographic markets in two ways: (1) through direct evidence of actual anticompetitive effects; or (2) through proof of the defendant's market power, which acts as a proxy for anticompetitive effect. Deutscher Tennis Bund v. ATP Tour, Inc., 610 F.3d 820, 830 (3d Cir. 2010). [8]

While, in both cases, a plaintiff must make some showing of a relevant market, where a plaintiff demonstrates direct evidence of actual anticompetitive effects, the plaintiff's burden is diminished and it must only demonstrate "the rough contours of a relevant market." *In re Compensation of Managerial Professional and Technical Employees Antitrust Litig., No. 02-CV-2924, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63633, 2008 WL 3887619, at 7 (D.N.J. Aug. 20, 2008)(quotation omitted). Actual anticompetitive effects can be shown through reduced output, increased prices, decreased quality, and loss of consumer choice. [9] Tunis Bros. Co. v. Ford Motor Co., 952 F.2d 715, 728 (3d Cir. 1991)("An antitrust plaintiff must prove that challenged conduct affected the prices, quantity or quality of goods or services.)(quotation and citation omitted); Acme Markets, 890 F. Supp. at 1240 (same); [*24] United States v. Brown Univ. in Providence in State of Rhode Island, 5. F.3d 658, 675 (3d Cir. 1993)(noting that "[e]nhancement of consumer choice is a traditional objective of the antitrust laws and has also been acknowledged as a procompetitive benefit."); Rome Ambulatory Surgical Center LLC v. Rome Memorial Hosp., Inc., 349 F. Supp. 2d 389, 410 (N.D.N.Y. 2004)(recognizing loss of consumer choice as a significant injury to competition).

common objective of enforcing the restrictive covenant."); *In re Processed Egg Prods. Antitrust Litig., No. 08-md-02002, 821 F. Supp. 2d 709, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 109641, 2011 WL 4465355, at 7 (E.D.Pa. Sept. 26, 2011(holding that even reluctant co-conspirators may be held liable and that "the issue is whether the pleading delineates to some sufficiently specific degree that a defendant purposefully joined and participated in the conspiracy.").

[8] Defendants argue that, in order to demonstrate competitive harm, Plaintiff [*22] was required, and failed, to demonstrate that the alleged exclusionary conduct resulted in a significant market foreclosure. But market foreclosure analysis, like market power analysis, is merely a surrogate for a demonstration of actual anticompetitive effect. Jonathan M. Jacobson, Exclusive Dealing, "Foreclosure," And Consumer Harm, 70 ANTITRUST L.J. 311, 362 (2002). As Jonathan Jacobson, former member of the Congressional Antitrust Modernization Commission, persuasively writes:

> But just as foreclosure is no more a magic wand for plaintiffs, neither does the absence of "substantial foreclosure" provide a defense for firms whose exclusive dealing practices in fact threaten significant harm. The foreclosure concept was developed as a useful proxy for analyzing harm to competition. If "substantial foreclosure" was shown, the courts presumed that the competitive process had been damaged and the restraint was condemned accordingly. As the sophistication of antitrust analysis has increased, however, the foreclosure proxy has been found inadequate. A large amount of percentage foreclosure, without more, proves nothing, but the absence of percentage foreclosure is equally unilluminating. [*23] In all cases, the relevant question is instead whether there has been an adverse effect on price, output, quality, choice, or innovation in the market as a whole. Id.

As described below, Plaintiff has adequately alleged actual anticompetitive effect, obviating any need for a demonstration of market foreclosure.

[9] Defendants argue that Plaintiff cannot demonstrate anticompetitive effects because Plaintiff cannot show reduced output. However, reduced output is just one method of demonstrating anticompetitive harm. New York Medscan LLC v. New York University School of Medicine, 430 F. Supp. 2d 140, 146 (S.D.N.Y. 2006)("A plaintiff asserts harm to competition by alleging adverse effects on the price, quality, or output of the relevant good or service.")(emphasis added); Angelico, 184 F.3d at 276 (3d Cir. 1999)(same).

Because the Court concludes that Plaintiff has plausibly alleged direct anticompetitive effects, there is no need to, and the Court will not, separately assess whether Plaintiff adequately alleged market power.

a. Plaintiff Plausibly Alleged Competitive Harm

While Plaintiff's allegations of supracompetitive [*25] pricing for the procedures at issue are too conclusory to be credited [10], Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged competitive harm in the form of: (1) higher prices through co-pays and related expenses and increased transportation costs, particularly helicopter transport costs; (2) reduced quality of care in Emergency Procedures, where Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that the increased transport time may cause adverse medical outcomes [11]; and (3) loss of consumer choice as Plaintiff is removed as an option for Virtua patients, even in cases where they request to be transferred there but are denied. *Farina v. United Parcel Service, MDL-1339, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14049, 2002 WL 1766554, at 10 (S.D.N.Y. July 31, 2002)(holding that denial of ability to purchase from lower-priced competitor was anticompetitive harm); *Bearing Distributors, Inc. v. Rockwell Automation, Inc., No. 06-CV-831, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 67327, 2006 WL 2709779, at 7 (N.D.Oh. Sept. 20, 2006)(holding that removal of lower-priced, superior service product from market was antitrust harm). These are real competitive harms to a significant population.

They do not reflect, [*27] as Defendants alternately contend: (1) a de minimis, non-cognizable harm to competition; (2) a harmless substitution of one provider of the procedures at issue - Plaintiff - for another - the Penn Defendants; or (3) "increased competition" from the Penn Defendants. Those conclusions do not follow. Prior to the alleged conspiracy, the Penn Defendants competed freely with Plaintiff and other hospitals in the area. Once the conspiracy began, however, Plaintiff alleges that it was largely excluded from competition. Thus, the diversion of patients at issue was not the product of increased competition from the Penn Defendants, who were already competitors, but the exclusion of Plaintiff. That exclusion was harmful, not harmless, to consumers for the reasons detailed above and affected a significant harm on the market. Plaintiff has therefore, contrary to Defendants' arguments otherwise, satisfied its burden to show anticompetitive harm that was more than a de minimis restraint of trade. Tunis, 952 F.2d at 728.

Defendants also argue that the higher prices patients transferred to the Penn Defendants pay, through co-pays and other payments that they do not need to pay at Plaintiff, cannot constitute [*28] a competitive harm because: (1) they are the product of a regulatory anomaly rather than Plaintiff's competitive merits; (2) the regulatory exemption is itself anti-competitive; and (3) holding otherwise would mean that any transfer, other than to Plaintiff, could constitute a competitive harm. On the first issue, Defendants have cited no authority, and this Court can find none, suggesting that it would be improper to find anticompetitive harm because of Plaintiff's admitted regulatory advantage. [12] Defendants' argument wrongly places the focus on whether Plaintiff is competing on the merits, when [10] See *Burns v. Lavender Hill Herb Farm, Inc., No. Civ.A 01-7019, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7559, 2005 WL 1006321, at 3 (E.D.Pa. Apr. 28, 2005)(rejecting conclusory [*26] allegations of higher prices); *Process Controls Int'l, Inc. v. Emerson Process Mgmt., No: 4:10CV645, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 9405, 2011 WL 403121, at 4 (E.D.Mo. Feb. 1, 2011)(same).

[11] At oral argument, the Virtua Defendants contended that there are two time-based components to ensuring proper medical care for these procedures: the transport time to the hospital and the time, once at the hospital, before a patient receives the proper treatment. They argued that the Amended Complaint alleges only that the transport time is shorter for transfer to Deborah and, without allegations as to wait time at Deborah, does not plausibly establish that transfer to Penn subject patients to unnecessary medical risks. This is an overly technical reading of the Amended Complaint. Plaintiff has, particularly in light of the historic practice of transferring patients to it, plausibly alleged that there are no medical issues that prevent transport to it from Virtua. It is a fair inference from these allegations, and the allegations that Defendants' practice subjects patients to unnecessary medical risk, that there is no issue with hospital waiting time at Deborah that would negate its transportation time advantage.

[12] The Court ordered supplemental briefing on this issue. Defendants' authority submitted in response is inapposite. In Schuylkill Energy Resources v. Pa. Power & Light Co., 113 F.3d 405 (3d Cir. 1997), the Court rejected an energy supplier's contention that a utility company's failure to purchase energy from it resulted in a higher rates to consumers on two grounds. Id. at 414-15. First, the court found that the utility's rates were determined by regulators, not the marketplace, and therefore any complaints were properly directed to regulatory authorities. Id. Defendants have not identified any corresponding authority here that would make antitrust law is concerned, as evidenced by the required elements of a Section 1 claim, with Defendants' conduct and its effect on competition. Given these facts and antitrust law's strong emphasis on promoting lower prices for consumers [13], this Court finds that the higher prices patients pay can constitute an anticompetitive harm. On the second issue, similar logic applies: Defendants' conduct and its effect on competition is at issue in this litigation, not the merits of the exemption. On the third issue, competitive harm would not arise, based on the Court's interpretation, in every transfer. [*29] It is only implicated where, as here, it is the product of an exclusionary transfer policy. In any event, even if these higher prices were not credited as antitrust injuries, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged meaningful competitive harms to consumer choice and, with respect to Emergency Procedures, loss in quality.

Finally, Defendants argue that the alleged agreement is not anticompetitive, and therefore there is no anticompetitive harm, because there is no duty to cooperate. But the anticompetitive harm alleged is the exclusion of Plaintiff as a choice for patients, not that Defendants have an affirmative [*31] obligation to direct patients to Plaintiff, or give Plaintiff access to Defendants' patients.

b. Plaintiff Has Met Its Burden To Allege Relevant Markets.

Plaintiff has also sufficiently alleged, at a minimum, the rough contours of the marketplace for both the Elective and Emergency Procedures. For the former, Plaintiff has adequately alleged a marketplace in Southern New Jersey and Philadelphia. For the latter, Plaintiff has adequately alleged a more restricted geographic market, which excludes Philadelphia, in light of the need for patients needing emergency treatment to receive more rapid care and the alleged greater transport time in transit to Philadelphia. That the Virtua Defendants are, in fact, transferring patients to the Penn Defendants in Philadelphia for Emergency Procedures does not disturb this analysis. Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that Philadelphia hospitals are not a suitable medical alternative and that patients are only being transferred there as a result of the conspiracy. It is therefore plausible that Philadelphia is not part of the relevant market. In any event, regardless of whether Philadelphia is part of the market for Emergency Procedures, Plaintiff's allegations [*32] certainly allege the "rough" market contours required in a direct evidence case.

3. Plaintiff Has Plausibly Alleged That The Concerted Action Was Illegal.

Concerted action that unreasonably restrains trade is illegal. American Needle, Inc. v. Nat'l Football League, 130 S.Ct. 2201, 2212, 176 L. Ed. 2d 947 (2010). "At the pleading stage, a plaintiff may satisfy the unreasonable-restraint element by alleging that the conspiracy produced anticompetitive effects in the relevant markets." West Penn, 627 F.3d at 100. As discussed above, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged competitive harm. Therefore, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that Defendants' concerted actions were illegal.

4. Plaintiff Has Plausibly Alleged That It Was Injured As A Proximate Result Of The Concerted Action.

Plaintiff has alleged that it has lost revenues because patients who would have sought treatment at its hospital are instead diverted to the Penn Defendants as the result of Defendants' conspiracy. Therefore, Plaintiff has plausibly alleged that it was injured, in the form of lost patients and revenues, as a proximate result of Defendant's concerted actions.

antitrust review inappropriate Second, the plaintiff there was found to be only a supplier to the utility, not its competitor, so could not participate in the market for consumers. Id. at 415. Plaintiff here, in contrast, is in direct competition [*30] with Defendants. In In re Canadian Imp. Antitrust Litig., 470 F.3d 785 (8th Cir. 2006), the court found that prescription drug purchasers failed to allege anti-competitive conduct where they alleged that drug companies acted to prevent the importation of cheaper brand name drugs from Canada. Id. at 791 There, unlike here, the inability to access a cheaper alternative was caused, at the start, by government regulations, not the Defendants' exclusionary conduct. Id. at 791-92. The plaintiffs there could not allege, as Plaintiff can here, "that prior to the alleged anti-competitive conduct of the defendants" consumers had access to the cheaper alternative. Id. at 792.

[13] See Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 223, 113 S. Ct. 2578, 125 L. Ed. 2d 168 (1993)(holding, in the predatory pricing context, that "[l]ow prices benefit consumer regardless of how those prices are set")(quotation and citation omitted).

C. Plaintiff Has Failed To Plausibly Allege A Section 2 Claim.

The elements of a conspiracy [*33] to monopolize include at least three elements: "(1) a combination or conspiracy; (2) an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy; and (3) specific intent to monopolize." *Black Box, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 72821, 2008 WL 4117844, at 8. Courts are divided on whether a fourth element - a dangerous probability of successful monopolization - is required to establish the claim. Id. This Court agrees with those courts that have concluded that a dangerous probability of success is not required. [14] As the Second Circuit has held:

> Congress outlawed the conspiracy itself. Once a plaintiff establishes a conspiracy with a specific intent to monopolize, proof of success or impending success is irrelevant.

Int'l Distribution Centers, Inc. v. Walsh Trucking Co., Inc., 812 F.2d 786, 796 n. 8 (2d Cir. 1987)(citations omitted).

However, while a dangerous probability of success is not a required element, the likelihood of success may be highly significant to whether the defendants could plausibly have had the specific intent to monopolize the market at issue. Emigra Group v. Fragomen, Del Rey, Bernsen & Loewy, 612 F. Supp. 2d 330, 363 (S.D.N.Y. 2009)("And while rigorous proof of a relevant market and the likelihood of monopolization is not required in this Circuit on a conspiracy to monopolize claim, the relevant market and the likelihood of its monopolization may have a significant bearing on whether the requisite specific intent to monopolize is present."); Virginia Vermiculite Ltd. V. W.R. Grace & Co., 144 F. Supp. 2d 558, 592 (W.D.Va. 2001)("But where actions are ambiguous the existence and extent of market power may make the inference of specific intent from conduct more or less plausible.")(quotation and citation omitted). That specific intent to monopolize must be more than knowing and must be shared by all the conspirators. ID Security Systems Canada, Inc. v. Checkpoint Systems, Inc., 249 F. Supp. 2d 622, 660 (E.D.Pa. 2003)(holding [*35] that the alleged co-conspirators must share the intent that would-be-monopolist obtain a monopoly); Int'l Distribution, 812 F.2d at 796 (same); In re Microsoft Corp. Antitrust Litig., 127 F. Supp. 2d 728, 731 (D.Md. 2001)("[Specific intent] signifies something more than willing, voluntary, and knowing participation in the illegal course of conduct . . . . It means participating in that course of conduct for the specific, shared purpose of [monopolization].").

Plaintiff alleges that Defendants conspired with the intent that the Virtua Defendants monopolize the market for Emergency Procedures. At the time Defendants allegedly entered into the conspiracy (Plaintiff alleges it began sometime in 2007), the Virtua Defendants had either no ability, or very limited ability, to perform any of the Emergency Procedures at issue. And any future ability to perform these procedures depended on Virtua obtaining a Certificate of Need from the state. Virtua also faced robust competition from at least Plaintiff, Cooper, and Lourdes.

Against this backdrop, Defendants argue that successful monopolization of the Emergency Procedures market is, and was, implausible and, with respect to the Penn Defendants [*36] and CGPA, there is no reason why they these entities would support a monopoly by Virtua. Therefore, Defendants argue, it is implausible that they would have had the intent that the Virtua Defendants monopolize the relevant Emergency Procedures market. Plaintiff counters that there are plausible economic reasons why Defendants could have shared such intent. Plaintiff misapprehends its burden. It is not sufficient that there may be some plausible reasons that Defendants could have shared the requisite intent. Plaintiff must instead advance factual allegations to render it plausible that Defendants did share the requisite intent.

Plaintiff has failed to meet this burden. On the allegations before the Court in Plaintiff's Amended Complaint, successful monopolization of the Emergency Procedures market was implausible given the competitive landscape and that the Virtua Defendants were not even approved for such Procedures, let alone participants in the market. In the face of these allegations, which are highly suggestive of a lack of specific intent, Plaintiff has failed to offer more than conclusory allegations of specific intent and argument why the Defendants rationally could have possessed [*37] such intent. Plaintiff has not offered non-conclusory allegations suggesting that Defendants did have such intent. Plaintiff has thus failed to plausibly allege that Defendants shared a specific intent for the Virtua Defendants to monopolize the Emergency Procedures market. Therefore, Plaintiff has failed to plausibly allege a Section 2 claim.

[14] At oral argument, Plaintiff articulated its belief that it was, in fact, obligated to demonstrate a dangerous probability of successful monopolization. While the Court does not adopt this standard because it believes that standard is incorrect, the differing standards are immaterial here. The same facts, discussed below, that demonstrate the implausibility of Defendants having the intent to successfully monopolize, [*34] would also render implausible Plaintiff's claim that Defendants had a dangerous probability of success.

IV. Conclusion

For all these reasons, Defendants' motions to dismiss Plaintiff's Section 1 claim is DENIED and Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's Section 2 claim is GRANTED. Plaintiff's Section 2 Claim is dismissed without prejudice.

ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART MOTION TO DISMISS PLAINTIFFS' FIRST AMENDED COMPLAINT; GRANTING LEAVE TO AMEND; CONTINUING CASE MANAGEMENT CONFERENCE

INTRODUCTION

This matter comes before the Court upon consideration of the Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' First Amended Complaint filed by Defendants eBay Corporation ("eBay") and PayPal, Inc. ("PayPall") (collectively "Defendants") The Court has considered the parties' papers, relevant legal authority, and the record in this case, and it previously found the matter suitable for disposition without oral argument and vacated the hearing on the motion. See N.D. Civ. L.R. 7-1(b). The Court HEREBY GRANTS IN PART AND DENIES, IN PART, Defendants' motion.

BACKGROUND

On April 12, 2010, Plaintiffs, Charlotte Smith, Art and Lee Beltrone, Paul Jackson, James [*2] and Jean Mountain, and Rex and Patti Stark (collectively "Plaintiffs") filed their original class action complaint against eBay and PayPal. On September 28, 2011, Plaintiffs filed the First Amended Class Action Complaint ("FAC"), in which they allege Defendants violated Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Plaintiffs assert five claims for relief against the Defendants: (1) abuse of monopoly power and monopoly maintenance in the market for online payment systems for use in online auctions; (2) attempted monopolization of the market for online payment systems for use in online auctions; (3) unlawful tying under Section 2 of the Sherman Act; (4) unlawful tying under Section 1 of the Sherman Act; and (5) "improper collection of shipping fees as part of final value fee."

Plaintiffs allege that eBay is "the largest online auction/sales service in ... the United States, controlling in excess of an estimated 90% of the national online auction market." (FAC ¶ 23.) On October 3, 2002, eBay acquired PayPal, which is the largest online payment system. Plaintiffs allege that this acquisition "eliminated competition and expanded [eBay's] own market dominance," such that eBay "possesses effective [*3] monopoly power in online auction markets." (Id. ¶ 24; see also id. ¶ 34 (alleging that acquisition "had the effect of eliminating competition in the market for online payment systems").) Plaintiffs also allege that eBay has acted through PayPal to monopolize the forms of payments that sellers can use on eBay and has "limited and banned competitors in an attempt to maintain its dominance in the online auction market." (Id. ¶ 25.)

Each of the Plaintiffs allege that they are "'seller[s]' utilizing Defendant's [sic] online auction/sales services and [are] forced to pay fees both to eBay for listing and selling items, and to eBay through the use of PayPal." (Id. ¶¶ 5-14.) According to Plaintiffs, in order to maximize bids on a product sold in an online auction, it is in the seller's interest to provide as many payment means as possible. Plaintiffs allege that eBay's Accepted Payment Policy prohibits sellers, inter alia, from asking buyers to contact them for additional payment methods, or asking buyers to use a method a seller has not included in her or her listing. (Id. ¶¶ 44-45.) Plaintiffs allege that if eBay believes a seller has violated the Accepted Payment Policy, eBay will remove [*4] the seller's listing and may restrict his or her selling privileges. (Id. ¶ 47.) However, none of the Plaintiffs allege that eBay has taken such action against them.

Plaintiffs also allege that, although eBay purports to offer payments methods that are alternatives to PayPal, eBay has made PayPal the only viable payment option for sellers. (Id. ¶¶ 48-50.) Thus, according to Plaintiffs, in addition to paying eBay for listing and sales fees, sellers are forced to pay eBay additional fees when they use PayPal. (Id. ¶ 51.) "eBay's dominant position in the market for online payment systems for use with online auctions, and use of affirmative anticompetitive activity, has ensured, however, that there are functionally no other real choices for online payment on eBay besides PayPal." (Id. ¶ 30; see also id. ¶¶ 36-43.) Plaintiffs claim that these actions and eBay's Accepted Payment Policies "effectively limit" sellers to accepting payments only through eBay owned PayPal, which creates an improper tying arrangement between eBay's on-line auction services and PayPal's on-line payment services. (See id. ¶¶ 26, 81-106.) Plaintiffs also allege that as a result of eBay's conduct they "have paid or [*5] are likely to pay artificially inflated and supra competitive [sic] fees to eBay by paying for both listing, selling and PayPal charges." (Id. ¶ 74.b, 85, 88.b.)

Finally, Plaintiffs allege that in April 2011, eBay changed the structure of its "final value fee," and it calculated that fee using both the dollar value of the item sold and the shipping fees incurred, even though eBay does not provide shipping services, the costs of which are born either by the buyer or the seller. (Id. ¶¶ 52-58.)

ANALYSIS

A. Applicable Legal Standard.

A motion to dismiss is proper under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) where the pleadings fail to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The complaint is construed in the light most favorable to the non-moving party and all material allegations in the complaint are taken to be true. Sanders v. Kennedy, 794 F.2d 478, 481 (9th Cir. 1986). However, even under the liberal pleading standard of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), "a plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitle[ment] to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) [*6] (citing Papasan v. Allain, 478 U.S. 265, 286, 106 S. Ct. 2932, 92 L. Ed. 2d 209 (1986)). A statute of limitations defense may be raised by a motion to dismiss where the running of the applicable limitations period is apparent on the face of the complaint. Jablon v. Dean Witter & Co., 614 F.2d 677, 682 (9th Cir. 1980).

Pursuant to Twombly, a plaintiff must not merely allege conduct that is conceivable but must instead allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Id. at 570. "A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556). "The plausibility standard is not akin to a probability requirement, but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.... When a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief." Id. (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556-57) (internal quotation marks omitted). If the allegations are insufficient [*7] to state a claim, a court should grant leave to amend, unless amendment would be futile. See, e.g., Reddy v. Litton Indus., Inc., 912 F.2d 291, 296 (9th Cir. 1990); Cook, Perkiss & Liehe, Inc. v. N. Cal. Collection Serv., Inc., 911 F.2d 242, 246-47 (9th Cir. 1990).

B. Plaintiffs' Claims Are Not Barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Defendants move to dismiss each of Plaintiffs' claims on the basis that they are barred by the statute of limitations. Under the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.§ 15b, private antitrust claims are subject to a four-year statute of limitations. See Hennegan v. Pacifico Creative Serv., Inc., 787 F.2d 1299, 1300 (9th Cir. 1986). "A civil cause of action under the [antitrust laws] arises at each time the plaintiff's interest is invaded to his damage, and the statute of limitations begins to run at that time." AMF, Inc. v. General Motors Corp., 591 F.2d 68, 70 (9th Cir. 1979) (quoting Twin City Sportservice, Inc. v. Charles O. Finley & Co., 512 F.2d 1264, 1270 (9th Cir. 1975)). Plaintiffs filed their original complaint on April 12, 2010, so any antitrust claim that is based on conduct that occurred prior to April 12, 2006 would be barred. Defendants argue that Plaintiffs [*8] claims are based upon eBay's acquisition of PayPal in October 2002 and, thus, are barred. Plaintiffs argue, in turn, that they have alleged conduct that falls within the "continuing violations" theory and, thus, the claims are timely.[1]

In antitrust law, "[a] continuing violation is one in which the plaintiff's interests are repeatedly invaded and a cause of action arises each time the plaintiff is injured." Pace Industries, Inc. v. Three Phoenix Co., 813 F.2d 234, 237 (9th Cir. 1987) (citation omitted); see also AMF, 591 F.2d at 71. It is clear, however, that "a continuation of harm to plaintiffs alone will not keep the cause of action alive without some overt act or continuing conduct of defendants during the limitations period." Electroglas, Inc. v. Dynatex Corp., 497 F. Supp. 97, 105 (N.D. Cal. 1980).[2] "When a continuing violation exists, the limitations period runs from the 'last overt act' by the defendant, which must be (1) a new and independent act that is not merely a reaffirmation of a previous decision that (2) inflicts a 'new and accumulating' injury on the plaintiff." [*9] Red Lion Medical Safety Inc. v. Ohmeda, Inc., 63 F. Supp. 2d 1218, 1223 (E.D. Cal. 1999) (citing Pace Industries, 813 F.2d at 238). "'New and independent acts' may include active enforcement of policies first put into place outside the limitations period." Red Lion, 63 F. Supp. 2d at 1223 (citing Columbia Steel Casting Co. v. Portland General Elec. Co., 111 F.3d 1427, 1444-45 (9th Cir. 1996)).

[1] Plaintiffs do not rely on any other legal theory to argue that the statute of limitations should be tolled.

[2] Any harm that accrues after the tolling of the statute of limitations periods but that is associated with an overt act that occurred prior to the limitations period is not remediable. However, "each separate cause of action that so accrues [during the statute of limitations period] entitles a plaintiff to recover not only those damages which he has suffered at the date of accrual, but also those which he will suffer in the future from the particular invasion, including what he has suffered during and will predictably suffer after trial." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 401 U.S. 321, 338-39, 91 S. Ct. 795, 28 L. Ed. 2d 77 (1971).

1. The Tying Claims.

Plaintiffs' tying claims are based on the theory that they have been injured by eBay's alleged attempts to tie use of its online auction services to PayPal's online [*10] payment services. "To restart the statute of limitations in a tying situation, [a plaintiff] must show that [a defendant] 'had the ability [to] and actually did enforce the tie' during the limitations period." Eichman v. Fotomat, 880 F.2d 149, 160 (9th Cir. 1989) (quoting Airweld, Inc. v. Arco, Inc., 742 F.2d 1184, 1190 (9th Cir. 1984)." However, the continued purchase of a defendants' product or services does not constitute a "new and independent" act that would restart the statute of limitations. *See, e.g., Stanislaus Food Products Co. v. USS-POSCO Indus., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, 2010 WL 3521979, at 16 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2010) (citing Aurora Enters. v. NBC, 688 F.2d 689, 694 (9th Cir. 1982) ("Continual purchasing of the products is merely an affirmation of defendants' prior conduct and does not inflict a 'new and accumulating' injury on plaintiff.'"); see also Rite Aid Corp. v. American Express Travel Related Servs. Co., 708 F. Supp. 2d 257, 270 (E.D.N.Y. 2010) ("Collecting a contract fee is not a new and independent act.").

Although it is not binding, the Court finds the Rite Aid case to be instructive. The plaintiffs in Rite Aid were a group of retail merchants who accepted American Express cards as [*11] payment from customers, pursuant to merchant agreements with the defendants. One feature of these agreements was that defendants would collect a percentage of each transaction as a service fee. Pursuant to the terms of the merchant agreements, on written notice, defendants were permitted to unilaterally change the fee they initially charged the plaintiffs. According to the plaintiffs, in all instances, the fee was supracompetitive. The plaintiffs also alleged that the defendant imposed "anti-steering" rules that prevented plaintiffs from urging customers to use forms of payment that were cheaper than American Express cards. Id. at 260-61. Based on these allegations, the plaintiffs brought claims against the defendants under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 262.

The defendants moved to dismiss each of plaintiffs on the basis that the plaintiffs' claims were barred by the statute of limitations. The court analyzed plaintiff's Section 1claim under a tying theory, and it found that although collecting a contract fee was not a "new and independent act," the defendants' "unilateral increases to its merchant discount fee [did] constitute over acts," which "did not merely reaffirm [*12] a contractual duty memorialized in a prelimitations agreement." Id. at 270-71. The court therefore found that the plaintiffs' Section 1 claims were "not barred to the extent that they see damages based on fee adjustments that [defendants] implemented within four years before" they filed suit. Id. at 272.

It is undisputed that eBay acquired PayPal in 2002. If Plaintiffs premised their claims solely on the acquisition of PayPal, their claims would be barred. Plaintiffs, however, allege that eBay has continued to refine its Accepted Payment Policy to restrict acceptable forms of payment. For example, Plaintiffs allege that in July 2006, within the limitations period, eBay announced that it would not permit payment through Google Checkout and updated its payment policies to reflect that decision. (FAC ¶ 37.) In addition, Plaintiffs allege that in January 2007, again within the limitations period, eBay "doubled the PayPal Buyer Protection on its website, and in doing so effectively eliminated buyer protection for non-PayPal transactions." (Id. ¶ 38.) Similarly, Plaintiffs allege that in 2008, eBay announced a policy by which it required sellers to accept electronic payments, which Plaintiffs [*13] allege "effectively eliminat[ed] payments by cash, cashiers or personal check, or money order." (Id. ¶ 39; see also id. ¶¶ 42-46.) Plaintiffs further allege that since 2008, eBay has "further modified and restricted its Accepted Payments Policy to limit sellers to only accept PayPal," and other forms of electronic payments that Plaintiffs contend are not viable alternatives to PayPal. (Id. ¶¶ 41, 48-51.)

Thus, much like the plaintiffs in the Rite Aid case, Plaintiffs here premise their tying claims on eBay's continued modification of the Accepted Payment Policy. As in the Rite Aid case, the Court concludes that those changes do constitute overt acts, and it finds that Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to show that those changes inflicted new and accumulating harm on them. In addition, Plaintiffs have alleged that eBay had the ability to and did enforce the purported tying arrangement within the limitations period.

Accordingly, the Court DENIES, IN PART, Defendant's motion to dismiss on this basis.

2. The Monopolization and Attempted Monopolization Claims.

Plaintiffs' claims of monopolization and attempted monopolization are premised on the same conduct that supports their tying [*14] claims. In brief, Plaintiffs allege that eBay has used its monopoly power to: prohibit many forms of payment; require sellers to accept payment forms that carry additional fees; intimidate sellers to accept those forms of payments; exclude new payment services by the "destruction or acquisition of competitors;" and steer buyers to PayPal. (FAC ¶ 73).

Defendants rely on the USS-Posco case, supra, to argue that these claims are barred by the statute of limitations. In that case, the plaintiff, a tomato canner, alleged that the defendants had conspired to monopolize the market for the products used to make tin cans used by the plaintiff and to fix prices in that market. The plaintiff alleged that two defendants had achieved this monopoly by creating a joint venture to manufacture the products for the purpose of avoiding competition with one another in that market. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, 2010 WL 3521979, at 2-3. Although the defendants created the joint venture outside the limitations period, the plaintiff argued that its cause of action did not accrue until the joint venture raised its prices to supracompetitive levels. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, [WL] at 13-14. The court disagreed and concluded that the plaintiff's claim for conspiracy [*15] to monopolize injured the market, and it concluded that the market had been harmed when the joint venture was formed. Although plaintiff continued to purchase defendant's products during that time, the court noted that such conduct "is merely an affirmation of defendants' prior conduct and does not inflict a 'new and accumulating injury' on plaintiff." *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, [WL] at 16. Because the allegedly illegal act, the formation of the joint venture, "occurred but one, single time," outside the limitations period, the court concluded that plaintiff's claims challenging that conduct were barred. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, [WL] at 17.

This case is distinguishable from Stanislaus in that, unlike the plaintiff in the Stanislaus, Plaintiffs do allege claims for attempted monopolization and monopolization. *See, e.g., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92236, [WL] 16 n.9. In addition, Plaintiffs' claims of monopolization and attempted monopolization are not based solely on the fact that eBay acquired PayPal. As discussed above, Plaintiffs allege that eBay has, for example, banned Google Checkout as an acceptable form of payment and has doubled the PayPal Buyer Protection in order to continue its alleged efforts to monopolize the market for online payment services for [*16] use in online auctions. Plaintiffs also allege that in October 6, 2008, eBay acquired Bill Me Later and merged its services with PayPal "in an effort to further extend its leadership in online payments." (FAC ¶ 40.) Each of these actions occurred within the limitations period, and Plaintiffs allege that they were harmed by these actions.

Accordingly, the Court DENIES, IN PART, Defendants' motion on this basis as well.

C. The Court Dismisses the Tying Claims, With Leave to Amend.

Defendants also move to dismiss Plaintiffs' tying claims on the basis that Plaintiffs fail: (1) to allege facts to show that a tying arrangement exists; (2) to allege facts that show an actual adverse effect on competition; (3) to allege facts supporting the relevant markets; and (4) to allege facts showing antitrust injury. Although the Court agrees that Plaintiffs have failed to allege facts showing an adverse effect on competition, it shall address each of Defendants' arguments.

Tying arrangements are traditionally defined as "'an agreement by a party [the buyer] to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase [*17] that product from any other supplier.'" Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 461-462, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992). In order to prevail on a traditional tying claim, a must establish:

"(1) that there exist two distinct product or services in different markets whose sales are tied together; (2) that the seller possesses appreciable economic power in the tying product market sufficient to coerce acceptance of the tied product; and (3) that the tying arrangement affects a 'not insubstantial volume of commerce' in the tied product market." Paladin Assocs., Inc. v. Montana Power Co., 328 F.3d 1145, 1159 (9th Cir. 2003) (citing Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 461-462 (quoting Northern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958)).[3] In addition, Plaintiffs must allege that the tying arrangement has a "'pernicious effect on competition and lack ... of any redeeming virtue." In re eBay Sellers Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d 1027, 1034 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (quoting Northern Pac Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958)); see also Siegel v. Chicken Delight, 448 F.2d 43, 47 (9th Cir. 1971) ("[T]he hallmark of a tie-in is that it denies competitors free access to the tied product [*18] market.").

1. Tying Arrangement.

Plaintiffs allege that the two distinct products or services are on-line auction services provided by eBay (the "tying" service) and the on-line payment services provided by PayPal (the "tied" service). Plaintiffs concede that eBay does not require sellers to use PayPal as the sole method of payment, but they argue that eBay's policies have "effectively" created such a requirement. In such a case, Plaintiffs must be able to allege that using PayPal is "the only viable economic option." See, e.g., Ways and Means, Inc. v. IVAC Corp., 506 F. Supp. 697, 701 (N.D. Cal. 1979). Plaintiffs have alleged facts showing why the alternative forms of payment permitted by eBay are not viable alternatives. (See, e.g., FAC ¶ 50.) Whether or not this is in fact true is a matter best addressed by way of summary judgment.

2. [*19] Adverse Effect on Competition.

With respect to their Section 2 tying claim, Plaintiffs allege that eBay's tying conduct > has had and/or is likely to have, among other things, the following effects: a. actual and potential competition in the online payment systems markets for online auctions has been injured, limited, reduced, restrained, suppressed, and effectively foreclosed; and b. eBay sellers are effectively forced to accept payment via PaPal and thus have paid or are likely to pay artificially inflated prices to eBay as a whole caused by reduced competition.

(FAC ¶ 88 (emphasis added).) These allegations mirror the allegations in the In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig. case, which the court determined failed to adequately allege that competition in the tied product market was harmed. See In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d at 1034.

With respect to their Section 1 tying claim, Plaintiffs allege that "Defendant's improper tying and bundling harms competition. Since the Class can effectively only accept payment via PaPal, there is little motivation for other online payment systems to enter the market, and those that do are foreclosed from offering their services directly [*20] to members of the Class at a lower, market-driven cost." (FAC ¶ 98.) However, these conclusory allegations are not supported by facts alleged elsewhere in the FAC.

Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have failed to allege facts showing that the alleged tie caused harm to competitors in the tied product market. Because Plaintiffs may be able to allege such facts, the Court shall grant them one final opportunity to amend.

[3] Plaintiffs assert tying claims under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Courts have permitted plaintiffs to proceed on tying claims under Section 2 "at least where there is monopolization or attempted monopolization," as is alleged in this case. See Apple Inc. v. Psystar Corp., 586 F. Supp. 2d 1190, 1195 n.2 (N.D. Cal. 2008).

3. Relevant Market.

In order to maintain a tying claim, a plaintiff allege facts showing that a defendant possesses market power in the tying product, and a plaintiff must properly allege that market. See, e.g., Rick-Mik Enters., Inc. v. Equilon Enters., LLC, 532 F.3d 963, 971-72 (9th Cir. 2008). A relevant product market usually is defined as "the pool of goods or services that enjoy reasonable interchangeability of use and cross-elasticity of demand." Tanaka v. University of So. Cal., 252 F.3d 1059, 1063 (9th Cir. 2001); see also W. Parcel Exp. v. United Parcel Serv. of America, Inc., 65 F. Supp. 2d 1052, 1058 (N.D. Cal. 1998). A court may grant a motion to dismiss if a "'plaintiff fails to define [the] proposed relevant market with reference to the rule [*21] of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products....'" In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d at 1031 (quoting Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3rd Cir. 1997); see also Newcal Indus. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 (9th Cir. 2008) (citing Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436-37) (court may dismiss where relevant market is "facially unsustainable").

Plaintiffs allege that the tying product is online auctions and the tied product is online payment services.[4] Defendants argue that Plaintiffs definition of the relevant market is impermissbly narrow and fails to "show how this purported market is any different from the larger market for online payment systems for use on other sales formats, both on eBay and other online platforms." (Mot. at 10:13-17.)

In essence, Defendants take issue with the possibility that Plaintiffs may attempt to rely on the theory [*22] that their relevant market is a submarket of a broader product market. See, e.g., Brown Shoe, Inc. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962) ("within [a] broad market, well-defined submarkets may exist which, in themselves, constitute product markets for antitrust purposes").[5] Plaintiffs have not, however, defined the relevant market solely by reference to consumers of the proposed products. For this reason, the Court finds Defendants' reliance on Colonial Med. Group., Inc. v. Catholic Healthcare W., No. C-09-2192-MMC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 51350, 2010 WL 2108123 (N.D. Cal. May 25, 2010), to be misplaced. The Court also concludes that Plaintiffs' allegations are not so conclusory that dismissal is warranted and, thus, also finds that this case is distinguishable on its facts from Golden Gate Pharmacy Servs., Inc. v. Pfizer, Inc., No. C-09-3854-MMC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47896, 2010 WL 1541257 (N.D. Cal. Apr. 16, 2010).

At this stage of the litigation, the Court cannot say that Plaintiffs' proposed relevant product market is not sustainable on its face. See In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d at 1033 (noting that the Plaintiff did not claim that eBay's product alone constituted a market, and concluding that Plaintiff's allegations of online auctions market and person-to-person payment systems markets were sufficient to state a claim); *In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19480, 2010 WL 760433, at *6-9 (N.D. Cal. Mar. 4, 2010) (finding triable issues of fact on whether plaintiff established "online auctions market" was an economically distinct submarket within broader category of online marketplaces), aff'd 433 Fed. Appx. 504, 2011 WL 1749206 (9th Cir. May 9, 2011).

Accordingly, the Court DENIES, IN PART, Defendants' motion on this basis.

[4] Plaintiffs define the relevant market for the monopolization claims as the "market for online payment systems for use in online auctions." (FAC ¶ 72.)

[5] Neither Plaintiffs nor Defendants have addressed the factors identified in Brown Shoe relevant to a submarket. See 370 U.S. at 325 ("The boundaries of such a submarket may be determined by examining such practical indicia as industry or public recognition of the submarket as a separate economic entity, the product's peculiar [*23] characteristics and uses, unique production facilities, distinct customers, distinct prices, sensitivity to price changes, and specialized vendors."). Because this issue is not adequately briefed, Defendants may renew this argument in connection with a motion for summary judgment summary judgment.

4. Antitrust Injury.

Defendants also move to dismiss Plaintiffs' [*24] tying claims on the basis that Plaintiffs fail to allege facts showing antitrust injury. The Ninth Circuit has identified "four requirements for antitrust injury: (1) unlawful conduct, (2) causing an injury to the plaintiff, (3) that flows from that which makes the conduct unlawful, and (4) that is of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent." American Ad. Mgmt., Inc. v. General Tel. Co., 190 F.3d 1051, 1055 (9th Cir. 1999).

Defendants argue that Plaintiffs allegations fail to satisfy the requirements of Rule 8, because they do not specify the amount of the fees at issue or show a link to the allegedly anticompetitive actions and those fees. However, Plaintiffs identify the specific fees at issue, i.e. listing fees, selling fees and fees for using PayPal. Plaintiffs also allege that by excluding other, cheaper forms of online payment systems, the prices that eBay and PayPal charge are artificially high. The Court finds that Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to show they suffered antitrust injury. Cf. Garon v. eBay Inc., No. 10-cv-5737-JW, Order Granting Motion to Dismiss at 6-7, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 148621 (N.D. Cal. Nov. 30, 2011) (noting that if plaintiffs had relied on allegations that they [*25] paid monopolistic fees in relevant market as a result of eBay's decision to implement challenged policy, plaintiffs could have stated a claim for relief).

Defendant also argues that Plaintiffs must be able to prove net economic harm, and that because eBay and PayPal compete in "two-sided" industries, the conduct about which Plaintiffs complain may actually be beneficial to sellers. The Court finds these arguments are better addressed in the context of a motion for summary judgment.[6]

Accordingly, the Court DENIES, IN PART, Defendants' motion on this basis.

C. The Monopolization Claims.

Defendants also move to dismiss Plaintiffs' claims for monopolization and attempted monopolization on the basis that Plaintiffs fail to allege facts to support the relevant markets and on the basis that they fail to allege facts showing an antitrust injury. "A claim of monopolization [*26] under [Section] 2 of the Sherman Act has two elements: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." In re eBay Seller Antitrust Litig., 545 F. Supp. 2d 1027, 1031 (N.D. Cal. 2008) (citing, inter alia, U.S. v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966)).[7] In addition, a plaintiff must allege facts to show "an injury caused by the violation." Id. (citing Sicor Ltd. v. Cetus Corp., 51 F.3d 848, 855 (9th Cir. 1995); P. Express, Inc. v. United Airlines, Inc., 959 F.2d 814, 817 (9th Cir. 1992). In order to state a claim for attempted monopolization, "a plaintiff must demonstrate four elements: (1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition; (2) predatory or anti-competitive conduct directed toward accomplishing that purpose; (3) a dangerous probability of success; and (4) causal antitrust injury." Forsyth v. Humana, Inc., 114 F.3d 1467, 1477 (9th Cir. 1997).

For the reasons set forth above, in connection with Plaintiffs' tying claims, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged the relevant market and have sufficiently alleged facts to show antitrust injury.

Accordingly, the Court DENIES, IN PART, Defendants' motion to dismiss on this basis.

[6] Defendants rely, in part, on Kypta v. McDonald's Corp., 671 F.2d 1282, 1285 (11th Cir. 1982) in support of their argument that Plaintiffs' allegations of injury are not sufficient. However, the court in Kypta addressed whether the plaintiffs had proved antitrust injury on a motion for summary judgment, rather than a motion to dismiss.

[7] The relevant market includes both a product market and a geographic market. See Newcal Indus. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1045 n.4 (9th Cir. 2008). [*27] Defendants do not argue that Plaintiffs fail to allege sufficient facts to define the relevant geographic market.

D. The Shipping Fee Claim is Dismissed, With Leave to Amend.

Plaintiffs assert a claim for relief entitled "Improper Collection of Shipping Fees as Part of Final Value Fee." (FAC ¶¶ 107-117.) Defendants moved to dismiss on the basis that Plaintiffs failed to articulate a legal basis for this claim. In their opposition, Plaintiffs argue that the facts alleged support a claim for unjust enrichment or for conversion.

Under California law, unjust enrichment is a theory of recovery, not an independent legal claim. Melchior v. New Line Productions, Inc., 106 Cal. App. 4th 779, 793, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 347 (2003) ("[T]here is no cause of action in California for unjust enrichment."); see also McKell v. Wash. Mut., Inc., 142 Cal. App. 4th 1457, 1490, 49 Cal. Rptr. 3d 227 (2006) ("There is no cause of action for unjust enrichment. [*28] Rather, unjust enrichment is a basis for obtaining restitution based on quasi-contract or imposition of a constructive trust."). Therefore, although Plaintiffs may be entitled to recovery for unjust enrichment under other theories of liability, a claim for unjust enrichment does not constitute a stand-alone cause of action.[8]

> Conversion occurs where the defendant wrongfully exercises dominion over the property of another. ... To establish conversion, a plaintiff must show (1) his ownership of or right to possess the property at the time of the conversion, (2) that the defendant disposed of the plaintiff's property rights or converted the property by a wrongful act, and (3) damages. ... A plaintiff in a conversion action must also prove that it did not consent to the defendant's exercise of dominion.

Bank of N.Y. v. Fremont Gen. Corp., 523 F.3d 902, 914 (9th Cir. 2008) (citations omitted). In addition, Plaintiffs must allege a specific, identifiable sum of money involved. See PCO, Inc. v. Christensen, Miller, Fink, Jacobs, Glaser, Weil & Shapiro, LLP, 150 Cal. App. 4th 384, 395, 58 Cal. Rptr. 3d 516 (2007).

Plaintiffs have not alleged that Defendants converted a specific, identifiable sum that is involved. In addition, Plaintiffs allege that eBay includes the shipping fee in its final value fee. Although Plaintiffs allege that Defendants do not provide shipping service or charge for shipping, Plaintiffs do not allege that they did not consent to pay eBay a final value fee. Although leave to amend should be freely granted, in light of the facts of this case, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs would not be able to state a claim for conversion.

Accordingly, the Court dismisses the fifth claim for relief, with one final opportunity to amend. If Plaintiffs believe there is some other legal basis on which to recover for this alleged conduct, they may include such a claim in the amended complaint permitted by this Order. Similarly, although the Court has concluded that Plaintiffs cannot assert [*30] a claim for unjust enrichment, the Court makes no finding as to whether Plaintiffs may be entitled to such damages as a matter of law.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court GRANTS IN PART AND DENIES IN PART Defendants' motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs shall file and serve their Second Amended Complaint by no later than January 27, 2012. Defendants shall answer or otherwise respond within twenty days after service of the Second Amended Complaint. The Court HEREBY CONTINUES the case management conference scheduled for February 10, 2012 to April 6, 2012 at 1:30 p.m. The parties' Joint Case Management Conference statement shall be due by no later than March 30, 2012.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Dated: January 5, 2012

[8] Some courts have found that it is unclear whether California law recognizes a claim for "unjust enrichment" [*29] as a separate claim and have chosen to allow a claim for unjust enrichment. See, e.g., Nordberg v. Trilegiant Corp., 445 F. Supp. 2d 1082, 1100 (N.D. Cal. 2006). However, this Court believes the better course is to allow Plaintiffs to pursue recovery for unjust enrichment under other theories of liability.

I. INTRODUCTION

This appeal arises from the settlement of a consolidated unfair competition class action (the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases) brought on behalf of California residents who purchased retail goods or services using a credit or debit card affiliated with either the Visa or MasterCard system. The Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases are premised on policies (the credit/debit acceptance policies) adopted by respondents Visa and MasterCard that require merchants who accept their credit cards to accept their debit cards as well. The plaintiffs in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases (Class Plaintiffs) characterize the credit/debit acceptance policies as an unlawful tying arrangement. Class Plaintiffs allege that the credit/debit acceptance policies permitted Visa and MasterCard to charge inflated fees to merchants in connection with debit transactions, and that this damaged Class Plaintiffs because the merchants passed along the cost of these inflated fees in the form of higher retail prices. The trial court certified a settlement class in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases, [*2] and approved the settlement over the objections of appellants, who are members of the settlement class.

Appellants object to the settlement principally on the ground that the release of class members' claims included in the settlement agreement is overbroad. Specifically, appellants' concern is that the release covers not only all claims arising from the credit/debit acceptance policies, but also the claims (the Attridge claims) asserted in a separate action brought by objector and appellant James Attridge (the Attridge action).

The Attridge action is based on a different set of policies adopted by Visa and MasterCard. These policies (the exclusion policies) prohibit banks that issue credit cards affiliated with the Visa or MasterCard systems from issuing credit cards affiliated with other systems, such as American Express or Discover. The Attridge action asserts that the exclusion policies diminish competition in the consumer credit card market, thereby permitting banks that issue Visa or MasterCard credit cards (card-issuer banks) to charge inflated interest rates and fees to consumers who maintain revolving balances on their credit card accounts.

We agree with appellants that the release [*3] approved by the trial court as part of the settlement agreement in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases includes a release of the Attridge claims, and that the trial court erred in approving the settlement without considering whether it included adequate compensation for the release of the Attridge claims. Therefore, we must vacate the order approving the settlement, and remand the matter to permit the trial court to reconsider the fairness and adequacy of the settlement in light of the inclusion of the Attridge claims in the release.

II. FACTS AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

A. Visa and MasterCard Systems and Relevant Policies

The basic structure of the Visa and MasterCard systems is not a matter of dispute on appeal. Accordingly, for background purposes, we adopt the cogent and concise description of the two systems' operations set forth in the opinion of the Second Circuit Court of Appeals in U.S. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc. (2d Cir. 2003) 344 F.3d 229.

"Visa U.S.A.[1] and MasterCard are two of the United States's four major network systems in the payment card industry, the other two being Amex and Discover. Visa U.S.A. and MasterCard are organized as open joint ventures, owned by the numerous banking [*4] institutions that are members of the networks. . . . Because MasterCard allows its member banks to issue Visa cards, and Visa U.S.A. likewise allows its members to issue MasterCard cards, many of Visa U.S.A.'s 14,000 members are also members of the MasterCard network. The networks' operations are conducted primarily by their member banks. While the member banks engage in the card business for profit, MasterCard and Visa U.S.A. themselves operate as non-profit organizations and are largely funded through service and transaction fees paid by their members. Both make a 'profit' on these fees, but their business model is not one that strives to maximize earnings at the 'network' level. Rather, the two organizations' capital surpluses are held basically as security accounts, to pay merchants in the event a member bank defaults on a payment obligation.

"The member banks of the MasterCard and Visa U.S.A. card networks may function either as 'issuers' or 'acquirers' [*5] or both. A member bank serving as an 'issuer' issues cards to cardholders; it serves as the liaison between the network and the individual cardholder. A member bank serving as an 'acquirer' acquires the card-paid transactions of a merchant; a particular acquiring bank acts as liaison between the network and those merchants accepting the network's payment cards with whom it has contracted.

"When a consumer uses a Visa card or a MasterCard card to pay for goods or services, the accepting merchant relays the transaction information to the acquiring bank with whom it has contracted. The acquirer processes and packages that information and transmits it to the network (Visa U.S.A. or MasterCard). The network then relays the transaction information to the cardholder's issuing bank, which approves the transaction if the cardholder has a sufficient credit line. Approval is sent by the issuer to the acquirer, which relays it to the merchant.

"Payment requests are sent by the merchant to the acquirer, which forwards the requests to the issuer. The issuer then pays the acquiring bank the amount requested, less what is called an 'interchange fee'—typically 1.4%. The acquirer retains an additional [*6] fee—approximately .6%. Thus, the issuing bank and the acquirer withold an aggregate of approximately 2% of the amount of the transaction from the merchant. This is known as the 'merchant discount.' For a $100 sale, the merchant typically will receive $98, the issuing bank retaining $1.40, while the acquiring bank retains 60 cents.

"Both MasterCard and Visa are open joint ventures, meaning that there is no limit to the number of banks that may become members, either as issuers or as acquirers. Any member may serve as both an issuer and as an acquirer. Members agree to abide by their association's by-laws and other regulations.

"A member of either the Visa U.S.A. or MasterCard network may also be a member of the other network. Thus a bank that is a member of Visa U.S.A.'s network and issues Visa cards may also be a member of the MasterCard network and issue MasterCard cards. On the other hand, both MasterCard and Visa U.S.A. have promulgated rules that prohibit their members from issuing American Express or Discover cards." (U.S. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., supra, 344 F.3d at pp. 234-236, fns. & italics omitted.)[2]

Both Visa and MasterCard permit their member card-issuer banks to issue two types of cards that function within the network: credit cards and debit cards. "A credit card, such as a Visa or MasterCard credit card, allows a cardholder to make a purchase and pay off his card-issuing institution off over time. . . . A debit card allows a holder to access his bank account directly. . . . A debit card might be an ATM card, which enables the holder to withdraw cash from an ATM, or a 'POS debit card,' which can be used to make a purchase at the 'point of sale,' or both. [Citation.]" (In re Visa Check/Mastermoney Antitrust Litigation (E.D.N.Y. 2000) 192 F.R.D. 68, 72.) As already noted, both Visa and MasterCard adopted policies requiring merchants who accepted credit cards affiliated with their respective networks also to accept those networks' debit cards as well (the credit/debit acceptance policies).

B. The Federal Antitrust Litigation

1. The Federal Credit/Debit Tying Case

In 1996, a group of retail stores, headed by Walmart, sued Visa and MasterCard in federal district [*8] court (the federal credit/debit tying case). In the federal credit/debit tying case, the retail stores alleged that the credit/debit acceptance policies constituted illegal tying arrangements in violation of federal antitrust law, and that Visa and MasterCard were using these policies, in conjunction with other anti-competitive conduct, to monopolize the debit card market. As a consequence, the stores claimed that they had incurred supra-competitive interchange fees in connection with transactions charged to Visa or MasterCard debit or credit cards. (See In re Visa Check/Mastermoney Antitrust Litigation, supra, 192 F.R.D. at p. 73.)

[2] The rules described in the quoted text, precluding members of the Visa and MasterCard [*7] networks from issuing cards affiliated with other networks, are those referred to in this opinion as the exclusion policies.

The federal credit/debit tying case was certified as a class action, and the case ultimately settled. In December 2003, the district court approved the settlement (In re Visa Check/Mastermoney Antitrust Litigation (E.D.N.Y. 2003) 297 F.Supp.2d 503), and in January 2005, the Second Circuit affirmed. (Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc. (2d Cir. 2005) 396 F.3d 96.)

2. The Federal Exclusion Case

In 1998, while the federal credit/debit tying case was pending, the United States Department of Justice brought a civil enforcement action (the federal exclusion [*9] case) in federal district court charging that Visa and MasterCard's exclusion policies violated the Sherman Antitrust Act. (See U.S. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc. (S.D.N.Y 2001) 163 F.Supp.2d 322.) In October 2001, the trial court in the federal exclusion case entered a judgment against Visa and MasterCard, holding that the exclusion policies operated as a horizontal restraint on trade. (Ibid.)

As the Second Circuit later explained, the exclusion policies were "anticompetitive because they restrict the ability of American Express and Discover to compete with Visa and MasterCard in marketing their 'network services' to banks. As a result of [the exclusion policies], American Express and Discover have been effectively foreclosed from the business of issuing cards through banks. . . . No United States bank has been willing to give up its membership in the Visa U.S.A. and MasterCard networks in order to issue Amex or Discover cards." (U.S. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., supra, 344 F.3d at p. 237.) The Second Circuit affirmed the judgment in the federal exclusion case in 2003. (Id. at p. 244.)

C. The California State Court Litigation

1. The Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases

On January 26, 2000, while the federal [*10] credit/debit tying case was still pending, Richard Johns filed a consumer class action in California state court challenging the credit/debit acceptance policies. The action was stayed, by mutual consent of the parties, pending the resolution of the federal credit/debit tying case.

After the federal credit/debit tying case settled, additional similar cases were filed in California state court. Ultimately, the cases were coordinated under the rubric of the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases, and in February 2004, San Francisco Superior Court Judge Richard A. Kramer was assigned as the coordination trial judge.

On July 12, 2004, Class Plaintiffs filed a consolidated amended complaint (the Complaint), which remained the operative complaint at the time the case settled. The Complaint alleged that Visa and MasterCard illegally tied the acceptance of Visa and MasterCard debit cards by retailers (referred to in the Complaint as "Vendors" or "merchants") to the merchants' acceptance of Visa and MasterCard credit cards, thus "forcing merchants to accept [the debit cards] as a condition to being able to continue accepting the foremost and indispensable Visa and/or MasterCard credit cards." It further [*11] alleged that Visa and MasterCard "charged merchants the same fees for their [respective] debit cards as for their respective credit cards, despite the fact that the expenditures and risks associated with credit cards are far greater than for debit cards, which do not involve an extension of credit."

The Complaint defined the plaintiff class as all California purchasers of products or services from Vendors that accepted Visa and MasterCard credit cards, and that "have therefore been forced to accept Visa and MasterCard debit cards . . . , and to pay unreasonably high charges for acceptance of [those debit] cards." The Complaint alleged that the questions of law and fact common to the members of the class included: "(a) Whether defendants and their co-conspirators tie the acceptance of [Visa and MasterCard debit cards] to the Vendors' acceptance of Visa and MasterCard credit cards; [¶] (b) Whether defendants' tying arrangements are unlawful; and [¶] (c) The amount of supra-competitive fees paid by the Vendors with respect to [Visa and MasterCard debit cards], and passed on by the Vendors to class members in the form of higher prices for the Vendors' [p]roducts and [s]ervices."

The Complaint [*12] went on to describe the nature and operations of Visa and MasterCard, and their allegedly anticompetitive conduct. As part of that description, the Complaint mentioned the exclusion policies, citing U.S. v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., supra, 344 F.3d 229. It also briefly discussed other actions allegedly taken by Visa and MasterCard to hinder competitors from gaining market share in the general purpose credit card market, including charging higher fees to merchants for processing credit card purchases using card acceptance terminals associated with American Express. This section of the Complaint ended by alleging that "[a]fter Visa and MasterCard . . . assured their control of the credit card market, they began to pursue other payment systems," which "included POS [point of sale] debit cards."

The bulk of the factual allegations in the Complaint consisted of a description of the operations of Visa and MasterCard's debit card systems, and how the credit/debit acceptance policies, together with other policies and practices, enabled Visa and MasterCard to charge assertedly excessive, supra-competitive fees to merchants for processing payments tendered via Visa or MasterCard debit cards. Finally, [*13] the Complaint alleged that "[m]erchants pass on to consumers the higher costs associated with their losses, including forced payment of [Visa and MasterCard debit card] interchange fees, and the higher costs associated with the much slower transfer of consumers' funds into the merchants' bank accounts" when those debit cards are used in lieu of on-line debit cards (i.e., those tied directly to customers' bank accounts, rather than processed through the Visa or MasterCard "off-line" debit card system).

The Complaint alleged six causes of action: (1) violation of the Cartwright Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 16720 et seq.) by Visa, based on the credit/debit acceptance policies, resulting in artificially high fees to Vendors, and damaging plaintiffs because those fees were passed on to them in the form of higher prices charged the Vendors; (2) violation of the Cartwright Act by MasterCard, based on the same allegations made with respect to Visa, and resulting in the same damages; (3) conspiracy by Visa and MasterCard to violate the Cartwright Act in the manner alleged in the first two causes of action, and resulting in the same damages; (4) violation of the Unfair Competition Act (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200) [*14] by means of the antitrust violations alleged in the first three causes of action, resulting in unjust enrichment of the defendants; (5) violation of the Unfair Competition Act by means of the business acts or practices alleged in the first four causes of action, which were alleged to be in violation of public policy, immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous, and substantially injurious to consumers, resulting in unjust enrichment of the defendants; and (6) violation of the Unfair Competition Act by means of fraudulent business acts, including the "adoption of elaborate measures to deceive merchants into believing they were receiving Visa and MasterCard credit cards, when in fact they were receiving . . . debit cards . . . ." The complaint requested that the court certify the action as a class action; find that the defendants' conduct amounted to a violation of the Cartwright Act and the Unfair Competition Act; and award injunctive relief; treble damages for the Cartwright Act violation; restitution; other equitable relief; and attorney fees. Nowhere in the Complaint's description of the damages to consumers caused by the defendants' conduct is there any mention of inflated fees [*15] paid to card-issuer banks by credit card holders who maintain revolving balances on their accounts, which is the type of damages sought in the Attridge action.

On October 14, 2004, the trial court sustained Visa and MasterCard's joint demurrer to the first, second, and third causes of action for violation of the Cartwright Act, but overruled their demurrer to the fourth, fifth, and sixth causes of action for violations of the Unfair Competition Act, and denied their motion to strike portions of the complaint relating to those causes of action. On December 6, 2007, the trial court ruled that the findings recited in a partial summary judgment order issued by the federal district court in the federal credit/debit tying case would not be given collateral estoppel effect, because the federal court's order was interlocutory, and the case was ultimately settled before the order became final.

2. The Attridge Action

In December 2004, after the Second Circuit's affirmance of the judgment against Visa and MasterCard in the federal exclusion case, appellant James Attridge filed a class action in the San Francisco Superior Court alleging that the exclusion policies violated the Cartwright Act and [*16] the Unfair Competition Law. As of August 2009, the operative complaint in the Attridge action (the Attridge complaint) was the third amended complaint, filed on December 2, 2005, as amended by an amendment naming a Doe defendant, which was filed on December 14, 2007.

The Attridge complaint described the exclusion policies, and alleged (citing the trial court's findings in the federal exclusion case) that they had reduced competition in the "general purpose card network services market," which permitted Visa and MasterCard, in combination with their member card-issuer banks, to charge supra-competitive prices for network services. The complaint sought certification of a class defined to include California Visa and MasterCard holders with revolving balances ("revolver cardholders"). The Attridge complaint further alleged that the exclusion policies damaged revolver cardholders, because the affected banks had passed on the cost of the inflated network service fees to their customers in the form of higher prices for "general purpose card network services." On the basis of these allegations, the Attridge complaint pleaded one cause of action for violation of the Cartwright Act and three [*17] causes of action for violation of the Unfair Competition Act.

After the Attridge action was filed, it was designated as complex, and assigned to Judge Kramer. Attridge timely disqualified Judge Kramer under Code of Civil Procedure section 170.6, however, so the case was redesignated as a single-assignment case. The Attridge action was not included among the cases coordinated as the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases.

In the Attridge action, as in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases, the defendants' demurrer to the Cartwright Act causes of action was sustained, but their demurrer to the Unfair Competition Law causes of action was overruled. During the hearing on the demurrer, counsel for Attridge confirmed that the court was correct in describing the claims asserted in the Attridge action as follows: "The wrong that is alleged is the alleged conspiracy among the Visa members, among the MasterCard members, and between Visa and MasterCard to shut out competition at the network service level, thereby driving up network service costs beyond what they would have been had Discover and American Express or others been permitted to enter the market, thereby increasing . . . the finance charge that banks [*18] are able to charge their customers . . . ."

As of the fall of 2009, the defendants in the Attridge action had filed a motion for summary judgment or summary adjudication. The motion for summary judgment was denied, but the motion for summary adjudication had not yet been ruled upon. No class certification motion had been filed.

D. The Settlement and the Settlement Approval Proceedings

By August 2009, the Class Plaintiffs in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases had settled with both Visa and MasterCard. The parties then requested the trial court to grant preliminary approval of the settlement. Attridge objected to the settlement, and was permitted to participate as an amicus curiae in the preliminary approval proceedings.

On January 5, 2010, the trial court entered an order preliminarily approving the settlement, provisionally certifying the settlement class, ordering that notice to the class members be published and posted on the Internet, and providing an opportunity for class members to object, or to opt out. Prior to final approval, the settlement agreement was amended several times. In its final form, the settlement agreement provided that Visa and MasterCard would pay a total of $31 [*19] million into an escrow fund, from which attorney fees, litigation costs, class representative incentive awards, and administration costs would be paid. The amount remaining was to be distributed to nonprofit organizations selected by the parties and approved by the court, to be used by those organizations for financial literacy education, or other purposes relating to advocacy for children, or the indigent.

On August 6, 2010, the trial court held a hearing on final approval of the settlement. In addition to Attridge, appellants Marilene Selvaggio, John Metzger, and Melvin Salveson, all of whom stated that they were members of the settlement class, filed objections.[3]

At the settlement approval hearing on August 6, 2010, counsel for appellant Salveson argued that the amount of the settlement was inadequate in light of the scope of the release, and that Class Plaintiffs' counsel "should get a [*20] much, much better deal from these [d]efendants who have already been found to have violated the antitrust laws . . . because of their agreements to exclude competing cards and competitors, which . . . will be released by [Class] Plaintiffs for no money at all." Counsel went on to point out that Visa and MasterCard had been found to have "by agreement . . . prevented . . . their [card-issuer] bank members from participating with American Express, Discover and other competing cards," and noted that claims based on this conduct were being released as part of the settlement. As the trial judge paraphrased it, Salveson's position was that the settlement would "releas[e] all antitrust claims no matter how they would come about, and other anticompetitive claims arising out of the existence of the Visa and the MasterCard interchange system."

The trial judge then invited counsel for the settling parties to inform the court whether Salveson's counsel's interpretation of the scope of the settlement agreement was correct. He noted that at the preliminary approval stage, he had "raised the point on the record that this release should only cover claims that would arise out of what this lawsuit's [*21] about," and that this was the way he had interpreted the release. In response, Visa's counsel and counsel for the Class Plaintiffs represented that the "standard release language" in the settlement agreement was not intended to be "any broader than claims based on conduct which was alleged . . . or claims which could have been brought based on the conduct which was alleged in this case."

Later during the hearing on August 6, 2010, counsel for plaintiffs in the Attridge action stressed that two different injuries were involved in the two cases. As counsel explained, the Credit/Debit tying cases involved "merchants who have charges imposed on them for debit [cards], passing them on to all purchasers" in the form of higher retail prices paid by everyone who bought retail products and services, regardless of the form of payment they used. The Attridge case, in contrast, involved the "network service fee injury" which "involves Visa and MasterCard imposing charges on the [card] issuing banks which then pass them on to revolver credit card holders in their credit card statements." Counsel for the Class Plaintiffs responded that the harm alleged in the Attridge action was "part of this case," [*22] noting that members of the putative class in the Attridge action would, of necessity, also be members of the settlement class in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, and pointing out that he had submitted declarations from class representatives averring that they had paid finance charges on their credit cards.

The trial judge then commented that in his view, the problem had been taken care of by notifying the class members in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases that the settlement could affect their rights in the Attridge action, advising them to seek the advice of counsel, and offering them the opportunity to opt out. He declined to "make an express interpretation of the release in this context, because [he did not] have facts in front of [him]." Instead, he was "just going to leave it for any situation that might arise and may not arise in the future," even though he understood the Attridge plaintiffs' contention that, as their counsel put it, "the reference that's in the release is specific enough to give us a lot of trouble" due to the reference to the federal exclusion litigation on which the Attridge action is based.

At the end of the hearing on August 6, 2010, the trial judge directed the parties [*23] to revise the settlement so as to distribute the entire settlement amount (net of attorney fees and costs) to charitable organizations, rather than using a portion of it to develop a "financial literacy toolkit." Once the parties had done so, on August 23, 2010, the judge signed an order finally approving the settlement, over the objections of appellants. Judgment was entered on the same day. Appellants each filed timely notices of appeal.

[3] Except where it is necessary to distinguish among objectors Attridge, Selvaggio, Metzger, and Salveson, we will refer to them collectively as appellants. In this court, Selvaggio and Metzger have filed joint appellants' briefs, and Attridge and Salveson have each filed their own appellant's briefs.

III. Discussion

A. Judicial Review of Class Action Settlements

When a class action is settled, trial court approval of the settlement is required, because the court has a fiduciary responsibility as guardian of the rights of the absentee class members. (Kullar v. Foot Locker Retail, Inc. (2008) 168 Cal.App.4th 116, 129, 85 Cal. Rptr. 3d 20 (Kullar).) "[I]n the final analysis it is the court that bears the responsibility to ensure that the recovery represents a reasonable compromise, given the magnitude and apparent merit of the claims being released, discounted by the risks and expenses of attempting to establish and collect on those claims by pursuing the litigation." (Ibid.)

"The well-recognized factors that the trial court should consider in evaluating the reasonableness [*24] of a class action settlement agreement include 'the strength of plaintiffs' case, the risk, expense, complexity and likely duration of further litigation, the risk of maintaining class action status through trial, the amount offered in settlement, the extent of discovery completed and the stage of the proceedings, the experience and views of counsel, the presence of a governmental participant, and the reaction of the class members to the proposed settlement.' [Citations.] This list 'is not exhaustive and should be tailored to each case.' [Citation.]" (Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th at p. 128.)

A "presumption of fairness exists where: (1) the settlement is reached through arm's-length bargaining; (2) investigation and discovery are sufficient to allow counsel and the court to act intelligently; (3) counsel is experienced in similar litigation; and (4) the percentage of objectors is small. [Citation.]" (Dunk v. Ford Motor Co. (1996) 48 Cal.App.4th 1794, 1802, 56 Cal. Rptr. 2d 483.) Even when these factors are present, a court cannot "determine the adequacy of a class action settlement without independently satisfying itself that the consideration being received for the release of the class members' claims [*25] is reasonable in light of the strengths and weaknesses of the claims and the risks of the particular litigation." (Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th at p. 129.) In particular, "[a]ny attempt to include in a class settlement terms which are outside the scope of the operative complaint should be closely scrutinized by the trial court to determine if the plaintiff genuinely contests those issues and adequately represents the class. [Citation.]" (Trotsky v. Los Angeles Fed. Sav. & Loan Assn. (1975) 48 Cal.App.3d 134, 148, 121 Cal. Rptr. 637 (Trotsky).) Moreover, if an objector questions the fairness of the settlement based on a difference of opinion with class counsel regarding a "legal point [which] significantly affects the valuation of the case for settlement purposes," then "the trial court is obliged, at a minimum, to determine whether a legitimate controversy exists on [that] legal point." (Clark v. American Residential Services LLC (2009) 175 Cal.App.4th 785, 803, 96 Cal. Rptr. 3d 441 (Clark); see also id. at pp. 801-804.)

The scope of this court's review of the trial court's approval of a class action settlement is limited. "Our task is not to make an independent determination whether the terms of the settlement are fair, [*26] adequate and reasonable, but to determine 'only whether the trial court acted within its discretion.' [Citation.]" (Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th at pp. 127-128.) In making this determination, "[g]reat weight is accorded the trial judge's views." (7-Eleven Owners for Fair Franchising v. Southland Corp. (2000) 85 Cal.App.4th 1135, 1145, 102 Cal. Rptr. 2d 777.) "[G]iven that 'so many imponderables enter into the evaluation of a settlement' [citation], an abuse of discretion standard of appellate review is singularly appropriate." (Id. at pp. 1166-1167.)

This does not mean, however, that we are obligated to rubber stamp the trial court's judgment. "'The abuse of discretion standard is not a unified standard; the deference it calls for varies according to the aspect of a trial court's ruling under review. The trial court's findings of fact are reviewed for substantial evidence, its conclusions of law are reviewed de novo, and its application of the law to the facts is reversible only if arbitrary and capricious.' [Citation.] Moreover, '"[t]he discretion of a trial judge is not a whimsical, uncontrolled power, but a legal discretion, which is subject to the limitations of legal principles governing the subject [*27] of its action, and to reversal on appeal where no reasonable basis for the action is shown. [Citation.]"' [Citations.]" (Cellphone Termination Fee Cases (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 1110, 1118, 104 Cal. Rptr. 3d 275.)

B. Analysis

In the present case, all appellants argue, in essence, that the trial court abused its discretion by approving the settlement, because including the Attridge claims within the scope of the release rendered the settlement unfair. Attridge claims, in addition, that a subclass should have been certified, and separate class representatives and counsel appointed, because there was a conflict between the settlement class and those of its members who also were putative class members in the Attridge action. Selvaggio and Metzger additionally argue that even as to the core claim asserted in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, the settling parties did not submit sufficient evidence to support the finding that the settlement was adequate.

1. The Attridge Claims Are Not Subsumed Within the Credit/Debit Tying Cases

Respondents contend that the Attridge claims are subsumed within the claims of the Plaintiff Class in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, because both cases plead unfair competition claims based on many [*28] of the same facts regarding Visa and MasterCard's duopolistic market power. We agree that both the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases and the Attridge action are based on the same general background allegations that Visa and MasterCard possessed and abused duopolistic economic power. They also both plead causes of action based on the unfair competition law, and there is considerable overlap among the putative class members. Nonetheless, contrary to the position of the plaintiffs in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases, the Attridge action is not a mere "copycat" action. The two actions involve different instrumentalities of harm—i.e., the credit/debit acceptance policies versus the exclusion policies—and different types of damage—i.e., inflated retail prices charged by merchants to those who purchase goods or services using credit or debit cards, versus inflated fees charged by card-issuer banks to their customers who carry outstanding credit card balances.

Class Plaintiffs stress that their Complaint is based in part on the exclusion policies, which are the instrumentalities of harm relied on in the Attridge action. This is so, however, only insofar as the Complaint alleges that the exclusion [*29] policies contributed to placing Visa and MasterCard in the dominant market position that enabled them to impose the credit/debit acceptance policies on merchants. Class Plaintiffs also point to their evidence that some class members paid interest on revolving credit card balances. We do not doubt that there is considerable overlap between the settlement class in the Credit/Debit Card Tying Cases and the putative class in the Attridge action. This fact in and of itself, however, does not justify requiring the release of the Attridge claims.

This principle is illustrated by Trotsky, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 134. Trotsky was a class action that originally challenged three provisions of a specific form of trust deed used to secure mortgage loans made by the defendant. Later, the plaintiffs filed an amended complaint that withdrew any challenge to one of the three challenged provisions. Meanwhile, another borrower, Barwig, filed a class action involving the same deed of trust. Barwig's action challenged only the provision that the Trotsky plaintiffs had deleted from their amended complaint. When the Trotsky parties then settled the class action in an agreement that released the defendant from [*30] liability relating to all three provisions, including the one that been abandoned by the Trotsky plaintiffs, Barwig objected to the settlement, arguing that it might be given collateral estoppel effect and bar Barwig's own class action. Despite the obvious overlap among the class members in the two cases, the Court of Appeal in Trotsky reversed the trial court's approval of the settlement on various grounds, including that the Trotsky plaintiffs could not settle the claims of a class of plaintiffs they did not represent. (Id. at pp. 146-152.)

Similarly, in the present case, even though the Class Plaintiffs may also be members of the purported class in the Attridge action, this is not sufficient to establish that the trial court acted within its discretion in approving a settlement that releases the Attridge claims. Admittedly, in Trotsky, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 134, the Court of Appeal relied in part on the fact that the named plaintiffs did not allege that they themselves had incurred damages based on the provision at issue in Barwig's action (see id. at p. 147), whereas here, Class Plaintiffs have provided evidence that they are indeed members of the putative Attridge class. However, [*31] this is a distinction without a difference. "It is the fact that the class plaintiff's claims are typical and his representation of the class adequate which gives legitimacy to permitting him to bind class members who have notice of the action. [Citations.]" (Id. at p. 146, italics added.)

Thus, the issue is not just whether the class membership overlaps, but in addition, whether Class Plaintiffs have adequately represented not only the interests they assert in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, but also the separate interests asserted in the Attridge action. (See Trotsky, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d at pp. 146-147.) Otherwise, the settlement "carries with it substantial dangers of injustice to [the Attridge] class members who may be deprived of their rights by the actions of the class plaintiff[s]" in the present case. (Id. at p. 149, citing City of San Jose v. Superior Court (1974) 12 Cal.3d 447, 458-459, 115 Cal. Rptr. 797, 525 P.2d 701.)[4] Therefore, if the settlement includes a release of the Attridge claims, the trial court was obligated to consider whether Class Plaintiffs had adequately represented the interests of Visa and MasterCard customers in their capacity as members of the putative class in the Attridge action before [*32] approving the settlement.

2. The Attridge Claims Fall Within the Scope of the Release

In the course of the proceedings regarding the settlement, in response to the [*33] objections posed by counsel for Attridge, the trial judge suggested that the settling parties remove from the agreement a provision expressly releasing the claims asserted in the Attridge action. The release provision was revised accordingly. However, as already noted, the trial judge declined to make a ruling, both at the class notice stage and at the final settlement approval hearing, as to whether the release provision ultimately included in the settlement agreement did or did not extinguish the claims asserted in the Attridge action.

The release included in the final settlement agreement ultimately approved by the trial court provides that class members who do not opt out agree to release Visa and MasterCard (referred to as Released Parties) from all liability "arising out of or relating in any way to any conduct or failure to act of any Released Party alleged or which could have been alleged in the Consolidated Amended Complaint . . . , including any claims based on rules, by-laws, regulations, policies, practices, network service fees, interchange fees, merchant discount fees, finance charges, or charges of any kind of any Released Party, and including any claims based on theories [*34] of tying, attempted monopolization, monopolization, exclusionary conduct, price-fixing, or any other restraint of trade, or of any unfair, deceptive, or fraudulent practice or failure to disclose, and including any claims that arise under or relate to California's Unfair Competition Law . . . , and including any claims based in any way upon the tying or other conduct alleged in [the federal credit/debit tying case] or upon the Visa By-law 2.10(e) or MasterCard Competitive Programs Policy or other conduct alleged in United States v. Visa U.S.A., Inc., et al., . . . [i.e., the federal exclusion case] (including any impact that such conduct had on retail product or service prices)." (Italics added, except as to case title.)

Because the trial court did not resolve any conflicts in the evidence regarding the parties' intent in drafting this release provision, we interpret it de novo based upon the contractual language. (Parsons v. Bristol Development Co. (1965) 62 Cal.2d 861, 865, 44 Cal. Rptr. 767, 402 P.2d 839; Nelson v. County of Kern (2010) 190 Cal.App.4th 252, 276, 118 Cal. Rptr. 3d 736.) The language italicized in the quotation in the preceding paragraph includes within the ambit of the release all claims that are based on "finance charges, [*35] or charges of any kind," and that involve "theories of . . . attempted monopolization [and] exclusionary conduct." Coupled with the explicit reference to claims based on the conduct alleged in the federal exclusion case, the wording of the release leaves no room for doubt that it encompasses the claims asserted in the Attridge action. Tellingly, respondents' briefs on appeal implicitly adopt this interpretation of the scope of the release.[5] Thus, contrary to respondents' assertions, appellants' challenges to the release provision in the settlement agreement cannot be dismissed on the basis that the release provision is nothing more than the standard broad release language commonly used in class action settlement agreements.[6]

[4] As the Second Circuit recently pointed out in reversing an order approving a class action settlement, the fact that some class representatives have the same claims as those belonging to the objecting plaintiff class does not necessarily mean that the representatives will fairly and adequately represent the interest of all class members. (Literary Works in Elec. Databases Copyright Litig. (2d Cir. 2011) 654 F.3d 242, 251-255.) The court reasoned that when a class action covering more than one type of claim is settled, the "named plaintiffs . . . [are] obligated to advance the collective interests of the class, rather than those of the subset of class members whose claims mirror[] their own." (Id. at p. 252.) Thus, the court held that even where "class members can and do hold claims in [multiple] categories" (id. at p. 251), subclasses for each type of claim should be created, in order to ensure adequate representation in the settlement negotiations of those class members who hold only one type of claim. (Id. at pp. 251-257.)

Moreover, the release goes on expressly to exempt from its scope all claims that are (1) based on the releasing party's acceptance, as a merchant, of Visa or MasterCard credit or debit cards; (2) based on an entitlement to settlement funds in specified litigation relating to currency conversion fees; or (3) "based upon a routine individual dispute with the financial institution that issued [the claimant] a Visa- or MasterCard-branded payment card regarding payment of [the claimant's] personal account statement." The inclusion of these explicit exceptions to the scope of the release demonstrates that if the parties to the Credit/Debit Tying Cases had wished to exempt the claims asserted in the Attridge [*37] action from the ambit of their settlement, they could and would have done so. Conversely, the omission of such an exception from the release makes it even clearer that, if allowed to stand, the release would operate as a bar to the further prosecution of the Attridge action, or to the assertion of the same claims in any other litigation. (See Villacres v. ABM Industries Inc. (2010) 189 Cal.App.4th 562, 585-590, 117 Cal. Rptr. 3d 398 [holding individual plaintiff's claims barred by release provision in prior class action settlement agreement which included all claims that could have been asserted in that action, based in part on fact that agreement included exceptions to scope of release, and plaintiff's claims were not listed as exception]; Stephenson v. Drever (1997) 16 Cal.4th 1167, 1175, 69 Cal. Rptr. 2d 764, 947 P.2d 1301 [under maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, where parties' contract expressly provided that certain consequences would flow from termination of plaintiff's employment, this tended to negate inference that parties also intended another consequence to flow from same event].)

3. The Release of the Attridge Claims Renders the Settlement Unfair

Because we conclude the Attridge claims are included within the scope of the [*38] release, the overall fairness of the settlement of the Credit/Debit Tying Cases depends in part on a "ballpark" estimate of the value of the Attridge claims. (See, e.g., Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th at p. 133 [trial court approving class action settlement "must at least satisfy itself that the class settlement is within the 'ballpark' of reasonableness"].) In other words, the parties seeking approval of the settlement were obligated to present the trial court with evidence that the relief provided was adequate to compensate not only for the inflated retail prices allegedly paid to merchants as a result of the credit/debit acceptance policies, but also the inflated interest and fees allegedly paid to card-issuer banks by those credit card holders with revolving balances, as a result of the exclusion policies.

In an effort to demonstrate that the settlement did not include fair compensation for the Attridge claims, Attridge submitted a declaration by an expert economist, Dr. Andrew Safir, regarding the amount of damages suffered by the putative class in the Attridge action. Safir explained that he had been asked to calculate the damages caused by the "former Visa and MasterCard loyalty [*39] rules in place from 1991 through October 2004," which "enabled these companies to set, fix and establish supra-competitive prices for network service fees charged to banking

[5] Respondents argue that it was proper for the release to include the Attridge claims, and they do not contend that those claims fall outside its intended scope. At oral argument in this court, counsel for Visa confirmed Visa's position that the release includes the Attridge claims.

[6] On June 10, 2011, class counsel requested that this court take judicial notice of four class action settlements approved by other courts, in cases not substantively related to this one, [*36] after the judgment was entered in the trial court in the present case. Class counsel has not established that any of these other settlements implicate the issue that appellants raise here, i.e., that the settlements included a release of claims asserted in a different, concurrently pending case, and were approved over the objections of persons representing putative class members in that other case. For that reason, the request for judicial notice is denied, on the ground of lack of relevance.

institutions issuing Visa and Master[Card] [c]ards to the general public"—fees which Safir asserted "were, in turn, passed on to specific bank card customers, who incurred greater costs in obtaining revolving credit."

Safir opined that "over the period from 1991 until the unfair competitive practices were terminated in October of 2004, Visa revolving charge card holders suffered approximately $177 million in damages" (not including interest) and that "[o]ver this same period, revolving credit customers holding MasterCards were damaged by $80 million" (again, not including interest). Safir opined that the retail charge market was sufficiently competitive that "any reduction in network fees charged by Visa and MasterCard to their banking clients would have been rapidly passed on to end use customers." Safir explained that he was still awaiting additional discovery material that would enable him "to calculate the specific extent of the 'pass-on' of network fee value from the bank to the retail card level, and specifically [*40] that amount which should be appropriately allocated to revolving charge customers." Safir estimated that if the members of the putative class in the Attridge action received their damages in full, "each class member would receive more than $36." (Fn. omitted.)

In response to Safir's declaration, counsel for the Class Plaintiffs submitted the declaration of a rival expert economist, Dr. Gustavo Bamberger. While conceding that it was "not possible to fully evaluate [Safir's] damage estimate" due to the lack of supporting detail, Bamberger opined that it did "not appear to be consistent with the available evidence." Specifically, Bamberger indicated that contrary to Safir's analysis, publicly available data did not show a fall in network service fees after Visa and MasterCard revoked their anticompetitive policies in October 2004. Bamberger also explained that even if the "challenged conduct" substantially raised the fees charged by Visa and MasterCard to their member card-issuer banks, Safir had not demonstrated that "those higher fees had a substantial effect on the cost to consumers who used credit cards as a source of revolving credit." Bamberger noted that card-issuer banks that are [*41] members of the Visa and/or MasterCard networks could have passed on higher network service fees in other ways than via increased interest on revolving balances. He also noted that such banks set their own fees and interest rates, which "could vary substantially across issuing banks." (Fn. omitted.)

The dueling expert declarations of Safir and Bamberger created a significant conflict in the evidence as to the value of the claims asserted by the putative class in the Attridge action. Moreover, Safir's and Bamberger's declarations each indicated that the respective declarants had reached their conclusions based on a limited amount of available information. Yet in discussing the reasons that he found the amount of the settlement to be fair and reasonable, the trial judge did not resolve—or even mention—the conflict between the two declarations. Nor did he address the question whether counsel for the Class Plaintiffs, before agreeing to the settlement, had adequately investigated and assessed the factual and legal strengths and weaknesses of the Attridge claims. Under Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th 116, and Clark, supra, 175 Cal.App.4th 785, it was an abuse of discretion to approve the settlement [*42] without determining whether the evidence in the record justified a finding that the settlement's terms were fair notwithstanding the inclusion of the Attridge claims in the release.

Based on his comments at the settlement approval hearing on August 6, 2010, the trial judge appears to have believed that Attridge's objections were adequately resolved by the fact that the class members, including the Attridge plaintiffs, had been notified of the pending settlement, and given the opportunity to opt out. However, opting out would have preserved only the Attridge plaintiffs' right to pursue their individual claims. It would not have permitted them to maintain the Attridge action as a class action, because the members of the putative Attridge class generally were also members of the class in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, and therefore would be barred from pursuing their claims if they had not opted out of the present settlement. (Cf. Villacres v. ABM Industries Inc., supra, 189 Cal.App.4th at pp. 581-590 [plaintiff who was member of class in prior action and did not opt out of settlement was barred by res judicata from bringing subsequent action raising claims that fell within scope of release [*43] given in prior action].)

Moreover, the opportunity to opt out merely put the absent class members to a Hobson's choice: participate in the settlement in the Credit/Debit Tying Cases, and give up their claims in the Attridge action; or opt out of the settlement, and litigate their Attridge claims separately. A settlement that requires absent class members to give up one set of claims in order to retain other, independent claims should not be approved as fair and equitable unless and until the value of the latter claims has been assessed by the trial court, at least within a "ballpark" for settlement purposes. (See generally Clark, supra, 175 Cal.App.4th 785; Kullar, supra, 168 Cal.App.4th 116; Trotsky, supra, 48 Cal.App.3d 134.) Thus, the fact that the notice to the absent class advised them of the potential effect of the settlement on the Attridge claims and allowed them to opt out does not resolve the problems with the settlement that appellants have identified.[7]

IV. DISPOSITION

The judgment approving the settlement agreement is REVERSED, and the matter is remanded for further proceedings consistent with the views expressed in this opinion, including but not limited to reconsideration of the fairness and adequacy of the settlement in light of the inclusion of the Attridge claims in the scope of the release. Appellants are awarded their costs on appeal, as a joint and several obligation of respondents.

We concur:

End of Document

[7] Because we are reversing the judgment approving the settlement, this case will proceed to trial unless the parties agree to revise the settlement agreement and resubmit it for court approval. Thus, we need not address appellants' [*44] other challenges to the fairness of the existing settlement agreement. To the extent appellants may have similar objections to the terms of any future settlement agreement that are similar to the ones raised here and not addressed in this opinion, they remain free to assert those objections in the course of the proceedings for court approval.

HN1[] Motions to Dismiss, Failure to State Claim

In reviewing a motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a district court is required to accept as true all factual allegations in the complaint and draw all inferences from the facts alleged in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. However, a court need not credit either bald assertions or legal conclusions in a complaint when deciding a motion to dismiss. A complaint survives a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss if it states a claim to relief that is plausible on its face regarding the plaintiff's entitlement to the relief sought. This standard is satisfied only when a plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.

A tying arrangement is an arrangement in which the seller sells one item, known as the tying product, on the condition that the buyer also purchases another item, known as the tied product. In order to make out a 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 per se tying claim, a plaintiff must appropriately allege facts indicating: (1) a defendant seller tied two distinct products, conditioning sale of one product on the purchase of a different tied product; (2) the seller possesses market power in the tying product market; and (3) a substantial amount of interstate commerce is affected.

The first inquiry in any 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 tying case is whether the defendant has sufficient market power over the tying product, which requires a finding that two separate product markets exist and a determination precisely what the tying and tied products markets are. In order to state a Sherman Act claim under § 1, a plaintiff must identify the relevant product and geographic markets.

HN4[] Relevant Market, Geographic Market Definition

The geographic market selected by plaintiffs must correspond to the commercial realities of the industry and be economically significant. The United States Congress prescribed a pragmatic, factual approach to the definition of the relevant market and not a formal, legalistic one. Courts generally measure a market's geographic scope, the area of effective competition, by determining the areas in which the seller operates and where consumers can turn, as a practical matter, for supply of the relevant product. This approach evaluates the geographic aspect of the elasticity of a specified market-that is, how far consumers will go to obtain the product or its substitute in response to a given price increase and how likely it is that a price increase for the product in a particular location will induce outside suppliers to enter that market and increase supply-side competition in that location. Courts have also held that the market for certain entertainment services is local or regional. For per se claims, plaintiffs need not establish a geographic market. Some prohibited practices can be conclusively presumed to unreasonably restrain competition. Further, defining the relevant geographic market is an issue of the merits.

HN5[] Relevant Market, Geographic Market Definition

The relevant geographic market is the market area in which the seller operates, and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies, in other words, the area in which suppliers effectively compete. In view of the realities of the multichannel video programming distributor industry, defining the relevant geographic market as the clustered service area in which an individual distributor operates accords with reports issued by the Federal Communications Commission and other district courts' consideration of the issue.

HN6[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

In antitrust claims reviewed under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a plaintiff has the burden of defining the relevant market. Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted. However, antitrust claims do not have a heightened pleading standard: definition of the relevant product market often requires a deeply fact-intensive inquiry, and courts are hesitant to grant motions to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant market definition. Also, plaintiffs are required to state facts sufficiently alleging coercion: to prove a per se illegal tie-in, a plaintiff must establish an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product. In the absence of a formal agreement, a plaintiff must establish in some other way that a tie-in was involved and not merely the sale of two products by a single seller. This can be done by proof that purchase of one product, the tied product, was not voluntary, i.e., by proof of coercion.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Market Definition > Relevant Market > Product Market Definition

HN7[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

Cluster markets should arguably be found invalid unless: 1) most customers would be willing to pay monopoly prices for the convenience of receiving a defendant's grouping of products; or 2) economies of joint provision make distribution of the cluster cheaper per good than distribution of each separately, and firms supplying one of the products in the cluster could not easily add the others as well. If aggregation reveals an important relationship between the defendants' course of conduct and their overall monopoly power, it is indeed a useful and, hence, appropriate methodology. It, however, aggregation obscures, rather than reveals, it cannot be justified.

HN8[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

A significant element of an illegal tying arrangement is coercion of the consumer by the seller in the form of conditioning the sale of the tying product on the consumer's purchase of the tied product. Where the buyer is free to take either product by itself, there is no tying problem. The United States Supreme Court has focused on the danger of tying when a seller leverages economic power from one market to another. The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such forcing is present, competition on the merits for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act is violated.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > Sherman Act Violations

HN9[] Tying Arrangements, Per Se Rule

The United States Supreme Court has required that, in all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product. The first inquiry into any 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 tying case is whether the defendant has sufficient market power over the tying product. If the defendant is found to have sufficient market power in the tying product market, then the tie may be a per se violation of the Sherman Act. Market power is the power to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market. The focus of the court should be whether the seller has the power to raise prices, or impose other burdensome terms such as a tie-in, with respect to any appreciable number of buyers within the market.

HN10[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

To sufficiently assert a tying claim under a rule of reason theory of liability, plaintiffs need not prove that the seller has power in the tying product market, but must set forth: 1) a viable theory of causation of antitrust injury in that a defendant's alleged tying resulted in anticompetitive effects (e.g., through the forced purchase of inferior goods, consumer surprise, difficulty in consumer ability to make proper price comparisons, or foreclosure of the tied product market); and 2) a rebuttal at trial of defendant's procompetitive justifications, if any. Rule of reason claims are still available to plaintiffs who do not succeed in their per se tying claims.

Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 2, sanctions those who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations. Monopolization under § 2 consists in: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident. Plaintiffs have the burden of defining the relevant § 2 product market. To have standing to seek a § 2 claim, plaintiffs must show that they have suffered an antitrust injury as a result of the defendant's misconduct so as to possess the standing necessary to seek relief. The injury prong requires a showing of: (1) harm of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent; and (2) an injury to the plaintiff which flows from that which makes defendant's acts unlawful.

HN12[] Actual Monopolization, Monopoly Power

Monopoly power has been defined as the power to charge a price higher than the competitive price without inducing so rapid and great an expansion of output from competing firms as to make the supracompetitive price untenable. Such power can be demonstrated by direct evidence of supracompetitive pricing and high barriers to entry or with structural evidence of a monopolized market. Structural indicators of a monopolized market include a firm's possession of a dominant share of a relevant market that is protected by entry barriers. In determining a valid relevant market in which monopoly power is alleged, a court looks to reasonable interchangeability of use of the relevant product. The test for a relevant market is not commodities reasonably interchangeable by a particular plaintiff, but commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN13[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

A single brand of a product of service may constitute a relevant market only where the commodity is unique, and therefore not interchangeable with other products.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Market Definition > Relevant Market

HN14[] Market Definition, Relevant Market

Potential participants in a market may be included in the relevant market since, absent the exclusionary conduct of the alleged monopolist, such participants could have offered interchangeable products. Defining a relevant product market is a process of describing those groups of producers which, because of the similarity of their products, have the ability—actual or potential—to take significant amounts of business away from each other. A market definition must look at all relevant sources of supply, either actual rivals or eager potential entrants to the market.

Opinion

This matter comes before this Court by way of Defendant Cablevision Systems Corporation ("Defendant" or "Cablevision")'s Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). [Docket Entry No. 63]. The matter arises out of allegations that Cablevision employs an illegal tying arrangement in which it uses its market power to require its subscribers to rent cable boxes as a condition of subscribing to Cablevision's "Two Way Services," as defined herein, in violation of Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2, and various state common law prohibitions of unjust enrichment. The Court [*2] has considered the submissions made in support of and in opposition to the instant motion. No oral argument was heard. Fed. R. Civ. P. 78. Based on the reasons that follow, Defendant's motion to dismiss is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

I. BACKGROUND

This case arises out of Plaintiffs' allegations that Cablevision engaged in an illegal restraint on trade in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by forcing customers to rent a set-top cable box in order to receive Cablevision's Two Way Services. Cablevision's Two Way Services allow two-way communication between a subscriber and accessible services through a remote control, said services including: (1) interactive services (including the interactive program guide); (2) pay-per-view ("Pay TV"); (3) Video on Demand ("on Demand"); and (4) iO Games. (Third Am. Compl., ¶¶ 2, 41). Plaintiffs argue that consumers are unable to purchase alternative access to said Two Way Services in the relevant geographic market of the New York, New Jersey and Connecticut from either Cablevision or on the open market and thus claim that Cablevision has impermissibly tied its Two Way Services to its own proprietary cable box. Plaintiffs also [*3] allege that Cablevision unlawfully monopolized the market for the distribution of set-top boxes providing access to Two Way Services in the relevant geographic market in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. (Id., ¶ 19). A complete recitation of the facts of the case can be found in this Court's three opinions dismissing Plaintiffs' Original and two Amended Complaints, entered respectively on August 18, 2010 [Docket Entry No. 31], January 14, 2011 [Docket Entry No. 45] and July 21, 2011 [Docket Entry No. 57], and are incorporated herein by reference.

II. LEGAL STANDARD

HN1[] In reviewing a motion to dismiss pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6), a district court is "required to accept as true all factual allegations in the complaint and draw all inferences from the facts alleged in the light most favorable" to the plaintiff. Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 228 (3d Cir. 2008); see also Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1965, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "However, a court need not credit either 'bald assertions' or 'legal conclusions' in a complaint when deciding a motion to dismiss." Evancho v. Fisher, 423 F.3d 347, 350 (3d Cir. 2005). A complaint survives a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss [*4] if it states a claim to relief that is "plausible on its face" regarding plaintiff's entitlement to the relief sought. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1965-66. This standard is satisfied only when a plaintiff "pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009).

III. DISCUSSION

Plaintiffs allege that Defendant Cablevision's policy requiring subscribers to Two Way Services to rent cable boxes from Cablevision in order to receive said services constitutes an illegal tying scheme in violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act, and, further, that Cablevision unlawfully monopolized the market of set-top box distribution in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act. The Court will address each of Plaintiffs' claims in turn.

1) Plaintiffs' § 1 Tying Claim — Per Se Analysis

HN2[] A tying arrangement is an arrangement in which "the seller sells one item, known as the tying product, on the condition that the buyer also purchases anther item, known as the tied product." Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 442 (3d Cir. 1997)(citing Allen-Myland, Inc. v. International Business Machines Corp. 33 F.3d 194, 200 (3d Cir. 1994)). [*5] In order to make out a § 1 per se tying claim, a plaintiff must appropriately allege facts indicating: (1) a defendant seller tied two distinct products, conditioning sale of one product on the purchase of a different tied product; (2) the seller possesses market power in the tying product market; and (3) a substantial amount of interstate commerce is affected. Town Sound and Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motors Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 477 (3d Cir. 1992); see also SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1062 n.3 (3d Cir. 1978); Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 9-10, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984)("Jefferson Parish"). For the following reasons, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged facts stating a § 1 per se tying claim. Defendant's Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' said claim is therefore denied.

A. Separate Tying and Tied Products

HN3[] "The first inquiry in any § 1 tying case is whether the defendant has sufficient market power over the tying product, which requires a finding that two separate product markets exist and a determination precisely what the tying and tied products markets are." Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 443 (citing Allen-Myland, 33 F.3d at 200-201). [*6] In order to state a Sherman Act claim under § 1, a plaintiff "must identify the relevant product and geographic markets." Id., at 435. The Court finds that Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts regarding valid distinct products markets within the designated geographic market to support this first element of a per se tying claim.

i. Relevant Geographic Market of the Tying and Tied Products.

Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint limits the relevant geographic market to the area in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut in which Cablevision operates, designating said area as the "New York designated market area ('DMA')." (Third Am. Compl., ¶¶ 4, 118). Defendant makes three arguments against the validity of Plaintiffs' alleged geographic market. (Def. Br., at 16). First, Defendant argues that the proposed geographic market is too vague in that it neither delineates a specific geographic area nor identifies which areas within the tri-state area were inside or outside the relevant Two Way Services market during the class period. (Def. Br., at 16-17). Second, Defendant claims that the New York DMA violates the principle articulated in Third Circuit law which circumscribes the relevant geographic [*7] market to "the area in which a potential buyer may rationally look for the goods or services he or she seeks." Pennsylvania Dental Ass'n v. Medical Serv. Ass'n, 745 F.2d 248, 260 (3d Cir. 1984). Specifically, Defendant asserts, Plaintiffs concede that competitive conditions varied within the New York DMA in that Verizon in New Jersey and New York and AT&T in Connecticut offered two-way services in certain areas in which Cablevision operated, but the Third Amended Complaint does not narrow the geographic market to take into account such variations. (Def. Br., at 17-19). Third, Defendant contends that Plaintiffs have it backwards in attempting to define Cablevision's geographic market based on its market share dominance in a particular area rather than defining the market first, based on where consumers may turn for the relevant product. (Def. Br., at 19-20).

HN4[] The geographic market selected by a Plaintiffs must "correspond to the commercial realities of the industry and be economically significant." Brown Shoe v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 336-37, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d

510 (1962). "Congress prescribed a pragmatic, factual approach to the definition of the relevant market and not a formal, legalistic one." Id., at 336. [*8] Courts generally measure > a market's geographic scope, the 'area of effective competition,' by determining the areas in which the seller operates and where consumers can turn, as a practical matter, for supply of the relevant product. This approach evaluates the geographic aspect of the elasticity of a specified market-that is, how far consumers will go to obtain the product or its substitute in response to a given price increase and how likely it is that a price increase for the product in a particular location will induce outside suppliers to enter that market and increase supply-side competition in that location.

Courts have also held that "the market for certain entertainment services ... is local or regional." Heerwagen, 435 F.3d at 228 (collecting cases); see also Houser v. Fox Theatres Management, Corp., 845 F.2d 1225, 1230 & n. 10 (determining the movie ticket market based on how far theatergoers travel to see movies). For per se claims, "plaintiffs need not establish a geographic market." Behrend v. Comcast Corp., 655 F.3d 182, 192 (3d Cir. 2011); [*9] see also In re Ins. Brokerage Antitrust Litig., 618 F.3d 300, 316-317 (3d Cir. 2010)(explaining that some prohibited practices can be conclusively presumed to unreasonably restrain competition). Further, "[d]efining the relevant geographic market . . . is an issue of the merits." Behrend, 655 F.3d at 192; see also Borough of Lansdale v. Phila. Elec. Co., 692 F.2d 307 (3d Cir. 1982)(addressing on appeal whether a jury verdict should be set aside because of allegedly erroneous definition of the relevant geographic market and finding that the relevant geographic market was a jury question).

Defendant's arguments regarding Plaintiffs' definition of the relevant geographic market are unpersuasive at this stage of the pleadings. Most importantly, since the relevant geographic market "is a component of substantive antitrust law" to be determined on the merits as a jury question, the Court finds that the New York DMA is a relevant geographic market susceptible to proof at trial through available evidence common to the class. See Behrend, 655 F.3d at 192.

To the extent that Defendant seeks to dismiss Plaintiffs' tying claim under a rule of reason analysis, the Court is still not convinced of [*10] the invalidity of the relevant geographic market at this stage. Defendant's first argument regarding the vagueness of the New York DMA is not supported by the case law. Defendant cites Mathias v. Daily News, L.P., to support its assertion that the "tri-state area" is too vague of a geographic market to survive a motion to dismiss. (Def. Br., at 17). In Mathias, delivery firms claimed, inter alia, that a newspaper publisher, the Daily News, conspired with others to force the delivery firms to purchase the News from the defendant publisher at unreasonably high prices, amounting to a "systematic exclusion" of the delivery firms from the home delivery business. 152 F. Supp. 2d 465, 477-83 (S.D.N.Y. 2001). However, the Mathias court located the vagueness of plaintiffs' definition of the relevant geographic market not in the breadth of the "tri-state area" market, but rather in the contradictory and imprecise nature of the plaintiffs' shifting definition of the relevant market between the broader national market and the narrower "tri-state area" market. Plaintiffs assert no such contradictory or vague market here, narrowing the scope of the market to those areas of the New York DMA in which [*11] Cablevision operates.

Further, HN5[] the relevant geographic market is "the market area in which the seller operates, and to which the purchaser can practicably turn for supplies," in other words, the area in which suppliers "effectively compete." Behrend, 655 F.3d at 193. In view of the realities of the multichannel video programming distributor ("MVPD") industry, defining the relevant geographic market as the clustered service area in which an individual distributor operates accords with reports issued by the Federal Communications Commission ("FCC") and other district courts' consideration of the issue. First, in its examination of the commercial realities of the industry of MVPDs, of which Cablevision is a participant, the FCC aggregated relevant geographic markets in which customers face similar competitive choices, noting in its 2009 Annual Report that "[c]able operators continue to pursue a regional strategy of 'clustering' their systems." (Def. Mot. to Dismiss, Decl. of Jakob B. Halpern ("Halpern Decl."), Ex. 6, "FCC Thirteenth Annual Report of 2009" ("FCC 2009 Report"), at ¶ 180). Further, at least five federal district courts that have considered antitrust claims against MVPDs for [*12] alleged tying with set-top boxes have determined that the relevant geographic market consists in the service area of the cable companies. See In re Cox Enterprises, Inc. Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litigation, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58417, at * 20-21 (W.D. Okla. Jan. 19, 2010); Parsons v. Bright House Networks, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55277, at * 20-21 (N.D. Ala. Feb. 23, 2010); Bodet, Jr. v. Charter Communications, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 87088, at *8, 17-18 (E.D. La. July 26, 2010); Downs v. Insight Communications Company, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29616, at * 10-11 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 22, 2011); In re Time Warner Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litigation, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39001, at * 20-26 (S.D.N.Y. April 8, 2011). Taking the facts of Plaintiffs' Complaint to be true and considering the commercial realities of the relevant industry at issue in this matter, it is plausible that the New York DMA is the relevant geographic market in which Cablevision operates and effectively competes for Two-Way Services with other providers of said services.

Defendant's second argument regarding variations within the New York DMA is also unconvincing insofar as Plaintiffs contend that, [*13] even in areas where overbuilders (such as Verizon and AT&T) and satellite providers competed with Cablevision's provision of Two-Way Services during the class period, Cablevision still had an overwhelming market share of, at minimum, 90% of said services in the relevant geographic market. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 6, 120). Therefore, accepting Plaintiffs' factual allegations as true, those variations in local or rural markets do not sufficiently impact a determination of shifts in or adjustments to consumer choices within submarkets of the New York DMA. While the Complaint concedes to competitive variations between the conditions of specific geographic markets in which overbuilders and satellite operators have limited incursions in the relevant product market, those variations at the pleading stage are consistent with alleging a plausible geographic market based on a pragmatic, factual approach under Brown Shoe, and do not produce contradictory results as would, for example, the oscillation between the national and tri-state area markets in Mathias.

Finally, the Court finds that Defendant's third argument incorrectly characterizes Plaintiffs' approach to the relevant geographic market [*14] definition. Plaintiffs' geographic market definition is not circumscribed after the fact of Plaintiffs' assertion of Defendant Cablevision's dominance; rather, Plaintiffs' definition limits itself to Defendant's areas of operation within the sole designated market area in which it operates in the United States, an area in which Plaintiffs allege Cablevision also dominates in the relevant product market of Two Way Services. (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 26). The Court agrees with Defendant that Plaintiffs may not allege a "very high market share in a geographic market," but rather must allege power "in the relevant geographic market" (Def. Br., at 20), but given that the New York DMA is the only geographic market in which Cablevision operates to offer Two Way Services, the Court does not find that Plaintiffs are boot-strapping their geographic market definition only to areas in which it happens to be dominant. Therefore, for the above-cited reasons, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged facts demonstrating the existence of a relevant geographic market.

ii. Relevant Product Markets: Tying Product Market of Two-Way Services, Tied Product Market of Cable Set-Top Boxes, and Coercion.

HN6[] In antitrust claims [*15] reviewed under Rule 12(b)(6), a plaintiff has "the burden of defining the relevant market. Where the plaintiff fails to define its proposed relevant market with reference to the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, or alleges a proposed relevant market that clearly does not encompass all interchangeable substitute products even when all factual inferences are granted in plaintiff's favor, the relevant market is legally insufficient and a motion to dismiss may be granted." Queen City Pizza, Inc. v. Domino's Pizza, Inc., 124 F.3d 430, 436 (3d Cir. 1997)(citations omitted). However, antitrust claims do not have a heightened pleading standard: "[d]efinition of the relevant product market often requires 'a deeply fact-intensive inquiry,' and courts are hesitant to grant motions to dismiss for failure to plead a relevant market definition." *In re Time Warner, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39001, at * 27* (quoting Todd v. Exxon Corp., 275 F.3d 191, 199-200 (2d Cir. 2001)). Also, plaintiffs are required to state facts sufficiently alleging coercion: "[t]o prove a per se illegal tie-in, a plaintiff must establish... an agreement by a party to sell one product but only [*16] on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product. . . [I]n the absence of a formal agreement, a plaintiff must establish in some other way that a tie-in was involved and not merely the sale of two products by a single seller. This can be done by proof that purchase of one product, the tied product, was not voluntary, i.e., by proof of coercion." SmithKline, 575 F.2d at 1062 n. 3.

Throughout their Amended Complaints, Plaintiffs have with increasing precision defined the tied product market as the cable set-top box that provides access to Defendant Cablevision's Two Way Services. (Compl., at ¶ 29; Am. Compl., at ¶ 39; Sec. Am. Compl., at ¶ 33; Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 42). However, Plaintiffs have consistently narrowed their definition of the tying product market in their respective Amended Complaints from a broad definition of Cablevision's iO TV Package to only a limited set of interactive services Cablevision provides which are accessible via a cable set-top box. Specifically, Plaintiffs' Original Complaint defined the tying product market as Cablevision's sale of subscriptions to its iO TV Packages. (Compl., at ¶¶ 22-23). This Court found that market definition [*17] to be too broad since iO TV Packages allowed access to certain interactive services through both set-top boxes and CableCARDs. (Aug. 18, 2010 Op., at 10-11). As a result, the Court held that while Plaintiffs failed to adequately allege the requisite coercion for a tying claim as defined against those services, actual coercion was found to be alleged with respect to digital services "not currently available through use of a CableCARD device: (1) Video On Demand, (2) iO interactive program guide; (3) iO games, and (4) the ability to order Pay Per View events using a remote control." (Id.). The Court allowed Plaintiffs to amend their original complaint, and in their First Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs redefined the tying product market as "iO TV Package with two way communications so as to permit Two Way Services." (Sec. Am. Compl., at ¶ 32). In its January 14, 2011 Opinion, the Court found that that Amended Complaint did not "limit the tying product to Two Way Services," so "the tying product remains an iO TV Package (which is comprised of both one-way and two-way services)." (Jan. 14, 2011 Op., at 5). Since the Court found that Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible claim for coercion [*18] between the whole of the designated tying product and the tied product of the cable box due to only part of the tying product, the Two Way Services, being allegedly tied to the rental of the tied product, the Court again dismissed Plaintiffs' Complaint without prejudice to its refiling. Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint defined the tying product as "Two Way Services" to which consumers subscribe through one of Cablevision's iO TV Packages. (Sec. Am. Compl., at ¶ 27). However, the Court found a discrepancy between Plaintiffs' definition of Two Way Services and the contents of an exhibit attached to Plaintiffs' Complaint. That exhibit indicated that "Switched Digital Video Services," which seemed to include the "digital channels and international programming" referenced in Plaintiffs' tying product definition, were potentially accessible through a TiVo/Moxi HD DVR equipped with a CableCARD and Tuning Adapter, and thus did not appear to be exclusively accessible through a cable set-top box. (July 21, 2011 Op., at 6). Since Plaintiffs "attached a document to their Complaint which states that a portion of the tying product (i.e., the 'digital channels and international programming' portion [*19] of Two Way Services) can be accessed by Cablevision subscribers without the rental of the tied product (the cable box)," the Court agreed with Defendant that Plaintiffs had again failed to state a claim of coercion that was plausible on its face. (Id.).

In Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint, they continue to allege that Defendant has inappropriately tied two distinct products, Two Way Services and set-top cable boxes, to one another. Two Way Services are now defined to include "both the package of interactive services offered by Cablevision . . . and similar packages of interactive services offered by overbuilders such as AT&T and Verizon," but "Two Way Services offered by other major incumbent cable companies such as Cox and Time Warner" are not included "because no major incumbent cable company operates in the geographic areas in which Cablevision operates." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 3). Critically, the newest iteration of the Complaint excludes the digital channels and international programming portion of Two Way Services accessible by CableCARD in its "Two Way Services" definition of the tying product market. (Id., at ¶¶ 37-40). However, Plaintiff asserts that an ambiguity exists [*20] on Defendant Cablevision's website regarding "the full scope of premium cable services that have not been available to subscribers without a set-top box (i.e., with only a CableCARD) at various times during the Class Period." (Id., at ¶ 40 & 40 n. 2). The Third Amended Complaint alleges that Defendant's current website states that "Switched Digital Video Services" are accessible via CableCARD, but Defendant's website in 2004 did not mention these services as accessible via CableCARD (simply stating to website visitors at that time that "[y]ou will need a Digital set-top box - different than the one you may currently have to receive analog premium channels - to receive the digital channels, order video on demand services or listen to digital music channels"). (Id.). Plaintiffs assert that discovery will be necessary to determine exactly which Two Way Services were available to subscribers without a set-top box during the Class Period. (Id.). Therefore, while the Third Amended Complaint defines the tying product market as "Two Way Services" which "include the interactive program guide, interactive games, Pay TV and On Demand," it also defines the tying product market in the alternative [*21] as "the Two Way Services plus any additional premium cable services which are (or were) not available with a CableCARD during the Class Period." (Id., at ¶¶ 38, 40 n. 2).

Defendant argues that Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint should be dismissed because Plaintiffs fail to sufficiently allege a valid tying product market and because it fails to sufficiently allege coercion. First, Defendant claims that Plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege a valid tying product market since they allege no facts that justify Plaintiffs' exclusion from the market of obvious substitutes for Cablevision's Two-Way Services. (Def. Br., at 12). Specifically, Defendant construes Plaintiffs' tying product market as an invalid "cluster market" that brings together distinct services which, if differentiated, would include reasonable substitutes arbitrarily excised by Plaintiffs from the relevant product market. (Id., at 12-16). For example, Defendant alleges that the Video on Demand service ("On Demand") included in Plaintiffs' Two Way Services market faces competition from direct-broadcast satellite ("DBS") providers, which make digital video recorded movies and programs available for home rental or [*22] sale; internet providers that provide on-demand digital videos; and movie channels such as HBO or other programming for movies provided through one-way services. (Id., at 13-14). Defendant also contends that the iO Games service provided through its Two Way Services have reasonable substitutes through other gaming systems, such as Xbox, and that Pay TV has the reasonable substitutes of ordinary TV or televised events that can be ordered through a CableCARD over the phone. (Id., at 14).

Second, Defendant argues that Plaintiffs' definition of their tying product is identical to their definition articulated in their Second Amended Complaint which was dismissed by this Court, and for that reason Plaintiffs again fail to allege the requisite coercion for a tying claim since some of Cablevision's Two Way Services, namely Pay TV, are accessible to subscribers of Cablevision's iO TV Packages via CableCARD. (Id., at 27-28). Defendant does not state whether Pay TV was accessible to subscribers of Cablevision's Two Way Services throughout the relevant class period alongside Pay TV's accessibility via a cable set-top box.

The Court will first address the validity of Plaintiffs' relevant tying product [*23] market as it complies with the rule of reasonable interchangeability and cross-elasticity of demand, considering next whether Plaintiffs sufficiently addressed the pleading deficiencies in the Second Amended Complaint regarding coercion.

a. Validity of Plaintiffs' Tying Product Market

As stated infra, Defendant contends that Plaintiffs' tying product market of Two Way Services must fail as a matter of law because it excludes reasonable substitutes and their "cluster market" concept neither alleges sufficient market power over each clustered service nor is sufficient on the grounds of the existence of "one-stop shopping." (Def. Br., at 12-15). Plaintiffs assert that Two Way Services is a valid tying product market at this stage for three reasons: 1) the "clustered product" is a legally valid market definition under antitrust law and Supreme Court precedent; 2) Defendant failed to state reasonably interchangeable substitutes for the individual services packaged with Cablevision's broader interactive services; and 3) hotly contested factual issues regarding market definition are not appropriately addressed at the motion to dismiss stage. (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 15-23). For the reasons set forth [*24] below, the Court finds Plaintiffs' tying product market valid at this juncture.

The Supreme Court has generally considered "cluster" markets in contexts in which, as a matter of trade or commercial reality, a cluster of products create a distinct line of commerce. For example, in a line of cases beginning in 1963, the Supreme Court considered whether clusters of products and services provided by financial institutions could constitute a cluster market of commercial banking with economic significance beyond the various products and services involved, and the Supreme Court found that commercial banking could in fact constitute such a market. See, e.g. U.S. v. Philadelphia Natl. Bank, 374 U.S. 321, 83 S. Ct. 1715, 10 L. Ed. 2d 915 (1963); U.S. v. Phillipsburg Nat'l Bank and Trust Co., 399 U.S. 350, 379-83, 90 S. Ct. 2035, 26 L. Ed. 2d 658 (1970); U.S. v. Connecticut Nat'l Bank, 418 U.S. 656, 660-66, 94 S. Ct. 2788, 41 L. Ed. 2d 1016 (1974).

In U.S. v. Grinnell Corp., the Supreme Court found a valid "cluster" market of central station property protective services (central fire alarm and burglary systems) which were not interchangeable or economic substitutes for an end user, affirming that the Court "see[s] no barrier in combining in a single market a number of different products or services [*25] where that combination reflects commercial realities." 384 U.S. 563, 572, 86 S. Ct. 1698, 16 L. Ed. 2d 778 (1966). In that case, Justice Douglas suggested that distinct, non-interchangeable services could be grouped together into one market if "companies recognize that to compete effectively, they must offer all or nearly all types of service." Id. Grinnell has been interpreted as a valid example in which nonsubstitutable goods could constitute a relevant "cluster" market based on the rationale of "economies of joint provision," or economies produced in a relevant market that would give a monopolist of the combination of separate goods a decisive cost advantage over those who offered the services separately:

> Under the technology of the day, central station services connected covered homes by a wire to a central station, and sensors for motion, window breakage, smoke, fire, and so on were connected together. This was almost certainly cheaper than it would be for different firms to duplicate the network, each of them offering a single type of protection. The relevant questions would then be whether the offeror of the combined services could profit by charging a price significantly above its costs, while preventing other [*26] firms from offering a similar set of combined services. If the answer to both questions is yes, then the grouping is a relevant market.

2B Phillip E. Areeda & Herbert Hovenkamp, Antitrust Law, ¶ 565c, at 409 (3d Ed. 2007). The "cluster" market has also been taken to stand for the proposition that "courts should cluster a group of goods when competition causes that group to be supplied together." Ian Ayres, "Rationalizing Antitrust Cluster Markets," 95 Yale L. J. 109, 112 (1985). More specifically, antitrust scholars have suggested that courts should cluster goods which are "transactional complements," or goods that, if bought from a single firm, significantly reduce consumers' transaction costs, tying consumer purchases of those products to individual firms. Id., at 110-11. In sum, HN7[] "cluster" markets should arguably be found invalid unless: 1) most customers would be willing to pay monopoly prices for the convenience of receiving a defendant's grouping of products; or 2) economies of joint provision make distribution of the cluster cheaper per good than distribution of each separately, and firms supplying one of the products in the cluster could not easily add the others as well. Areeda & Hovenkamp, at 408. [*27] "If aggregation reveals 'an important relationship between the defendants' course of conduct and their overall monopoly power,' it is indeed a useful and, hence, appropriate methodology. It, however, aggregation obscures, rather than reveals, it cannot be justified." United States v. AT&T, 524 F. Supp. 1336, 1376 n. 165 (D.D.C. 1981)(finding a cluster market on the grounds of "industry recognition, coincidence of supplying firms, and the integrated nature of the telecommunications system").

The Third Circuit Court of Appeals has affirmed a district court's determination that a cable company's "clustering" activity may establish a relevant market in the context of swaps and acquisitions made in a given geographic market where consumers face similar competitive choices since that determination considered both where a buyer may rationally look for goods and the commercial reality of the industry. Behrend, 655 F.3d at 194. While the Third Circuit reviewed clustering in the context of a geographic market, the Court finds that an analysis of a valid market from the perspective of consumer behavior, reviewing the competitive choices of end users based on the commercial reality of the industry, [*28] is equally applicable here where Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges geographic consolidation of Defendant Cablevision's Two Way Services market alongside the provision of a collection of nonsubstitutable services.

The facts alleged by Plaintiffs in support of finding a valid "cluster" market of Two Way Services are the following. Cablevision itself defined its Two Way Services as a package on its website: "iO TV interactive services are not available with a CableCARD. In order to receive interactive digital services such as iO Video on Demand, and the iO interactive program guide and to order pay per view events using your remote, you must have a digital cable box." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 8, 41, 98). Further, Plaintiffs' Complaint provides facts detailing the unique nature of Cablevision's product as a "bundled" product: its provision of a "multitude of services" to consumers "with the ability to select from and view a variety of programming"; allowing subscribers to "have control over these viewing options simply by using their television remote controls without having to even leave their couch"; and > Allow[ing] consumers to navigate through a vast array of programming options and choose [*29] the options that suit them best in a given moment. Subscribers can choose from a live sporting event in high definition, a brand new television show, or specialized coverage of a breaking current event. Video rentals, whether from a brick and mortar store, a mail service, on an internet site, do not offer consumers any of those options. Moreover, consumers cannot access video rentals from brick and mortar stores or Netflix on a sudden whim, as they can with Two Way Services. In addition, brick and mortar rental stores like Blockbuster have been reducing staff, reducing hours and closing in recent years while the number of Two Way Services subscribers > and the prices of subscriptions have increased consistently. These products are functionally and substantively different from Two Way Services and are not reasonably interchangeable with Two Way Services. Websites or internet vendors did not offer a comparable produc[t] to interactive Two Way Services during the Class Period.

(Id., at ¶¶ 114-116). Plaintiffs thus argue, "consumers view the Two Way Services provided by Cablevision as functionally superior, more readily available and easier to use than the individual one way services cited [*30] in Defendants' brief." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 20).

Further, Plaintiffs' Complaint alleges that overbuilders such as AT&T and Verizon cannot compete with said packaged services readily because Cablevision has taken steps to frustrate their competitive entry. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 80). Specifically, Plaintiffs cite to the FCC's January 20, 2010 Report and Order, which states:

> Cable operators continue to have the incentive and ability to withhold or take other unfair acts with their affiliated programming in order to hinder competition in the video distribution market. A vertically integrated cable operator may raise tile costs of its MVPD competitors by increasing the price of its affiliated programming or may choose not to sell its affiliated programming to rival MVPDs. As the Commission noted in the Adelphia Order, "the integrated firm may be able to harm its rivals' competitive positions, enabling it to raise prices and increase its market share in the downstream market, thereby increasing its profits while retaining lower prices for itself or for firms with which it does not compete." Unfair acts involving cable-affiliated programming may harm the ability of MVPDs to compete with incumbent [*31] cable operators, thereby resulting in less competition in the marketplace to the detriment of consumers.

(Id., quoting FCC January 20, 2010 Report and Order, at ¶ 26). Barriers to entry to overbuilders alleged in this case include: "the enormous costs associated with building and maintaining a broadband network infrastructure; the cost and pricing advantages that incumbent cable providers like Cablevision have vis-à-vis overbuilders; and the significant time and expense associated with the franchising application process." (Id., at ¶ 111). Finally, Plaintiffs assert that "Cablevision has increased the number of its Two Way Services customers, despite increasing its prices, every year during the class period, despite the onset of supposed competition from individual services such as Xbox and Netflix, demonstrating that the market did not consider those individual components to be reasonable substitutes for Cablevision's package of Two Way Services." (Id., at 21; see also Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 59-65).

The Court finds these alleged facts to be sufficient for establishing a "cluster" product market of Two Way Services in that the combination of interactive services provided is a combination [*32] reflective of the commercial realities in the industry of MVPDs creating a distinct line of commerce. Specifically, the Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint pleads sufficient facts to establish that differences exist between the Defendant's provision of interactive services and non-cable and other entertainment providers that offer individual services or partial clusters that are not bundled together in a convenient, comprehensive format accessible through a remote from the interior of a home. See e.g., Science Products Co. v. Chevron Chem. Co., 384 F. Supp. 793, 797 (N.D. Ill. 1974)(finding that a "substantial overlap of locus of use for ... products generally" supports cluster definition); In re The Grand Union Co., 102 F.T.C. 812, 1044 (1983)(stronger case for clustering where services are involved, especially "where the services are complex, interrelated, and interdependent"). Similar to the facts alleged in Grinnell, Plaintiffs state facts regarding the provision of services connecting homes that have subscribed to Cablevision's Two Way Services to a central system through which said homes can access and control a range of entertainment options, the combination of which being difficult [*33] to duplicate by overbuilders, satellite providers, or individual firms providing only, for example, games or videos. It is plausible that the economies of joint provision of Two Way Services make distribution of interactive services cheaper per individual service than distribution of each service separately, and firms supplying one of the products in the cluster-for example, Netflix with videos or DBS providers with digital channels-cannot easily add other services such as Video on Demand or gaming services through instant and direct home delivery.

Defendant contends that "goods cannot be clustered unless there is sufficient basis for inferring that the defendant has the required degree of market power over each of the goods in the cluster." (See Def. Br., at 15; Areeda & Hovenkamp, at 408). Defendant cites to U.S. v. Phillipsburg Nat'l Bank & Trust Co. and Emigra Group, LLC v. Fragomen, Del Rey, Bernsen & Loewy, LLP to support their argument that clustering is a "severe exception" not to be found where either of the following exist on their own: 1) where packages make access possible to services that would otherwise be unavailable; or 2) where a plaintiff can show "[t]he existence [*34] of one-stop shopping, and a group of customers with a preference or even demand for it." (See Def. Br., at 15-16; Phillipsburg, 399 U.S. at 360; Emigra Group, 612 F. Supp. 2d 330, 352-55 (S.D.N.Y. 2009). However, based on the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint, neither of these conditions exist on their own in this case without additional facts alleged.

First, the facts alleged here are close to those in Phillipsburg in which the Court found that customers were likely to maintain certain accounts in the same local bank even when higher savings interest was available elsewhere due to the convenience of one-stop banking and the advantages of a consistent and continuous relationship with one banker. 399 U.S. at 361. Likewise, here, it is plausible to infer that the separate services provided by Cablevision made possible access to services that may otherwise have been unavailable from a home through a remote control. Thus, unlike the facts in Queen City Pizza where the relevant market was found not to be Domino's-approved tomatoes or dough for franchisees, but rather the entire available markets for tomatoes and pizza dough, the interactive services at issue here are not [*35] interchangeable with submarket products purchasable in each wider submarket. Interactive Two-Way Services are a qualitatively different, unique product, more analogous to a set of facts in which Domino's were the only seller in a geographic market of green tomatoes and then required franchisees to only use green tomatoes in their franchise pizza production. More specifically in the context of tying jurisprudence, the separate relevant submarkets neither constitute reasonable substitutes for the package nor do the separate submarkets broken down into their separate elements-digital channels / one-way services, cable TV, on-demand video, interactive gaming-provide reasonable substitutes for those services as provided through Cablevision's Two Way Services.

For example, Defendant argues that satellite providers and one-way movie channels through normal or cable TV should be viewed as a reasonable substitute for the digital channels provided through Cablevision's Two Way Services. (Def. Br., at 13-14). However, neither satellite providers nor one-way services through movie channels like HBO offer interactive services in which a customer can select specific viewing events at the time of [*36] their choosing in their home through a remote control. One-way services as provided by satellite providers are equally distinguishable from the viewing services offered through an interactive communication system like Cablevision's Two Way Services. In Parsons v. Bright House Networks, the Northern District of Alabama found that plaintiffs' exclusion of satellite MVPDs from their definition of the relevant tying product market could survive a motion to dismiss since plaintiffs alleged sufficient facts that satellite providers did not constitute reasonable substitutes for premium cable services due to: 1) defendants' own representations that they provide superior services and reliability over satellite providers; 2) satellites may only be installed on an external surface with clear sky access, which may be unavailable in urban areas or banned by multi-family dwellings such as apartments; 3) cable MVPDs' ability to "bundle" cable services with phone and internet services where satellite providers could not created high entry barriers in the form of: costs for constructing a parallel cable system, obtaining licenses from local franchises authorities, accessing multi-family dwellings such [*37] as apartments and obtaining programming rights to popular channels; and 4) high switching costs from incumbent MVPDs to different providers in terms of time and money in set-up and new equipment. *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS, at * 7-9, 19-20*. In this case, Plaintiffs cite to Cablevision's explicit statement that, "We compete with . . . DBS [satellite] competitors by 'bundling' our service offerings with products that DBS companies cannot efficiently provide at this time, such as high-speed data service and voice service carried over the cable distribution plant, as well as by providing interactive services that are currently unavailable to a DBS subscriber." (Def. Mot. to Dismiss, Halpern Decl., Ex. 5, "Cablevision 2009 Form 10-K, filed February 25, 2010," at 48; Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 69). Further, Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint alleges facts pertaining to Cablevision's programmer-distributor contracts which were executed before satellite providers existed which gives Defendant more popular programming options than satellite providers and establishes barriers to their entry. (Third Am. Compl., ¶ 70). Finally, Plaintiffs allege that satellite and cable MVPDs are technologically distinct [*38] in that satellite technology uses a telephone line as an exchange, and the receiving unit does not have the ability to transfer information back to the satellite for use in interactive services. (Id., ¶ 71). Therefore, the Court finds that neither one-way movie channels nor satellite providers not constitute reasonable substitutes for the provision of digital channel or video programming through Two Way Services, and Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts distinguishing their interchangeability.

Further, Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to infer that other submarkets which Defendant introduces as reasonable substitutes for individual services provided through its Two Way Services do not in fact constitute reasonable substitutes. Specifically, Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to survive a motion to dismiss with respect to the reasonable comparability of entertainment services such as internet streaming, Netflix and gaming systems like Xbox and Playstation. Plaintiffs assert that these internet services are not interchangeable with the package of Two Way Services in that website and internet vendors: 1) do not offer a comparable selection of offerings as the cable MVPD [*39] companies in part due to content providers' concern about distributing copyright material; 2) have poorer quality of internet videos with longer download times and higher rates of interruptions in viewing; and 3) were nascent ventures during the Class Period and had an extremely limited customer base. (Id., ¶ 116). Gaming services is alleged not to provide comparable service as iO Games in that the interactive service provided through Cablevision allows subscribers to instantly choose, through a remote control in their home, a specific game amongst a vast array of options which would be best suited to their wishes in the moment. (Id., ¶ 115). Thus, the facts alleged by Plaintiffs plausibly state why subscribers may not find each individual submarket service interchangeable with those provided through Cablevision's Two Way Services. The many distinguishing features alleged by Plaintiffs within each submarket of goods are sufficient to plead a valid relevant product market of Two Way Services worthy of surviving a motion to dismiss.

Second, while Plaintiffs in part allege a one-stop shopping theory here as articulated infra, they also state facts alleging more than just consumer convenience. [*40] Defendants reject Plaintiffs' cluster product definition in part on the grounds that it is based on a one-stop shopping theory, and they cite to Areeda and Hovenkamp in their assertion that "courts typically and properly reject claims that customers find 'one-stop' shopping for noncompeting goods attractive, notwithstanding lower prices elsewhere. . . the courts properly focused on the facility providing the nonsubstitute goods, but they refused to find a relevant market because there was no evidence that the combination could not readily be duplicated by other sellers in response to supracompetitive prices." Areeda & Hovenkamp, at 410. However, in this case, Plaintiffs allege more than the benefits of a one-stop shopping service provided by Cablevision since they also allege facts about pricing and facts about the ability of other sellers to compete with the same bundle of services:

• "[E]ven after significantly increasing the price Cablevision charges for subscriptions to premium cable packages that include Two Way Services, Cablevision has not only retained a substantial number of such subscribers, but has regularly increased the number of subscribers to Two Way Services" (Third [*41] Am. Compl., ¶ 59);

• "Cablevision does not face any appreciable competition from major cable operators, as each of these major cable companies employ the same 'clustering' strategy, in which they concentrate their cable operations in geographic areas where only one incumbent has the infrastructure to operate" (Id., ¶ 106);

• "[T]he clustering and bundling strategies... as well as the long term contracts which enable cable operators to offer more popular programming options, were (and are) effective in enabling Cablevision — like other cable providers — to achieve and maintain market dominance in the areas in which it operates" (Id., ¶ 110);

• "Video game systems (such as X-box) and video rental services (such as Netflix and Blockbuster) are not reasonable substitutes for Two Way Services, which provide a combination of valuable services in a convenient comprehensive format." (Id., ¶ 115).

Based on facts alleged concerning interchangeability of the services product, consumer preference, pricing, and other sellers' ability to duplicate, Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated a relevant tying product market of Two Way Services beyond a mere cluster market definition resting in a one-stop shopping [*42] theory. Therefore, the Court finds at this stage that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a valid tying product market. Defendant does not contest the validity of the tied product market in their Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint.

b. Coercion Through Involuntary Purchase of Tied Product

Defendant contends that Plaintiffs have again failed to sufficiently allege coercion for two reasons: 1) Plaintiffs solely challenge technological incompatibility, so their Third Amended Complaint fails to allege coercion as a matter of law under Foremost Pro Color, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 703 F.2d 534, 542 (9th Cir. 1983); and 2) Plaintiffs include in the purported tying product a service that can be accessed by Cablevision subscribers without the rental of the tied product, the set-top cable box. (Def. Br., at 25-29). Plaintiffs assert on the contrary that: 1) Plaintiffs Third Amended Complaint contains no allegations of technological incompatibility as a basis for their coercion claim and thus Defendants' argument goes beyond the pleadings; 2) to the extent that Plaintiffs' Complaint preserves allegations made in the Original Complaint regarding technological incompatibility, [*43] no binding legal authority prevents such an allegation as a basis for establishing coercion; 3) Plaintiffs removed "Switched Digital Video Services" from the primary market definition of the tying product market, a service which could be accessed without the rental of the cable box; and 4) the "Pay TV" services included in Plaintiffs' tying product market definition are limited to those accessible by remote control and exclude any services which allow Cablevision customers to purchase pay-per-view events by phone. (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 5-10).

This Court agrees with Plaintiff that the Third Amended Complaint sufficiently alleges coercion. Since the facts of this case are distinguishable from Foremost, the Court does not find any preserved claims regarding technological incompatibility to be deficient as a matter of law to allege coercion. To the extent that Plaintiff's Third Amended Complaint has excluded those services sold by Defendant Cablevision not conditioned on the lease of a cable box, Plaintiff's Complaint has sufficiently narrowed the tying product market at this stage of the pleadings. Therefore, Plaintiffs' complaint complies with the requirement cited by this Court from In [*44] re Time Warner., which stated that "[o]nly those services which were unavailable to consumers who opted to use the alternative CableCARD to access secured channels, despite paying an additional fee for the service, caused consumers to be actually coerced into renting a cable box." *In re Time Warner Inc. Set-Top Cable TV Box Antitrust Litigation, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 22369, at * 26 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 5, 2010)*.

As stated above, HN8[] a significant element of an illegal tying arrangement is coercion of the consumer by the seller in the form of conditioning the sale of the tying product on the consumer's purchase of the tied product. See Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 10, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958); Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 605, 73 S. Ct. 872, 97 L. Ed. 1277 (1953). "[W]here the buyer is free to take either product by itself, there is no tying problem. . . ." Northern Pac. Ry. Co, 356 U.S. at 6 n. 4. The Supreme Court has focused on the danger of tying when a seller leverages economic power from one market to another: "Our cases have concluded that the essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force [*45] the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms. When such 'forcing' is present, competition on the merits for the tied item is restrained and the Sherman Act is violated." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12.

1) Technological Incompatibility

While Defendant contends that Plaintiffs' coercion challenge solely relies on technological incompatibility, a claim insufficient to establish an unlawful per se tying arrangement, the Court finds that any preserved claims regarding technological incompatibility alleged in Plaintiffs' Complaint are not deficient as a matter of law to allege the requisite element of coercion in this case.

In Foremost, plaintiff Foremost Pro Color, an authorized Kodak dealer and independent photofinisher brought, inter alia, a tying claim against Eastman Kodak Company alleging that, because Kodak's newly issued 110 cameras could only use new Kodacolor II film, and because this film could only be processed with Kodak's own new papers and chemicals, Kodak had unlawfully tied: the sale of cameras to film, film to chemicals, and chemicals to paper and film in violation [*46] of § 1 of the Sherman Act and § 3 of the Clayton Act. Foremost, 703 F.2d at 537. In upholding the district court's granting of defendant Kodak's Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a tying claim, the Ninth Circuit held that the requisite element of coercion was absent from plaintiff's claim. Specifically, the court found that plaintiff had not sufficiently alleged "that the purchase of the alleged tied products was required as a condition of sale of the alleged tying products, rather than a prerequisite to practical and effective use of the tying products." Id., at 542. Elaborating on coercion in the context of "technological ties," the court found procompetitive aspects in said ties which protect product innovation "in such technologically advancing industries as the photographic industry The creation of technological incompatibilities . . . increases competition by providing consumers with a choice among differing technologies, advanced and standard, and by providing competing manufacturers the incentive to enter the new product market by developing similar products of advanced technology." Id. If a court were to find the development of new cameras which require [*47] new processing materials a per se unlawful tie, such technological innovations and procompetitive benefits would be thwarted since "[t]he essence of a per se unlawful tying arrangement... is that it forecloses competition in the market for the tied product or products." Id. Therefore, the court held that, "as a general rule ... the development and introduction of a system of technologically interrelated products is not sufficient alone to establish a per se unlawful tying arrangement even if the new products are incompatible with the products then offered by the competition and effective use of any one of the new products necessitates purchase of some or all of the others. Any other conclusion would unjustifiably deter the development and introduction of those new technologies so essential to the continued progress of our economy." Id., at 542-43.

Taking the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' Complaint to be true, this case is distinguishable from Foremost in at least two respects: 1) Defendant has not presented evidence that it is in the business of developing and introducing a "system of technologically interrelated products" similar to the camera, film, paper and chemicals system developed [*48] and introduced by Kodak; and 2) Plaintiffs did not claim that it was the technological tie, standing alone, which constituted the coercive element in the allegedly unlawful tying arrangement, but rather that third-party boxes were compatible with Defendant's Two Way Service and rental of set-top boxes from Defendant was nevertheless required despite that compatibility.

Regarding the first issue, Cablevision has presented no evidence of its development and introduction of a technologically innovative tying or tied product. Other cable MVPDs such as Comcast, Time Warner, and Cox offer Two Way Services virtually identical to the service provided by Defendant, and Defendant presented no distinguishing aspects to its service that indicate technological innovation in its provision. Further, the set-top boxes Defendant rents to consumers to whom it provides Two Way Services were not developed by them at all, but were rather developed by third parties such as Scientific Atlanta and Motorola who have contractual relationships with Defendant and other cable MVPDs in other geographic markets. In fact, Defendant Cablevision was not even in a position during the purported Class Period to make innovations [*49] in the cable set-top box market as it was not engaged in the manufacture and production of such boxes; it was not "a firm that pioneers new technology" that "introduce[d] the first of a new product type along with related, ancillary products that can only be utilized effectively with the newly developed technology" as in Foremost. Id., at 542. Therefore, neither the aspects of the technological tie found to be insufficient in Foremost nor the procompetitive benefits articulated there are applicable to the facts alleged in this case.

Second, Plaintiffs do not limit their allegations regarding coercion to a technological tie. The facts stated in Plaintiffs Third Amended Complaint are that "Cablevision . . . engaged in coercive anti-competitive practices by restricting the sources or outlets through which a usable cable set-top box can be acquired by Class members. Namely, Cablevision requires that Class members rent cable set-top boxes exclusively from Cablevision to access Two Way Services." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 44). Specifically, Plaintiffs allege, > Cablevision has prevented and continues to prevent all other non-Cablevision rented set-top boxes from being viable alternatives to, and [*50] substitutable for, the set-top boxes distributed by Cablevision, even though the set-top boxes distributed by Cablevision use the same technology as other set-top boxes available from other sources. In fact, the set-top boxes that Cablevision requires class members to rent exclusively from Cablevision are of the same make and model as those manufactured by, inter alia, Cisco Corporation's Scientific Atlanta subsidiary, which models are also used by other major cable companies including Time-Warner, Comcast and Cox. Yet, because of Cablevision's conduct, these boxes are not usable by Class members if they are obtained from sources other than Cablevision.

(Id., at ¶ 48)(emphasis added). Plaintiffs thus assert additional facts beyond a technological tie regarding Defendant's coercion of the consumer by conditioning rental of the tied product with the purchase of the tying product. The facts alleged here in the world of Foremost would be more analogous to a situation in which other companies besides Kodak produced paper and chemicals capable of processing film from Kodak's new camera, but Kodak was nevertheless conditioning sale of the new camera on the concomitant purchase of paper and [*51] chemicals exclusively from Kodak.

To conclude, since Foremost is not governing law in this Circuit, and since, in any case, the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint distinguish this case from those facts alleged in Foremost, the Court finds that, even if a component of Plaintiffs' claims regarding coercion incorporate an argument regarding technological incompatibility, Plaintiffs have pled sufficient facts to allege coercion.

2) Third Amended Complaint's Narrowing of the Tying Product Market

Defendant also argues that, because Plaintiffs include in their purported tying product a service that can be accessed by Cablevision subscribers without the rental of the set-top cable box, Plaintiffs have again failed to allege coercion. However, the Court finds that Plaintiffs removal of "Switched Digital Video Services" and limiting of "Pay TV" services to those accessible by remote control sufficiently narrows the tying product market to assert coercion over consumers in the tied product market.

In this Court's prior Opinions, insufficient coercion was found where portions of the tying product could be accessed by Cablevision subscribers without the rental if the tied product. [*52] (Aug. 18, 2010 Op., at 9; Jan. 14, 2011 Op., at 5; July 21, 2011 Op., at 6). In Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs excise "'Switched Digital Video Services' from the primary definition of the tying product market, and limits this market to those services that Defendants, themselves, acknowledge require rental of a Cablevision set-top box." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 5). The Third Amended Complaint defines the tying product market as those Two Way Services which Cablevision's website explicitly stated were not available with a CableCARD: "Video on Demand, iO interactive program guide, iO Games, and the ability to order Pay Per View events using your remote. . . . A digital cable box is required to receive these features." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 41-42, 98). In a similar case before the Western District of Oklahoma, the court found that the plaintiffs in the multidistrict litigation alleging tying violations against Cox Enterprises and Cox Communications survived a motion to dismiss where it was > clear from the allegations in the [complaint] that customers wishing to receive the full benefit of their premium cable subscription ha[d] no choice but to rent a set-top box from Cox. [*53] Indeed, as the [complaint] demonstrates, Cox's own advertising and consumer communications establishes this relationship. Moreover, the [complaint] alleges Defendants have engaged in conduct which minimizes the viability of the use of cable cards to receive the full panoply of premium cable services. Thus, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have alleged facts sufficient to demonstrate Cox has engaged in coercion, thereby satisfying the second element of a prima facie case.

*In re Cox, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58417, at * 17-18*. Plaintiffs here also rely on advertising and consumer communications made to customers of Cablevision's Two Way Services regarding what services were and were not accessible through a cable set-top box, and Plaintiffs also clearly allege conduct which minimizes CableCARD access to Cablevision's full panoply of Two Way Services. The Complaint carves out "Pay TV" Pay-Per-View events ordered by phone, narrowing the tying product market only to those Pay-Per-View events accessible through remote control since "a customer's ability to access Pay Per View by using a remote control is what makes it a "two way" digital service." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 6). Therefore, to the extent [*54] that Plaintiffs have limited their tying product market to interactive Two Way Services accessible only by remote control through a cable set-top box, Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged the requisite element of coercion to survive Defendant's Motion to Dismiss.

iii. Market Power in the Tying Product Market Restraining Competition in the Tied Product Market

HN9[] The Supreme Court has required that, "in all cases involving a tying arrangement, the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has market power in the tying product." Illinois Tool Works, Inc. v. Independent Ink, Inc.. 547 U.S. 28, 46, 126 S. Ct. 1281, 164 L. Ed. 2d 26 (2006); Allen-Myland, Inc. v. International Business Machines Corp., 33 F.3d 194, 200-201 (3d Cir. 1994)("The first inquiry into any § 1 tying case is whether the defendant has sufficient market power over the tying product . . . If the defendant is found to have sufficient market power in the tying product market, then the tie may be a 'per se' violation of the Sherman Act"). Market power "is the power to 'to force a purchaser to do something that he would not do in a competitive market.'" Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 464 (quoting Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 14). The focus of the Court should be "whether [*55] the seller has the power to raise prices, or impose other burdensome terms such as a tie-in, with respect to any appreciable number of buyers within the market." Fortner Enters., Inc. v. United States Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 89 S. Ct. 1252, 22 L. Ed. 2d 495 (1969).

In their Third Amended Complaint, Plaintiffs allege the following:

- "Cablevision's substantial monopoly power, market power and/or economic power in the tying product market is evidenced by, inter alia, the fact that approximately 2.9 million of Cablevision's 3.0 million customers subscribe to Two Way Services through an iO Package. This represents nearly 97% of Cablevision's customers" (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 54);
- "Cablevision's dominant market share numbers for the overall cable market... together with the additional facts set forth below, demonstrate that Cablevision also possesses a dominant share in the market for Two Way Services. Specifically:

  - Cablevision possessed a 90% or greater share of the overall cable market in the area in which it operates within the New York DMA throughout the Class Period. Indeed, since Cablevision has repeatedly indicated that it has the highest penetration in the nation, its market share in the Two Way Services market [*56] likely exceeds that of the New York DMA, as a whole;
  - . . . [O]ver 97% of Cablevision's cable customers subscribe to Two Way Services as part of a premium cable package. Therefore, Cablevision's share of the overall cable market is also highly indicative of its share of the market for Two Way Services;
  - . . . [O]ver 99% of [Cablevision's premium cable] subscribers rent set-top boxes from Cablevision . . . ;

  - Only two competitors of Cablevision — AT&T and Verizon — operate in the geographic areas where Cablevision operates, and provide comparable packages of Two Way Services. . . . AT&T and Verizon have had no more than a combined 10% of the overall cable market in the New York DMA throughout the Class Period. . . . Cablevision necessarily possessed a dominant share of the market for Two Way Services in the areas in which it operated... throughout the Class Period — over 80% at a minimum. This share easily exceeds the 30% market share needed to establish market/monopoly power in this Circuit" (Id., at ¶ 55);

- "Cablevision's monopoly, market and/or economic power in the tying product market are further evidenced by the fact that, even after significantly increasing the price Cablevision [*57] charges for subscriptions to premium cable packages that include Two Way Services, Cablevision has not only retained a substantial number of such subscribers, but has regularly increased the number of subscribers with Two Way Services. This is direct evidence of Cablevision's substantial economic power, monopoly power and/or market power" (Id., at ¶ 59);

- "Cablevision instituted the following annual increases in its rates during the Class Period: 2010 + 3.7%, 2009 + 3.5%, 2008 + 4.7%, 2007 + 1.1%, 2006 + 2.3%, and 2004 + 3.2%. These rate increases include increases in the rates charged by Cablevision for the premium cable packages which provide Two Way Services. (As alleged above, premium cable packages which include Two Way Services constitute the vast majority of cable packages sold by Cablevision)" (Id., at ¶ 60);

- "Despite these significant annual price increases, Cablevision has been able to add subscribers with Two Way Services. For instance, from December 2006 through the end of the Fourth Quarter of 2007, the total number of subscribers with Two Way Services increased by approximately 181,000, or 7.4%. From December 2007 to the end of the Fourth Quarter of 2008, the total number [*58] of subscribers with Two Way Services increased by approximately 208,000, or 7.9%. Further, from December 2008 to the end of the Fourth Quarter of 2009, the total number of subscribers with Two Way Services increased by 56,000, or 2.0%" (Id.).

Defendant Cablevision claims that Plaintiffs have not cured the pleading deficiencies addressed in this Court's July 21, 2011 Opinion regarding Defendant's market power in the tying product market. In particular, Defendant argues: (1) Plaintiffs fail to provide "direct proof" that Defendant has been able to retain customers despite an increased price in Two Way Services; or, in the alternative, (2) Plaintiffs have failed to allege high market share in Two Way Services coupled with barriers to entry, or "structural evidence" of market power. In our July 21, 2011 Opinion, this Court found that Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint, "in attempting to allege market power, . . . conflates Cablevision's provision of Two Way Services with its provision of all cable programming." (July 21, 2011 Op., at 7). Further, the Court found that "Plaintiffs have alleged no specific facts to support the theory that dominance in a market that includes multiple products [*59] — both one way and Two Way Services — equates to dominance in the Two Way Services market. . . . Nor have Plaintiffs alleged any specific facts which would allow the Court to otherwise infer that Two Way Services — as opposed to one way services — drive the most demand within the relevant packages." (Id., at 8). The concern expressed in that Opinion was that the Two Way Services market was exclusively defined in relation to and as a subset of premium cable services as provided by Defendant Cablevision, which is an improper mechanism for determining market power because "[i]t would be as if a plaintiff had adequately alleged a product market consisting of orange juice, but relied on the defendant's position in the overall beverage industry as evidence of market power." *In re Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litig., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 39001, at * 39*.

The Court disagrees that Plaintiffs have not sufficiently alleged facts regarding Defendant's market power in the tying market of Two Way Services in their Third Amended Complaint. The Court has already found infra that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged valid tying and tied product markets. Plaintiffs thus must only show that [*60] Cablevision had sufficient market power in the relevant geographic market in which it operates to coerce customers for Two Way Services into renting set-top boxes as a condition of receiving said Two Way Services.

Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint alleges facts purporting to show "direct proof" of market power through alleging that Cablevision had a minimum of an 89% market share in the Two Way Services market. The Complaint alleges that, out of all cable service available to consumers in the New York DMA, Cablevision penetrates 90% of the cable market (compared to about 10% market share for overbuilders AT&T and Verizon). (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 7, 52-58). Plaintiffs allege that, since 97% of Defendant's premium cable customers have purchased Two Way Services, and that the only other cable providers that provide such services are their competitors AT&T and Verizon (satellite providers not being technologically capable of providing said services), Cablevision has a minimum of 89% market share of the Two Way Services market. (Id.; Pls. Opp'n Br., at 11). Further, the Third Amended Complaint alleges that, despite Cablevision's continued and significant increase in its prices over a [*61] six-year period, it did not only not lose sales during that period but substantially increased revenues, a key indication of market power. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 58-65; see Broadcom Corp. v. Qualcomm, Inc., 501 F.3d 297, 307 (3d Cir. 2007)("[i]f a firm can profitably raise prices without causing competing firms to expand output and drive down prices, that firm has monopoly power")).

The Third Amended Complaint also alleges facts supporting indirect, or structural, proof of market power by alleging Cablevision's high market share in Two Way Services coupled with barriers to entry. As stated above, the Complaint states facts regarding Cablevision's market power in Two Way Services by simultaneously narrowing the tying product market and alleging a 89% share for Cablevision's provision of Two Way Services in that product market. Plaintiffs additionally cite to barriers of entry: Cablevision's "clustering" activities to consolidate its control of the geographic market; "bundling" its products by providing customers with broadband internet access and phone services over the same cable infrastructure that it uses to provide video cable service; offering superior programming through long-standing [*62] programmer-distributor contracts; and utilizing technological, structural, cost and pricing advantages to prevent overbuilders from threatening its dominance in the tying product market. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 66-80).

Although Plaintiffs may still be presented with difficulties and challenges proving that Cablevision has market power, the allegations in the Complaint are sufficient to make such a finding plausible at this stage in the proceedings. Plaintiffs have detailed facts suggesting both direct and indirect proof which, if taken to be true, indicate that Cablevision controls a large portion of the narrowly defined Two Way Services market in the New York DMA, and can therefore manipulate pricing without regard to competition in that area. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have properly pled that Cablevision possesses the requisite market power to make out a tying claim.

iv. Effect on Interstate Commerce

Plaintiffs contend that Cablevision's actions have an effect on interstate commerce as required for a per se tying claim in that Cablevision operates in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut (the New York DMA). (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 23, 52); see, e.g. Northern Pacific, 356 U.S. at 5; [*63] Town Sound & Custom Tops, 959 F.2d at 477. Specifically, the Complaint states that "Defendants' conduct substantially affects interstate commerce by foreclosing and eliminating competition in the market for the tied product in the areas where Cablevision operates. This lack of competition in this market has caused substantial anticompetitive effects, including higher prices for the tied product, lesser choice and dampened incentives to innovate. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 154). Defendant Cablevision does not contest Plaintiffs' allegations regarding its effect on interstate commerce in its submissions in support of its Motion to Dismiss. Thus, the Court, taking the facts alleged in Plaintiffs' Complaint to be true, finds it plausible that Cablevision's alleged conduct meets this third and final requirement for a per se tying claim.

2) Plaintiffs' § 1 Tying Claim — Rule of Reason Analysis

HN10[] To sufficiently assert a tying claim under a rule of reason theory of liability, plaintiffs need not prove that the seller has power in the tying product market, but must set forth: 1) a viable theory of causation of antitrust injury in that a defendant's alleged tying resulted in anticompetitive effects [*64] (e.g., through the forced purchase of inferior goods, consumer surprise, difficulty in consumer ability to make proper price comparisons, or foreclosure of the tied product market); and 2) a rebuttal at trial of defendant's procompetitive justifications, if any. Town Sound, 959 F.2d at 482-94. Rule of reason claims are still available to plaintiffs who do not succeed in their per se tying claims. Id.; see, e.g., Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 17-17; Fortner, 394 U.S. at 499-500; Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. at 614-15; Town Sound, 959 F.2d at 482. Since this Court finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled facts regarding a per se tying violation, the requisite elements generally required for proving a tying violation under a rule of reason analysis—causation of antitrust injury and rebutting procompetitive justifications for a tie-in—need not be assessed at this stage. See Town Sound, 959 F.2d at 477. However, the Court cautions that survival of a motion to dismiss is no guarantee of the ultimate success on the merits of any per se tying claim, and an assessment based upon a rule of reason theory of liability may be required at future stages of the proceedings in this matter based on [*65] the sufficiency of the evidence presented on the record.

3) Plaintiffs' § 2 Monopolization Claim

HN11[] Section 2 of the Sherman Act sanctions those "who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several states, or with foreign nations." 15 U.S.C. § 2. Monopolization under Section 2 consists in: (1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market; and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 570-71; see also Harrison Aire, Inc. v. Aerostar International, Inc., 423 F.3d 374, 380 (3d Cir. 2005). Plaintiffs have the burden of defining the relevant § 2 product market. See Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 436. To have standing to seek a § 2 claim, Plaintiffs must show that they have suffered an "antitrust injury" as a result of Defendant's misconduct so as to possess the standing necessary to seek relief. Race Tires Am., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp., 614 F.3d 57, 75-76 (3d Cir. 2010). The injury prong requires a [*66] showing of: (1) harm of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent; and (2) an injury to the plaintiff which flows from that which makes defendant's acts unlawful. Id., at 76 (quoting Gulfstream III Assocs. Inc. v. Gulfstream Aerospace Corp., 995 F.2d 425, 429 (3d Cir. 1993)(citation omitted)). Because the Court finds that Plaintiffs have failed to sufficiently allege Defendant's possession of monopoly power in the relevant market of set-top box distribution, Plaintiffs Section 2 monopolization claim is dismissed with prejudice and the Court need not address Defendant's alleged willful acquisition or maintenance of monopoly power or Plaintiffs' § 2 antitrust standing.

a. Possession of Monopoly Power in the Relevant Market

HN12[] Monopoly power has been defined as "the power to charge a price higher than the competitive price without inducing so rapid and great an expansion of output from competing firms as to make the supracompetitive price untenable." Harrison Aire, 423 F.3d at 380 (quoting Am. Academic Suppliers, Inc. v. Beckley-Cardy, Inc., 922 F.2d 1317, 1319 (7th Cir. 1991)). Such power can be demonstrated by direct evidence of supracompetitive pricing and high barriers to entry [*67] or with structural evidence of a monopolized market. Id. Structural indicators of a monopolized market include a firm's possession of a dominant share of a relevant market that is protected by entry barriers. Id., at 381. In determining a valid relevant market in which monopoly power is alleged, a Court looks to reasonable interchangeability of use of the relevant product. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 482, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992)(see also Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 437-38 ("The test for a relevant market is not commodities reasonably interchangeable by a particular plaintiff, but 'commodities reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes.'")(citation omitted).

Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint alleges that Defendant Cablevision willfully acquired and maintained a monopoly in the market for distribution of set-top boxes that provide access to Two Way Services. (Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 121-136). Specifically, Plaintiffs define the relevant product market of set-top boxes to include those boxes distributed by Cablevision to its subscribers and those boxes that would have been distributed to Cablevision subscribers by other suppliers absent Cablevision's [*68] exclusionary conduct. (Id., at ¶ 123). In this product market, the Complaint alleges, Cablevision has total control through willfully acquiring and maintaining exclusive power by imposing a tying arrangement requiring subscribers to rent set-top boxes from Cablevision (Id., at ¶ 122).

Defendant argues that the Third Amended Complaint's "Cablevision-compatible" market is deficient to establish a § 2 claim for two reasons: (1) the Court has already rejected identical market definitions for Plaintiffs' § 2 claim in its prior Opinions granting Defendant's motions to dismiss; and (2) the proposed market is an aftermarket that cannot be sustained as a matter of law. (Def. Br., at 33-36). The Court will address these arguments in turn.

i. Correction of Pleading Deficiencies from Prior Complaints

Plaintiffs' Original Complaint did not contain a § 2 claim, but in Plaintiffs' subsequent amendments to that Complaint, they have progressively defined the relevant product market for their monopolization claim as follows: 1) "the market for set-top boxes permitting two way communications between Cablevision and its iO TV subscribers" (First Am. Compl., at ¶ 150); 2) "the market for distribution of set-top [*69] boxes that can provide access to Two Way Services" (Sec. Am. Compl., at ¶ 147); 3) "the market for distribution of set-top boxes that can provide access to Two Way Services in the area in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut in which Cablevision operates (which falls entirely within the New York DMA)." (Third Am. Compl., ¶ 159). Plaintiffs' first market definition was rejected in this Court's January 14, 2011 Opinion because, inter alia, "the Amended Complaint limits the relevant product market to Cablevision-specific boxes but admits that Cablevision-specific boxes are, in fact, not unique and are interchangeable with other cable boxes available on the market." (Jan. 14, 2011 Op., at 9). HN13[] A single brand of a product of service may constitute a relevant market only where "the commodity is unique, and therefore not interchangeable with other products." Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 439. When Plaintiffs redefined the relevant market to limit it to the distribution of set-top boxes that provide access to Two Way Services in its Second Amended Complaint, this Court found it could not "decipher whether such product market is, once again, limited to those boxes distributed exclusively by [*70] Cablevision (i.e., 'Cablevision-specific boxes')." (July 21, 2011 Op., at 12). The Court pointed to sections of Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint which suggested that their amended relevant market was limited to boxes distributed by Cablevision despite their maintenance in their opposition brief to Defendant's motion to dismiss that the amended relevant market was "not limited to boxes distributed by Cablevision." (Id., at 13). Thus, the Second Amended Complaint was found to "contain[] no facts which would allow the Court to reasonably infer that Cablevision posses[es] monopoly power in the relevant market of all two-way boxes -that is, all cable boxes that allow two way communications, not simply those cable boxes that allow Cablevision subscribers to access Two Way Services (i.e., Cablevision-specific boxes)." (Id.).

Defendant contends that Plaintiffs have again failed to allege a relevant market beyond the single product market of Cablevision-specific boxes. (Def. Br., at 33). Plaintiffs, however, argue that they have clarified the scope of the set-top box distribution market by including "the distribution of all set-top boxes that provided, or absent Cablevision's exclusionary [*71] conduct, potentially would have provided, access to Two Way Services in the geographic market (Cablevision's service area)." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 33; citing Third Am. Compl., at ¶¶ 121-122, 129). Specifically, Plaintiffs claim that their amended market avoids the deficiencies of a "single product market" because it includes Verizon and AT&T's set-top boxes in the relevant market definition. (Id., at 34; Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 129). In fact, Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint "includes boxes that would have been distributed by other outlets, including retail outlets and secondary sources such as e-Bay, if not for Cablevision's tying conduct, which successfully prevented these other outlets from being able to distribute boxes to Cablevision's customers." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 123). Defendant Cablevision, Plaintiffs allege, have monopoly power in this larger market of set-top box distribution because "Verizon's and AT&T's combined share of the Two Way Services market in this geographic area is only 10% at most. ... Therefore, including boxes distributed by Verizon and AT&T in this geographic area in the Section 2 Relevant Market does not change the fact that Cablevision clearly maintains [*72] a dominant share (at least 90%) of the market for boxes that provide access to Two Way Services in this area." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 33).

Despite Plaintiffs' attempts to distinguish this third iteration of their § 2 relevant market from their prior Complaints, this Court finds that Plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint maintains an incoherent market definition which simultaneously attempts to incorporate a broader market of set-top box distribution in a narrow geographic market while also insisting that "[s]et-top boxes obtained from a source other than Cablevision do not provide access to Two Way Services because these boxes are prevented from providing access to Two Way Services due to Cablevision's exclusionary conduct." (Third Am. Compl., at ¶ 127). As stated in this Court's January 14, 2011 Opinion, Cablevision-specific boxes are not unique and are interchangeable with other cable boxes; like Domino's-approved supplies and ingredients (tomatoes, dough, etc.), they cannot constitute their own, exclusive relevant market, but must include all interchangeable products not approved by a single brand. (Jan. 14, 2011, at 9-10; citing Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 440 ("Domino's does not sell [*73] a unique product or service. Franchisees must buy Domino' s-approved supplies and ingredients not because they are unique but because they are obligated by contract to do so.")). Aside from the contractual link limiting Cablevision's subscribers to the rental of the Cablevision-distributed boxes, Plaintiffs set-top box market, as Plaintiffs themselves concede, could include not only those boxes distributed by Verizon and AT&T, but all boxes distributed by Scientific Atlanta and other companies, including those boxes resold online. Plaintiffs are correct in citing to Third Circuit law which establishes that HN14[] potential participants in a market may be included in the relevant market since, absent the exclusionary conduct of the alleged monopolist, such participants could have offered interchangeable products. See SmithKline Corp. v. Eli Lilly & Co., 575 F.2d 1056, 1063 (3d Cir. 1978)("[D]efining a relevant product market is a process of describing those groups of producers which, because of the similarity of their products, have the ability—actual or potential—to take significant amounts of business away from each other. A market definition must look at all relevant sources of supply, [*74] either actual rivals or eager potential entrants to the market."). However, Plaintiffs only define their market share of 90% with respect to those participants that actually distribute set-top boxes in the relevant geographic market?namely, Verizon and AT&T—stating no facts which would allow the Court to plausibly determine Defendant's monopoly power in the larger market of potential distributors of cable set-top boxes, from manufacturers to retailers and online resellers, which could dramatically diminish Cablevision's monopoly power. For these reasons, this Court cannot find that Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled a relevant product market beyond a "single product market," and at best, a Cablevision- and overbuilder-limited set-top box market, so as to survive dismissal under current Third Circuit law.

ii. Aftermarket Analysis

In Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Services, Inc., the Supreme Court considered the question of whether a defendant's lack of market power in a primary market precludes as a matter of law the possibility of market power in derivative aftermarkets. 504 U.S. 451, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992). In finding that it does not, the Court pointed to information costs, switching costs and [*75] discriminatory pricing which could "lock in" customers who purchase an item within a competitive primary market but face predetermined choices in an aftermarket. Id., at 477. In Queen City Pizza, the Third Circuit clarified Kodak's holding as follows: "Kodak does not hold that the existence of information and switching costs alone, such as those faced by the Domino's franchisees, renders an otherwise invalid relevant market valid." 124 F.3d at 439. Specifically, Kodak could be distinguished in cases in which lifecycle pricing assessments are not ruptured or distorted by new and unpredictable policies unforeseen at the time of sale such that a lifecycle price calculations could in fact be incorporated into a purchase decision: "Unlike the plaintiffs in Kodak, the Domino's franchisees could assess the potential costs and economic risks at the time they signed the franchise agreement. The franchise transaction between Domino's Pizza, Inc. and plaintiffs was subjected to competition at the pre-contract stage." Id., at 440.

Defendant Cablevision likens its Two Way Services subscribers to Domino's franchisees in contending that Cablevision instituted no policy change to rupture the lifecycle [*76] pricing assessments of its subscribers with respect to their rental of the set-top box nor did it fail to disclose any information regarding rates and fees at the time Plaintiffs chose to subscribe to Cablevision. For those reasons, Defendant contends, Plaintiffs' § 2 relevant market is an "aftermarket" which must fail as a matter of law. (Def. Br., at 34). Plaintiffs argue that "the market for set-top boxes is not an 'aftermarket' that is dependent on choosing Cablevision Two-Way Services. To the contrary, boxes Cablevision distributes are commodity products that are widely deployed by many cable operates including Cox, Comcast and Time Warner. Therefore, Cablevision's monopoly over the complimentary product exists only because it had the power and ability to artificially exclude competitive sources of distribution of these commodity boxes." (Pls. Opp'n Br., at 34-35). Further, Plaintiffs distinguish this case from Kodak in that here, Cablevision is alleged to have monopoly power in the primary market of Two Way Services, unlike Kodak which lacked market power in the primary equipment market but was nevertheless found to have possible market power in derivative markets. (Id., at 35).

In [*77] our January 14, 2011 opinion, this Court cited to Queen City Pizza in holding that, to the extent that the Amended Complaint could be construed as stating a claim that an "aftermarket" for Cablevision-compatible cable boxes was the relevant § 2 market, Plaintiffs' § 2 claim "fails as a matter of law inasmuch as the Amended Complaint does not allege that the conduct challenged was not authorized or otherwise disclosed at the time Plaintiff chose to subscribe to Cablevision. . . . Absent a change in [an internal Cablevision] policy [or practice dating back to 2001] (or other circumstances not alleged here), the Court has no basis on which to find plausible a relevant market limited to Cablevision-compatible boxes." (Jan. 14, 2011 Op., at 10). Plaintiffs have made no change in their Third Amended Complaint alleging facts or circumstances which point to a change in policy or other indicators of consumer surprise placing upon them obligations to which they were not previously bound regarding charges or fees unforeseen at the time they signed the subscription agreement with Cablevision. To the extent that Plaintiffs reject an aftermarket definition in their Opposition Brief, or seek to distinguish [*78] their case from Kodak, the Court agrees that an "aftermarket" definition of set-top cable box distribution cannot succeed. That is because, while this case may be distinguishable from Kodak with respect to the defendant's alleged market power in the primary market, that cannot save Plaintiffs § 2 claim under Third Circuit law, which invalidates proposed aftermarkets as a matter of law which were the result of transactions "subjected to competition at the pre-contract stage" at which time a plaintiff "could assess the potential costs and economic risks at the time they signed the . . . agreement." Queen City Pizza, 124 F.3d at 440. If the contractual restrictions in the Two Way Services package were viewed by Plaintiffs as overly burdensome at the time said package was purchased based on the disclosed rental fee of the set-top box, Plaintiffs could have purchased a different package, or made some alternative entertainment-viewing decisions, for example, by signing on with overbuilders AT&T or Verizon, or even supplementing one-way services attainable through Cablevision or satellite providers with extra-contractual entertainment options in video and gaming. Further, if Cablevision acted [*79] unreasonably when, under the contractual agreement with its Two Way Services customers, it continuously raised its price for the set-top box required to utilize interactive features, Plaintiffs' remedy, if any, is in contract, not under antitrust laws, as Plaintiffs may have a right to sue for breach of the contract on originally agreed-upon terms. See, e.g. Queen City Pizza, 124 F.23d at 441.

To conclude, Plaintiffs fail to allege a valid relevant market under § 2 of the Sherman Act as required to establish a monopolization claim because Plaintiffs' market as defined is a "single product market" and cannot be properly construed as a valid "aftermarket." Since Plaintiffs have been afforded multiple opportunities to amend their § 2 claim in light of these deficiencies, the Court denies Plaintiffs' § 2 claim with prejudice.

4) Defendant's Trinko Argument

Defendant Cablevision revives an argument already rejected by this Court in the instant Motion to Dismiss, asserting that Plaintiffs' antitrust claims are precluded under Verizon Commc's Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004). Specifically, Defendant claims that Plaintiffs are attempting to improperly convert [*80] a regulatory issue into an unlawful tying claim under antitrust law since the FCC was directed to adopt resolutions to promote nationwide availability of set-top boxes. The instant action, Defendant argues, is an attempted end run by Plaintiffs around the FCC's regulatory scheme, and since Plaintiffs allege no recognized antitrust claim, their Complaint should be dismissed on Trinko grounds. (Def. Br., at 38-39). However, since this Court finds that Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated a § 1 tying claim, and the Court has already rejected Defendant's Trinko-based argument on the grounds that "the circumstances at issue in Trinko [are] legally and factually distinguishable from the instant matter" in that "Plaintiff's § 1 claim would exist even in the absence of the FCC's regulation," the Court will not reconsider an argument it has already rejected. (Aug. 18, 2010 Op., at 3-4). Other courts have consistently rejected the application of Trinko to § 1 tying claims alleged in the context of cable MVPD providers and cable set-top boxes that they distribute. See, e.g., *In re Cox Enterprises, Inc. Set-Top Cable Television Box Antitrust Litig., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 58417, 22-23 (W.D. Okla. Jan. 19, 2010); [*81] *Parsons v. Bright House Networks, L.L.C., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 55277, 26-27 (N.D. Ala. Feb. 23, 2010); *Downs v. Insight Communications Company, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 29616, * 15-16 (W.D. Ky. Mar. 22, 2011)*.

5) Plaintiffs' State Law Claims for Unjust Enrichment

Defendant Cablevision argues that the "[f]ailure of Plaintiffs' federal claims, as before (1/14 Op. 11), requires dismissal of Plaintiffs' state-law claims." (Def. Br. Supp. Mot. to Dismiss, at 39). However, since the Court has found that Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged a § 1 tying claim, Defendant's motion to dismiss Plaintiff's unjust enrichment claims, which hinge on said tying claim, is denied.

IV. CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, Defendant's Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' Complaint is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part. Defendant's Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' § 1 tying claim and state law unjust enrichment claims is DENIED. However, Defendant's Motion to Dismiss Plaintiffs' § 2 monopolization claim is GRANTED, and Plaintiffs' § 2 claim is dismissed with prejudice. An appropriate Order accompanies this Opinion.

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO DISMISS WITH PREJUDICE

[Re Docket No. 155]

This action arises out of a policy enacted by defendant eBay, Inc. ("eBay") regarding the labeling of certain coins sold on its online auction website. On March 28, 2011, plaintiffs Universal Grading Service ("UGS"), John Callandrello ("Callandrello"), Joseph Komito ("Komito"), and Vadim Kirichenko ("Kirichenko") (collectively "plaintiffs") filed a Fourth Amended Complaint [*2] ("FAC") attempting to state claims under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, state antitrust statutes, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code section 17200, and the common law tort of interference with economic relations. eBay moves to dismiss under Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(b)(6). For the reasons below, the court grants the motion to dismiss with prejudice.

I. BACKGROUND

eBay is the "world's largest provider of online auction services." FAC ¶ 19. eBay's website contains a forum for the purchase and sale of millions of items, including coins. Id. ¶ 6. According to the FAC, "on any given day, ... eBay has more than one hundred fifty thousand U.S., world, and ancient coins listed for online auction." Id. ¶ 21. Under eBay's Counterfeit Currency and Stamps Policy (the "Certification Policy"), only coins that have been "graded" by one of five authorized grading services may be listed as "certified coins." Id. ¶ 38. Coins that have not been graded, or have been graded by a non-authorized grading service, may be sold on eBay, but may not be labeled "certified coins." Id. ¶ 166. As of the filing of the FAC, only about 0.3% of coins available on eBay were listed as "certified." Id.

UGS is in the [*3] business of grading coins, but is not one of the five services authorized by eBay to "certify" coins for sale on its website. Id. ¶ 2, 39. Callandrello is the president of UGS, as well as a shareholder in the company. Id. ¶ 3. Komito and Kirichenko are individual coin dealers who buy and sell coins within an alleged "online auctions market for certified coins," including through eBay's website. FAC ¶¶ 4-5.

eBay's Certification Policy has a complicated history. In or about 2001, the Professional Numismatists Guild ("PNG"), an organization of coin dealers and collectors, formed a group known as the "Internet Rules Committee." FAC ¶¶ 7, 8, 27. The Internet Rules Committee consisted of various "coin industry insiders," including Barry Stuppler ("Stuppler") in his capacity as then-governor and chairman of a non-profit trade organization called the American Numismatic Association ("ANA") Consumer Protection Committee. Id. ¶ 27. Plaintiffs allege that the "sole purpose" of the Internet Rules Committee was to "interfere with and obstruct the ability of smaller coin grading services," including plaintiff UGS, to participate in the "then burgeoning online auctions market for certified coins" [*4] by accusing plaintiffs of selling counterfeit coins and engaging in other fraudulent conduct. Id.

In or about 2004, the ANA and eBay formed the Coins Community Watch Group ("CCW"). Id. ¶ 28. The CCW consisted of largely the same members as the Internet Rules Committee. Id. ¶ 30. The ANA described the CCW as "a collaborative effort among a team of lobby experts, the ANA, and eBay for the purpose of combating misrepresented or fraudulent listings involving coins and other numismatic items." Id. ¶ 28.

In August 2004, eBay conducted a workshop called the Coins Community Watch Program. Id. ¶ 29. The eBay forum announcing the program explained that it was "a cooperative effort between the CCW team of experts, the ANA, and eBay to combat misrepresented listings in the Coins category." Id. ¶ 29. Under the CCW program, purported experts: (1) selectively reviewed coin listings for violations and submitted claims; (2) the ANA corroborated claims and attempted to resolve them with sellers; (3) unresolved issues were escalated to eBay for the appropriate remedy. Id. According to the FAC, the CCW program, like the Internet Rules Committee, was intended to negatively affect competition in the online [*5] market for certified coins. Id. ¶ 30.

In 2006, the PNG commissioned a survey of rare coin authentication and grading services (the "Survey"). Id. ¶ 31. Respondents were asked to evaluate eleven grading services based on several criteria, including grading and authentication accuracy. Id. ¶ 31. UGS was not one of the grading services included in the Survey. Plaintiffs allege that "the false and damaging results of the Survey were manipulated by PNG and Stuppler" and that "smaller more economical coin grading services like plaintiff UGS were deliberately excluded ... from the survey." Id. ¶ 31.

In 2007, eBay implemented the Certification Policy, which allows only coins graded by one of five authorized grading services to be listed as "certified" in the auction forum. Id. ¶ 38. The selection of the authorized grading services was based on the results of the Survey. Id. Pursuant to the Certification Policy, coins graded by UGS and other non-authorized grading services may not be listed or sold on eBay as "certified" and are allegedly referred to by eBay as "counterfeit." Id. ¶ 39. In addition, eBay supposedly sent emails to dealers of coins graded by UGS with the subject line "eBay Listing [*6] Removed: Counterfeit Currency and Stamps." Id. ¶ 41.

Publicly, eBay announced that the Certification Policy was an effort to "combat misrepresented or fraudulent listings involving coins and other numismatic items." Id. ¶ 47. However, plaintiffs allege that the Certification Policy is in fact the result of a conspiracy between eBay, ANA, PNG and Stuppler to "raise the value of certified coins in the online auction market by restricting the online auction market to coins graded only by a handful of authorized graders." Id. ¶ 35. Plaintiffs further allege that coin buyers have been forced to pay "higher prices for certified coins than what they paid for identical coins prior to the enactment of the [Certification Policy]." Id. ¶ 43. Finally, plaintiffs allege that eBay "agreed to participate in this illegal scheme because it derives higher commissions from the sale of expensive coins." Id. ¶ 26.

B. Procedural Background

Plaintiffs originally filed a class action complaint in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York on August 29, 2008. The complaint alleged largely the same claims asserted in the FAC on behalf of a number of proposed classes. Then-defendants [*7] eBay, ANA, PNG and Stuppler moved to dismiss plaintiffs' First Amended and Second Amended complaints under Rule 12(b)(6). On June 10, 2009, the District Court for the Eastern District of New York ordered the case transferred in its entirety to the Northern District of California. After the transfer, the parties stipulated to filing new motions to dismiss and to the filing of plaintiffs' Third Amended Complaint ("TAC"). eBay and PNG filed separate motions to dismiss the TAC. Stuppler and ANA were subsequently dismissed pursuant to a settlement agreement. See Dkt. No. 150.

On March 8, 2011, this court granted the motions to dismiss the TAC. Plaintiffs' antitrust claims were dismissed with prejudice to the extent they were based on alleged per se violations of the Sherman Act. The court also dismissed plaintiffs' trade libel claims with prejudice. However, the court granted plaintiffs leave to amend the complaint to plead facts supporting their Sherman Act § 1 claims under the rule of reason. See Bhan v. NME Hosps., Inc., 929 F.2d 1404, 1410 (9th Cir. 1991). The court also allowed plaintiffs to amend the complaint to allege: (1) antitrust injury with respect to their Sherman Act § 2 claims, [*8] (2) derivative Donnelly Act, Cartwright Act, and Unfair Competition Law claims, and (3) facts showing the existence of specific economic relationships with identifiable third parties which defendants knew about and intentionally disrupted through a wrongful act, which would be necessary to support plaintiffs' tortious interference claims.

On March 28, 2011, plaintiffs filed their Fourth Amended Complaint ("FAC"). eBay moved to dismiss on May 6, 2011. On July 13, 2011, PNG reached a settlement agreement with plaintiffs, leaving eBay as the lone defendant in this action. See Dkt. No. 164.

C. The Fourth Amended Complaint

The FAC's nine causes of action can be divided into five categories: (1) Section 1 Sherman Act claims, including conspiracy to restrain trade and unlawful tying; (2) Section 2 Sherman Act claims, including abuse of monopoly power, maintenance of monopoly power, and attempted monopolization; (3) state law antitrust claims under the Donnelly Act (New York) and the Cartwright Act (California); (4) unfair competition under Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200; and (5) tortious interference with economic relations.

The claims of the FAC are brought on behalf of plaintiffs and various [*9] classes. These classes are: (1) coin grading companies not authorized under the Certification Policy; (2) companies and individuals who purchased "certified" coins after the implementation of the Certification Policy; (3) coin sellers who are in possession of coin inventories graded by companies other than the five authorized under the Certification Policy; (4) companies and individuals who attempted to list coins as "certified" which had been graded by non-authorized grading services and whose listings were removed by eBay for violating the Certification Policy; and (5) all companies and individuals who have bought and/or sold coins on eBay and have paid higher commissions to eBay as a result of the Certification Policy. FAC ¶¶ 98-147.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Standard of Review

A motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) tests the legal sufficiency of the complaint. To survive a motion to dismiss, a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the [*10] court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. Id. In antitrust actions, "[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level[.]" Rick-Mik Enters. Inc. v. Equilon Enters., LLC, 532 F.3d 963, 970 (9th Cir. 2008) (quoting Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1965, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). The Ninth Circuit has noted that "at least for the purposes of adequate pleading in anti-trust cases, the Court specifically abrogated the usual 'notice pleading' rule." Rick-Mik Enters. Inc., 532 F.3d at 971. Indeed, antitrust plaintiffs are specifically required to allege enough facts to "nudge claims across the line from conceivable to plausible." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570.

B. Claim 1: Antitrust Conspiracy to Restrain Trade[1]

To [*11] prevail under Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, a plaintiff must plead: "(1) an agreement, conspiracy, or combination among two or more persons or distinct business entities; (2) which is intended to harm or unreasonably restrain competition; and (3) which actually causes injury to competition, beyond the impact on the claimant, within a field of commerce in which the claimant is engaged (i.e., 'antitrust injury')." McGlinchy v. Shell Chemical Co., 845 F.2d 802, 811 (9th Cir. 1988). Under the rule of reason, the court must "analyze the degree of harm to competition along with any justifications or pro-competitive effects to determine whether the practice is unreasonable on balance." Bhan v. NME Hosps., Inc., 929 F.2d 1404, 1410 (9th Cir. 1991) (quoting Oltz v. St. Peter's Community Hosp., 861 F.2d 1440, 1445 (9th Cir. 1988)). Unlike a per se violation, "[t]he focus [under the rule of reason] is on the actual effects that the challenged restraint has had on competition in a relevant market." Id.

The essence of plaintiffs' conspiracy claim is that eBay agreed with the ANA, Stuppler and PNG to limit the number of authorized graders in order to artificially raise the prices of [*12] grading services, which were then passed on by coin sellers to coin buyers, resulting in higher commissions for eBay. While this is basically the same theory advanced in previous complaints, the FAC includes a number of allegations that were absent from the TAC. In particular, plaintiffs now allege that the five authorized coin graders charge more for their services than the non-authorized grading companies, and that the authorized coin graders raised their prices after the Certification Policy was adopted. FAC ¶¶ 167-69. Plaintiffs also allege that coin sellers pass the increased expense of grading services on to their customers and that the price of "certified coins" has increased since the implementation of the Certification Policy. FAC ¶¶ 171, 172.

While the court is conscious of its duty to accept plaintiffs' allegations as true at the pleading stage, it remains convinced that the FAC, like the iterations that preceded it, fails to state a conspiracy claim under the Sherman Act. First, the scheme described by plaintiffs simply does not make "economic sense." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 587, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986); see also DM Research, Inc. v.

[1] Claim 1 is brought on behalf of Class 1 (coin grading companies not authorized under the Certification Policy), Class 2 (companies and individuals who purchased coins graded by one of eBay's five authorized graders), and Class 3 (coin sellers who are in possession of coin inventories graded by companies other than one of the five authorized under the Certification Policy).

College of Am. Pathologists, 170 F.3d 53, 56 (1st Cir. 1999) [*13] (affirming Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal where complaint alleged "highly implausible" conspiracy); Brunson Communications., Inc. v. Arbitron, Inc., 239 F. Supp. 2d 550, 563-64 (E.D. Penn. 2002) (concluding that "the Amended Complaint fails to sufficiently allege concerted activity for the simple reason that the supposed conspiracy 'makes no economic sense.'"); United Magazine Co. v. Murdoch Mag. Distrib., 146 F. Supp. 2d 385, 402 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (holding that because "plaintiffs' alleged conspiracy to engage in predatory pricing is entirely unnecessary and makes no economic sense, plaintiffs fail to state a claim under Section 1"). Plaintiffs acknowledge that eBay is "consistently able to raise its commissions without losing its users." FAC ¶ 200. Thus, even assuming the convoluted arrangement depicted in the FAC could result in increased commissions to eBay, it would be far easier and more efficient for eBay to simply raise its fees for the sale of coins than to conspire with unrelated non-profit trade groups to develop a policy that might result in higher commissions. See, e.g., United Magazine Co. v. Murdoch Magazines Distribution, Inc., 146 F. Supp. 2d 385, 401-02 (S.D.N.Y. 2001) (dismissing [*14] Section 1 conspiracy claim as not making "economic sense" because the defendant could charge "supracompetitive prices" without engaging in the alleged conspiracy). Plaintiffs respond to this argument by contending that the adoption of the Certification Policy was the "easiest and most politically safe way" for eBay to accomplish its nefarious goal. Dkt. No. 159 at 6-7. The court is not persuaded. On top of the fact that the arrangement described by plaintiffs strikes the court as anything but "easy," the FAC contains no factual allegations supporting this assertion. Instead, plaintiffs consistently emphasize that eBay is "solely concerned with its own profits," not the "politics" of its relationships with coin sellers. Dkt. No. 159 at 7.

Furthermore, plaintiffs' theory is implausible because it is so highly unlikely to succeed. As the FAC notes, of the 378,902 "coin" listings on eBay as of March 16, 2011, only 1,113, or roughly 0.3%, were listed as "certified." FAC ¶ 166. Thus, according to plaintiffs' logic, eBay's commissions have declined on the 99.7% of coins whose sale prices have decreased under the Certification Policy. Plaintiffs in fact allege that the market for non-certified [*15] coins has been "permanently depressed," and that such coins now command only "a quarter of the price [of] graded coins." Id. ¶¶ 170, 207. An already improbable conspiracy to inflate commissions is not "nudged ... across the line from conceivable to plausible" where the complaint on its face suggests that the perpetrator has lost money as a result of the agreement. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570.

In addition, the FAC itself demonstrates that the adoption of the Certification Policy was supported by pro-competitive justifications. Plaintiffs concede that the stated intent of the policy was "to combat misrepresented or fraudulent listing involving coins and other numismatic items." FAC ¶ 47. Further, the policy states on its face that "eBay wants to be a place that is safe for both buyers and sellers or stamps, coins, and paper money. We have worked with various outside experts to develop guidelines and policies designed to protect eBay members." Dkt. No. 155, Ex. 1 at 4. [2] As other courts have noted, standard-setting activity that "provides a better product carries with it an overriding justification." Clamp-All Corp. v. Cast Iron Soil Pipe Inst., 851 F.2d 478, 487 (1st Cir. 1988) (Breyer, [*16] J.) (upholding defendant trade organization's promulgation of a standard for pipe-fittings that was adopted by various private standard-setting bodies, as well as state and local plumbing code authorities).

Plaintiffs allege, however, that any purported justifications are "misleading" because "no further surveys of coin grading services are taking place and thus coin grading companies which offer perfectly respectable and legitimate grading services are precluded from competing with ... eBay's chosen five." FAC ¶ 47. This statement suggests that plaintiffs' true grievance is not that eBay implemented a grading policy, but that certain grading services were excluded from the Survey upon which the policy was based. However, as [*17] the complaint makes clear, the Survey was commissioned and conducted PNG and Stuppler without the involvement of eBay. See id. ¶ 31. To the extent that UGS was wrongfully excluded from the Survey by its competitors, its gripe is with those parties, not with a website that appears to have simply relied on what it believed to be objective industry experts in attempting to reduce fraud. Furthermore, eBay has no obligation to deal with UGS or any other grading service, as long as it possesses "good faith, sufficient pro-competitive or business justifications for [its] actions." Race Tires Am., Inc. v. Hoosier Racing Tire Corp, 614 F.3d 57, 82 (3d Cir. 2010) (upholding a rule imposed by a car racing sanctioning body requiring drivers to use a specific brand of tire because such a rule "creates more exciting races, ensures access to a uniform product, leads to increased safety, and lowers the costs of tires by eliminating the so-called 'tire wars.'"). Nor must eBay show that the Certification Policy is the best way to combat fraud, as long as it is reasonable. "Courts have recognized that firms must have broad discretion to make decisions based on their judgments of what is best for them [*18] and that business judgments should not be second-guessed even where the evidence concerning the rationality of the challenged activities might be subject to reasonable dispute." 7-UP Bottling Co. v. Archer Daniels Midland Co. (In re Citric Acid Litig.), 191 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir. 1999). With reasonable, pro-competitive justifications for the Certification Policy evident from the face of the complaint and judicially noticeable documents, plaintiffs' claim cannot withstand scrutiny even on a motion to dismiss.

[2] The court takes notice of the Certification Policy, which was attached as an exhibit to a declaration accompanying the motion to dismiss, under the incorporation by reference doctrine. See United States v. Ritchie, 342 F.3d 903, 908 (9th Cir. 2003) ("Even if a document is not attached to a complaint, it may be incorporated by reference into a complaint if the plaintiff refers extensively to the document or the document forms the basis of the plaintiff's claim.").

Finally, the FAC fails to show that the alleged scheme "produces significant anticompetitive effects within a relevant market" in which eBay has market power. Tanaka v. University of Southern California, 252 F.3d 1059, 1063-64 (9th Cir. 2001) (internal citations and quotation marks omitted). Plaintiffs attempt to define the relevant market to include "any market which significantly depends on participation within online auctions, including the markets for coin grading and the market for certified coins." Dkt. No. 159 at 11. However, plaintiffs provide no authority supporting such an overbroad and amorphous market definition, which would theoretically encompass the market for [*19] every one of the millions of items sold through eBay. See Tanaka, 252 F.3d at 1063-64 (affirming dismissal of antitrust claims where plaintiff identified product market as "UCLA women's soccer program" but failed to allege any facts to support "conclusory" assertion that such market existed). Furthermore, even if the Certification Policy had the indirect effect of raising the price of the minute percentage of coins listed as "certified" on eBay [3] or advantaging certain participants in the market for coin grading services, plaintiffs have not plausibly shown that eBay—which does not sell or grade coins—has "market power" in either market. See Newcal Indus. v. Ikon Office Solution, 513 F.3d 1038, 1044 (9th Cir. 2008) ("In order to state a valid claim under the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must allege that the defendant has market power within a 'relevant market.'"). Plaintiffs' failure to identify a cognizable market in which eBay has market power is fatal to its conspiracy claim. See Tanaka, 252 F.3d at 1063 ("Failure to identify a relevant market is a proper ground for dismissing a Sherman Act claim."). Accordingly, the court GRANTS the motion to dismiss plaintiffs' Section 1 conspiracy [*20] claim.

C. Claim 2: Unreasonable Tying[4]

Plaintiffs' second claim alleges that the Certification Policy "artificially and illegally tied the provision of a platform for online auction of certified coins . . . to the provision of coin grading services." FAC [*21] ¶¶ 174-185. In their opposition brief, plaintiffs modify their position to argue that eBay ties the sale of certified coins (rather than the provision of an online auction platform) to the sale of coin grading services. More specifically, plaintiffs contend that pursuant to eBay's unlawful conduct, purchasers of certified coins are "indirectly" forced to pay for the cost of coin grading services. Dkt. No. 159 at 12.

"A tying arrangement exists when a seller conditions the sale of one product or service (the tying product or service) on the buyer's purchase of another product or service." County of Tuolumne v. Sonora Cmty. Hosp., 236 F.3d 1148, 1158 (9th Cir. 2001) (emphasis added). "The essential characteristic of an invalid tying arrangement lies in the

[3] Plaintiffs attempt to exaggerate the impact of eBay's conduct by alleging that the "broad based" rare coin index demonstrated a "sharp increase" in rare coin prices around the time the Certification Policy was adopted. FAC ¶ 171. However, plaintiffs do not allege, nor does the court believe they could show, that any increase in the price of rare coins is the result of the Certification Policy rather than other factors. See Bhan v. NME Hospitals, Inc., 929 F.2d 1404, 1413 (9th Cir. 1991) (noting that the plaintiff must show "the restraint has actually produced significant anti-competitive effects").

[4] Claim 2 is brought on behalf of Class 1 (coin grading companies not authorized under the eBay Policy), Class 2 (companies and individuals who purchased coins graded by eBay's five authorized graders), and Class 3 (coin sellers who are in possession of coin inventories graded by companies other than the five authorized under the eBay Policy).

seller's exploitation of its control over the tying product to force the buyer into the purchase of a tied product that the buyer either did not want at all, or might have preferred to purchase elsewhere on different terms." Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12, 104 S. Ct. 1551, 80 L. Ed. 2d 2 (1984). Here, plaintiffs do not allege that eBay sells the tying product (certified coins) or the tied product (coin grading services). The FAC does not [*22] indicate that eBay exercise "control" over the price, marketing or distribution of certified coins or coin grading services. Nor does eBay "force" individuals to purchase coin grading services in order to participate in the online coin market; only the 0.3% of coin sellers and buyers who choose to deal in "certified coins" are required to abide by the Certification Policy. See N. Pac. Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 7, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958) ("Where the buyer is free to take either product by itself there is no tying problem."). Such factors place plaintiffs' theory far outside the scope of a traditional tying claim.

Furthermore, plaintiffs have not shown that eBay obtained a "direct economic benefit" from the alleged tying arrangement. See Tuolumne, 236 F.3d at 1158 ("If the tying entity receives no economic benefit from the tie, then we can safely presume that it is not attempting to spread its power into the tied-product market, and we need not strike the arrangements down as an illegal tie under the antitrust laws.") (quoting Gonzalez v. St. Margaret's House Hous. Dev. Fund Corp., 880 F.2d 1514, 1517 (2d Cir. 1989)). Plaintiffs do not allege that eBay receives a portion of the supracompetitive [*23] profits earned by the authorized grading services or any other sort of payment from the sale of the tied product. At best, plaintiffs show that eBay could benefit from the alleged tie because the Certification Policy indirectly leads to increased commissions on the sale of coins. The court is doubtful whether such an indirect and uncertain benefit could give rise to a tying claim. See CTUnify, Inc. v. Nortel Networks, Inc., 115 Fed. Appx. 831, 834-35 (6th Cir. 2004) (affirming dismissal of tying claim where plaintiff did not allege that defendant "received a portion of the profits" from sales of the tied product). Moreover, the Supreme Court has held that "indirect purchasers"—here, coin buyers indirectly "coerced" into buying coin grading services—cannot recover antitrust damages. See Illinois Brick v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 736, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977). Finally, under the rule of reason, the pro-competitive justifications for the adoption of the Certification Policy apply with equal force to counter plaintiffs' tying claim. See Tuolumne, 236 F.3d at 1158. The court therefore finds that plaintiffs have again failed to state a tying claim under the Sherman Act, and GRANTS the motion to dismiss plaintiffs' [*24] second cause of action.

D. Claims 3 and 4: Sherman Act § 2[5]

"To prevail on a claim of monopolization under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, a plaintiff must demonstrate: '(1) [p]ossession of monopoly power in the relevant [market or] submarket; (2) willful acquisition or maintenance of that power; and (3) causal antitrust injury.'" Forsyth v. Humana, Inc., 114 F.3d 1467, 1475 (9th Cir. 1997) (citing Pac. Express, Inc. v. United Airlines, Inc., 959 F.2d 814, 817 (9th Cir. 1992)). Similarly, to prevail on a claim of attempted monopolization, a plaintiff must demonstrate: "(1) specific intent to control prices or destroy competition; (2) predatory or anti-competitive conduct directed toward accomplishing that purpose; (3) a dangerous probability of success; and (4) causal antitrust injury." Id. at 1477 (citing Rebel Oil Co., v. Atl. Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1433 (9th Cir. 1995)).

Both theories of liability require the plaintiff to show "antitrust injury." The Supreme Court [*25] has defined antitrust injury as "injury of the type the antitrust laws were intended to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, 429 U.S. 477, 489, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977). More specifically, antitrust injury is harm to the "competitive process," rather than to individual competitors. Cascade Health Solutions v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 901 (9th Cir. 2008).

Here, the basis of plaintiffs' Section 2 claims is that eBay is a monopolist in the "market for the provision of online auction services." FAC ¶ 190. In its previous order, the court concluded that the complaint failed to demonstrate "that competition among online auction services has been harmed by the [Certification] Policy thus resulting in antitrust injury." Dkt. No. 151 at 12. As the court noted, "plaintiffs do not explain how eBay's actions on its own website can reduce consumers' choices or diminish the quality of their experience on other auction websites." Id. at 13 (emphasis in original). That is, plaintiffs had failed to allege antitrust injury in the market in which eBay allegedly has monopoly power.

[5] Plaintiffs' Section 2 claims are brought on behalf of Class 5 (all companies and individuals who have bought and/or sold coins on eBay and have paid higher commissions to eBay as a result of the Certification Policy).

Plaintiffs now argue that eBay's conduct has not harmed competition [*26] in the market for online auction services, but rather in the markets for: (1) coin grading services; (2) non-certified coins; and (3) certified coins. Dkt. No. 159 at 15-17. Plaintiffs do not allege that eBay has monopoly power in any of the affected markets. As plaintiffs see it, because they are consumers of eBay's services rather than competitors, they need not establish harm to competition in the monopolized market, as long as they can show "detrimental effects to competition in three relevant antitrust markets which flow from [eBay's] anticompetitive abuse." Id. at 21.

The court finds that plaintiffs' novel theory stretches the concept of antitrust injury too far. Under Section 2, "the prohibited conduct must be directed toward competitors and must be intended to injure competition. Such conduct must affect the relevant product market, that is, the 'area of effective competition' between the defendant and plaintiff." Intergraph Corp. v. Intel Corp., 195 F.3d 1346, 1353 (Fed. Cir. 1999) (emphasis added). Simply put, in order to be liable for inflicting antitrust injury under Section 2, a defendant must compete in the affected market. See Mercy-Peninsula Ambulance, Inc. v. County of San Mateo, 791 F.2d 755 (9th Cir. 1986) [*27] (affirming dismissal of Section 2 claim against defendant who was not a competitor in the relevant market). Plaintiffs offer no authority for the proposition that alleged harm to competition in markets in which eBay is not a monopolist—indeed, markets in which eBay does not even compete—can give rise to liability under Section 2. Such a conclusion would subject eBay to Section 2 claims based on alleged competitive harms in the market for any of the "millions of items" sold through its website. FAC ¶ 19. Instead, plaintiffs cite only J. Allen Ramey, M.D., Inc. v. Pacific Found. for Med. Care, 999 F. Supp. 1355, 1360 (S.D. Cal. 1998), which at best stands for the proposition that courts may view claims of antitrust injury brought by competitors with more skepticism than those brought by consumers. But even if the Certification Policy has indirectly resulted in increased prices for consumers of certified coins, such harm is not cognizable under Section 2 because it does not stem from the type of activity that Section 2 was enacted to prevent: exclusionary conduct directed towards eBay's competitors. See Mercy-Peninsula Ambulance, Inc., 791 F.2d at 759 ("The gravamen of a section 2 claim [*28] is the deliberate use of market power by a competitor to control price or exclude competition."). Accordingly, the court finds that the FAC fails to allege antitrust injury cognizable under Section 2 of the Sherman Act, and GRANTS the motion to dismiss plaintiffs' third and fourth claims.

E. Claim 5: Donnelly Act[6]

Plaintiffs' claim under the Donnelly Act, N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 340, is derivative of plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims and therefore "succeed or fail with its Sherman Act claims." Linzer Prods. Corp. v. Sekar, 499 F. Supp. 2d 540, 557 (S.D.N.Y. 2007). Because the Sherman Act claims [*29] are dismissed, claim 5 is also dismissed.

F. Claim 6: Cartwright Act

Plaintiffs' allegations under the Cartwright Act, Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 16720, are also derivative of plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. As with the Donnelly Act, it is well established that "[i]nterpretation of federal antitrust law is . . . applicable to the Cartwright Act." Davis v. Pacific Bell, 204 F. Supp. 2d 1236, 1243 (N.D. Cal. 2002) (citing

---

[6] Claims 5, 6 and 7 are brought on behalf of Class 1 (coin grading companies not authorized under the Certification Policy), Class 2 (companies and individuals who purchased coins graded by one of eBay's five authorized graders), Class 3 (coin sellers who are in possession of coin inventories graded by companies other than one of the five authorized under the Certification Policy), and Class 4 (; (4) companies and individuals who attempted to list coins as "certified" which had been graded by non-authorized grading services and whose listings were removed by eBay for violating the Certification Policy).

Chicago Title Insurance Co. v. Great Western Financial Corp., 69 Cal.2d 305, 315, 70 Cal. Rptr. 849, 444 P.2d 481 (Cal. 1968). Accordingly, the sixth claim is dismissed.

G. Claim 7: Unfair Competition Law (UCL)

The cause of action for unfair competition under Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code § 17200 is also dependent on plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims. Courts have noted that Section 17200's "unlawful" prong "borrows violations of other laws . . . and makes those unlawful practices actionable under the UCL. Thus, a violation of another law is a predicate for stating a cause of action under the UCL's unlawful prong." Berryman v. Merit Prop. Mgmt., Inc., 152 Cal. App. 4th 1544, 1554, 62 Cal. Rptr. 3d 177 (Cal. Ct. App. 2007) (quotation and citation omitted). As a result, "where a plaintiff cannot state a claim under the 'borrowed' law, it [*30] cannot state a UCL claim either." Tuck Beckstoffer Wines LLC v. Ultimate Distribs., 682 F. Supp. 2d 1003, 1020 (N.D. Cal. 2010). Because plaintiffs have failed to state a claim under the Sherman Act, claim 7 is dismissed.

H. Claims 8 and 9: Tortious Interference Claims[7]

Plaintiffs' eighth claim asserts that by implementing the Certification Policy, eBay tortiously interfered with UGS' "prospective economic relationships with coin sellers trading certified coins in the relevant market." FAC ¶ 237. Similarly, plaintiffs ninth claim alleges that eBay interfered with Komito and Kirichenko's "prospective economic relationships with consumers interested in purchasing certified coins [*31] in the relevant market." Id. ¶ 248.

In order to state a claim for tortious interference with prospective economic advantage, plaintiffs must plead "(1) an economic relationship between the plaintiff and some third party, with the probability of future economic benefit to the plaintiff; (2) the defendant's knowledge of the relationship; (3) intentional acts on the part of the defendant designed to disrupt the relationship; (4) actual disruption of the relationship; and (5) economic harm to the plaintiff proximately caused by the acts of the defendant." Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp., 29 Cal. 4th 1134, 1153, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937 (2003). The act causing disruption of the economic relationship must be "wrongful." Sybersound Records, Inc. v. UAV Corp., 517 F.3d 1137, 1151 (9th Cir. 2008)

The court previously dismissed these claims because plaintiffs failed to "plead facts showing the existence of a specific economic relationship with identifiable third parties, which defendants knew about and intentionally disrupted through a wrongful act." Dkt. No. 151 at 17. In the FAC, plaintiffs name a number of specific former clients of UGS, Komito and Kirichenko who "would have continued doing business with [plaintiffs] [*32] but for the implementation of [the Certification Policy." Dkt. No. 159 at 24. Nevertheless, plaintiffs' claims once again fail because they have not shown that any alleged disruption is the result of a "wrongful" act. An act is wrongful if it is "unlawful, that is, if it is proscribed by some constitutional, statutory, regulatory, common law, or other determinable legal standard." *Google Inc. v. American Blind & Wallpaper Factory, Inc., No. 03-05340, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 6228, 2005 WL 832398, at 8 n.32 (N.D. Cal. March 30, 2005) (citing Korea Supply Co., 29 Cal. 4th 1134, 131 Cal.Rptr.2d 29, 63 P.3d 937). Plaintiffs argue that the implementation of the Certification Policy is "wrongful" because it violates the Sherman Act. Dkt. No. 159 at 25. However, as discussed above, the court finds that eBay's conduct, as alleged in the FAC, does not run afoul of federal or state law. The implementation of the Certification Policy therefore cannot serve as the basis for plaintiffs' tort claims. Accordingly, the court GRANTS the motion to dismiss plaintiffs' eighth and ninth claims.

[7] Claim 8 is brought on behalf of Class 1 (coin grading companies not authorized under the Certification Policy). Claim 9 is brought on behalf of Class 3 (coin sellers who are in possession of coin inventories graded by companies other than one of the five authorized under the Certification Policy), and Class 4 (companies and individuals who attempted to list coins as "certified" which had been graded by non-authorized grading services and whose listings were removed by eBay for violating the Certification Policy).

I. Leave to Amend

Dismissal with prejudice is appropriate where it is clear that the complaint could not be saved by amendment. Eminence Capital, LLC v. Aspeon, Inc., 316 F.3d 1048, 1052 (9th Cir. 2003). [*33] Where the plaintiff has previously filed an amended complaint, "the district court's discretion to deny leave to amend is 'particularly broad.'" Miller v. Yokohama Tire Corp., 358 F.3d 616, 622 (9th Cir. 2004) (citing Chodos v. W. Publ'g Co., 292 F.3d 992, 1003 (9th Cir. 2002)).

At this point, plaintiffs have had four opportunities to amend their complaint over the course of more than two years of litigation. This court has already considered their claims once, and continues to find each insufficient to survive a motion to dismiss. The court therefore concludes that the complaint cannot be saved by amendment, and grants eBay's motion to dismiss with prejudice.

III. ORDER

For the foregoing reasons, the court grants eBay's motion to dismiss all claims with prejudice.

MEMORANDUM

Plaintiffs, It's My Party, Inc. ("IMP") and It's My Amphitheatre, Inc. ("IMA"), filed antitrust claims under Sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1 and 2, Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, and under the Maryland Antitrust Act, as well as common law claims for tortious interference with contract and unfair competition. Plaintiffs allege that defendant, Live Nation, [*2] has deliberately and unlawfully acquired monopoly power in the concert promotion industry, thereby entitling plaintiffs to compensatory, treble, and punitive damages, attorneys' fees, and injunctive relief. Now pending before the court is defendant Live Nation's motion for judicial notice of Exhibits 9 and 11-13 of the Lucy Yen Declaration in support of Live Nation's motion for summary judgment. Live Nation's motion for judicial notice is denied.

BACKGROUND

It's My Party, Inc. ("IMP") is a concert promotion business, and It's My Amphitheatre, Inc. ("IMA") is a related venue management business, both of which are run by Seth Hurwitz, who operates in and around the Baltimore/Washington, D.C. area. (Def.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 2, ECF 74.) Live Nation is an international concert promoter. (Id. at 5.) IMP/IMA alleges that Live Nation is engaged in unlawful tying arrangements, has unlawfully gained a monopoly in the concert promotion business, and has tortiously interfered with contracts and engaged in unfair competition.

In conjunction with its motion for summary judgment (which is not yet ripe because IMP/IMA were recently granted an extension to file their opposition), defendant Live Nation [*3] seeks judicial notice of four exhibits: (1) Plaintiffs IMP/IMA's objections to a proposed merger between Live Nation and Ticketmaster, filed in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia; (2) the United States' response to IMP/IMA's objections; (3) IMP/IMA's verified complaint filed in the Circuit Court of Maryland for Anne Arundel County, seeking injunctive relief against Live Nation's plans to build a concert venue; and (4) the court order dismissing the Anne Arundel County Circuit Court complaint. Live Nation asserts that all four exhibits are public records, which may be judicially noticed according to Federal Rule of Evidence 201, and that the exhibits reflect IMP/IMA's history of failed legal challenges against Live Nation, thereby lending credibility to Live Nation's defense in this action. (Def.'s Reply in Support of Mot. for Jud. Notice at 1, ECF No. 92.)

ANALYSIS

A court may take judicial notice of adjudicative facts. Adjudicative facts, as opposed to legislative facts, "are simply the facts of the particular case." Fed. R. Evid. 201(a) advisory committee's note. Legislative facts "are those which have relevance to legal reasoning and the lawmaking process, [*4] whether in the formulation of a legal principle or ruling by a judge or court or in the enactment of a legislative body." Id. "[A]djudicative facts are facts about the parties and their activities, businesses, and properties; they usually answer the questions of who did what, where, when, how, why, and with what motive or intent . . . ." Dashiell v. Meeks, 396 Md. 149, 913 A.2d 10, 26 n.6 (Md. 2006). Though a court may take judicial notice of adjudicative facts, the general rule "is that a court will not travel outside the record of the case before it in order to take notice of proceedings in another case, even between the same parties, and in the same court, unless the proceedings are put in evidence; and the rule is sometimes enforced with considerable strictness." Id. at 26 (internal quotation marks omitted) (citing Morse v. Lewis, 54 F.2d 1027, 1029 (4th Cir. 1932)). In rare cases, however, the court may, in its discretion, judicially notice an adjudicative fact that is "not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot [*5] reasonably be questioned." Fed. R. Evid. 201(b).

Rule 201 limits judicial notice to adjudicative facts, which must be not only relevant but also not subject to reasonable dispute. Thus, for the court to judicially notice the four exhibits at issue, they must constitute or contain adjudicative facts. The exhibits reference prior antitrust objections made by IMP/IMA regarding a proposed merger between Live Nation and Ticketmaster, the Justice Department's response to those filings, and a prior state court proceeding between Live Nation and IMP/IMA. The DOJ's response to IMP/IMA's objections and the state court's order dismissing IMP/IMA's complaint are not adjudicative facts but rather opinions and legal conclusions. If Live Nation argues that the mere fact of prior objections, the DOJ's response, and dismissal of state court proceedings is relevant to its defense, that fact may be adjudicative, but the legal conclusions contained therein are not.

Moreover, Live Nation asserts that the four exhibits are relevant to establishing its defense in this action, but in its motion for summary judgment Live Nation does not offer any specific explanation as to how these exhibits are relevant to [*6] its defense. As IMP/IMA point out in their opposition to Live Nation's motion for judicial notice, Live Nation describes the facts underlying the four exhibits in detail in the undisputed facts section of its motion for summary judgment (Def.'s Mot. Summ. J. at 5), but Live Nation's legal argument does not reference the exhibits or the litigation and objections to which they pertain. In support of its motion for judicial notice, Live Nation suggests that the exhibits are relevant because IMP/IMA's objections to the proposed Ticketmaster merger and IMP/IMA's state court complaint contained allegations similar to those asserted here, which were rejected by both the DOJ and the Anne Arundel County Circuit Court. Live Nation contends that the DOJ and the Anne Arundel Circuit Court's finding that IMP/IMA overstated Live Nation's position in the market indicates that IMP/IMA cannot establish monopoly power and tying in this case either. While these prior allegations and decisions are loosely relevant to the instant case because they also involved Live Nation and antitrust law, Live Nation cannot assert a defense to this new antitrust claim based on the fact that prior antitrust claims involving [*7] other activity were unsuccessful. It is therefore unclear exactly how the exhibits are relevant to Live Nation's defense. The only apparent use for introducing the exhibits into evidence (let alone judicially noticing them) is to establish that IMP/IMA has made unsuccessful objections and brought at least one failed legal challenge against Live Nation in the past for activity unrelated to the instant action. Other than serving as background to a characterization of IMP/IMA as litigious, it is unclear how else these exhibits are relevant.

Even if it is true that the four exhibits are relevant to Live Nation's defense, to be granted judicial notice, the exhibits must also be either (1) generally known within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court, or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned. While the fact of the filings and proceedings is capable of accurate determination by resort to the public record, the truth of the contents of the exhibits is open to reasonable dispute. Undoubtedly, Live Nation disputes IMP/IMA's objections to the proposed Ticketmaster merger, IMP/IMA disputes the DOJ's response [*8] to their objections, Live Nation disputes the allegations in IMP/IMA's state court complaint, and IMP/IMA disputes the decision to dismiss their state court action. Because the contents of the exhibits are reasonably disputed, they do not qualify for judicial notice.

Live Nation's motion must therefore be denied to the extent that Live Nation wants the facts of the exhibits to be judicially noticed for their truth; if any judicial notice is to be made of the exhibits, it must be limited to the fact that there were prior proceedings and prior filings. In other words, the exhibits may be judicially noticed not for the truth of the matters contained therein but merely to establish the fact of such prior proceedings if indeed that fact is relevant to establishing Live Nation's defense in this action. Denying the motion for judicial notice of the contents of the exhibits does not preclude Live Nation from trying to introduce the exhibits as evidence of a lack of tying, absence of monopoly power, or failure to show antitrust injury if the exhibits would indeed make that showing.

ORDER ON DEFENDANTS' F.R.Civ.P. 12 MOTION TO DISMISS

(Doc. 9.)

INTRODUCTION

Defendants Maxim Healthcare Services, Inc. ("Maxim") and two of its supervisors seek to dismiss plaintiff Jennifer Jeske's ("Ms. Jeske's") wage and hour violation claims as inadequately pled and lacking necessary elements. Ms. Jeske counters that the claims alleged in her original complaint ("complaint") are pled adequately to defeat defendants' challenges. This Court considered defendants' F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the record and VACATES the January 13, 2012 hearing, pursuant [*2] to Local Rule 230(g). For the reasons discussed above, this Court DISMISSES nearly all of Ms. Jeske's claims.

BACKGROUND[1]

Maxim provides medical staffing as an independent contractor to clients, including Wasco State Prison ("Wasco"). Wasco, an inmate reception center, processes new inmates with its 400-bed, medium custody facility. During April 2010 to October 2010, Maxim employed Ms. Jeske as a non-exempt, certified nursing assistant who was staffed at Wasco. Ms. Jeske generally worked from 10:30 p.m. to 6:30 a.m. five days per week. Her duties included watching suicidal inmates and providing inmate care at the Wasco clinic. Defendant Alvin Tagayun ("Mr. Tagayun") was an account manager/supervisor of Ms. Jeske. Defendant Ashley Blankenship ("Ms. Blankenship") was an manager/supervisor of Ms. Jeske. [2]

On behalf of Ms. Jeske, the complaint alleges seven California wage and hour violation, fraud and wrongful termination claims. [3] More specifically, the complaint alleges that defendants failed to provide Ms. Jeske proper meal and rest periods, [*3] failed to pay her timely premium wages, defrauded her into working for Maxim, and wrongfully terminated her in violation of public policy. On behalf of Ms. Jeske and other aggrieved Maxim employees, the complaint alleges 11 claims to pursue civil penalties pursuant to the California Private Attorneys General Act ("PAGA"), Cal. Lab. Code, §§ 2698, et al. More specifically, the complaint alleges that as to Ms. Jeske and other aggrieved employees, Maxim failed to provide accurate wage records, adequate seating and sanitary bathrooms, and to maintain adequate room temperatures.

The complaint seeks to recover unpaid wages, civil penalties, attorney fees, damages for Ms. Jeske's emotional distress, and punitive damages.

Defendants fault the complaint's failure to meet federal pleading standards and to establish that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship are employers or corporate agents, officers or directors subject to the complaint's claims.

DISCUSSION

F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6)* Motion To Dismiss Standards

The primary thrust of defendants' challenges to the complaint's claims is that they are conclusory and lack supporting facts.

"When [*4] a federal court reviews the sufficiency of a complaint, before the reception of any evidence either by affidavit or admissions, its task is necessarily a limited one. The issue is not whether a plaintiff will ultimately prevail but whether the claimant is entitled to offer evidence to support the claims." Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1974); Gilligan v. Jamco Development Corp., 108 F.3d 246, 249 (9th Cir. 1997). A F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) dismissal is proper where there is either a "lack of a cognizable legal theory" or "the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory." Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990); Graehling v. Village of Lombard, Ill., 58 F.3d 295, 297 (7th Cir. 1995). A F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion "tests the legal sufficiency of a claim." Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 732 (9th Cir. 2001).

In addressing dismissal, a court must: (1) construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff; (2) accept all well-pleaded factual allegations as true; and (3) determine whether plaintiff can prove any set of facts to support a claim that would merit relief. Cahill v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-338 (9th Cir. 1996). [*5] Nonetheless, a court is not required "to accept as true allegations that are merely conclusory, unwarranted deductions of fact, or unreasonable inferences." In re Gilead Sciences Securities Litig., 536 F.3d 1049, 1055 (9th Cir. 2008) (citation omitted). A court "need not assume the truth of legal conclusions cast in the form of factual allegations," U.S. ex rel. Chunie v. Ringrose, 788 F.2d 638, 643, n. 2 (9th Cir.1986), and must not "assume that the [plaintiff] can prove facts that it has not alleged or that the defendants have violated . . . laws in ways that have not been alleged." Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 526, 103 S.Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983). A court need not permit an attempt to amend if "it is clear that the complaint could not be saved by an amendment." Livid Holdings Ltd. v. Salomon Smith Barney, Inc., 416 F.3d 940, 946 (9th Cir. 2005).

[1] The factual recitation is derived generally from the complaint.

[2] Maxim, Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship will be referred to collectively as "defendants."

[3] The complaint's 18 separate claims will be discussed in greater detail below.

A "plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitlement to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544,127 S. Ct. 1955, 1964-65, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) [*6] (internal citations omitted). Moreover, a court "will dismiss any claim that, even when construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, fails to plead sufficiently all required elements of a cause of action." Student Loan Marketing Ass'n v. Hanes, 181 F.R.D. 629, 634 (S.D. Cal. 1998). In practice, a complaint "must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain recovery under some viable legal theory." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 562, 127 S.Ct. at 1969 (quoting Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)).

In Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937,1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009), the U.S. Supreme Court explained:

> . . . a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." . . . A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. . . . The plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," [*7] but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. (Citations omitted.)

After discussing Iqbal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals summarized: "In sum, for a complaint to survive [dismissal], the non-conclusory 'factual content,' and reasonable inferences from that content, must be plausibly suggestive of a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief." Moss v. U.S. Secret Service, 572 F.3d 962, 969 (9th Cir. 2009) (quoting Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. at 1949).

The U.S. Supreme Court applies a "two-prong approach" to address dismissal:

> First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. . . . Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. . . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will . . . be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . . But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more [*8] than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged - but it has not "show[n]"-"that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2).
> In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

Moreover, a plaintiff suing multiple defendants "must allege the basis of his claim against each defendant to satisfy Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), which requires a short and plain statement of the claim to put defendants on sufficient notice of the allegations against them." Gauvin v. Trombatore, 682 F.Supp. 1067, 1071 (N.D. Cal.

1988). "Specific [*9] identification of the parties to the activities alleged by the plaintiffs is required in this action to enable the defendant to plead intelligently." Van Dyke Ford, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 399 F.Supp. 277, 284 (D. Wis. 1975).

With these standards in mind, this Court turns to defendants' challenges to the complaint's claims.

Ms. Jeske's Unpaid Wages

The complaint's first claim alleges that Maxim failed to pay all of Ms. Jeske's earned wages in that she was not paid her meal and rest period wages, waiting time penalties, and other due compensation to violate California Labor Code section 204. [4]

Defendants argue that no private right of action exists under section 204 which provides for only civil penalties. Section 204(a) provides that wages "are due and payable twice during each calendar month, on days designated in advance by the employer as the regular paydays." Defendants argue that section 204 "does not provide any right to wages" in that it addresses wage payments "at certain intervals." See In re Moffet, 19 Cal. App. 2d 7, 13, 64 P.2d 1190 (1937) ("sole purpose" of the statute "is [*10] to require an employer of labor who comes within its terms to maintain two regular pay days each month").

Defendants continue that a section 204 violation remedy is limited to a civil penalty under section 210(a) which provides that "every person who fails to pay the wages of each employee as provided in Sections . . . 204 . . . shall be subject to a civil penalty . . ." Under section 210(b), the "penalty shall be recovered by the Labor Commissioner as part of a hearing held to recover unpaid wages and penalties pursuant to this chapter or in an independent civil action. The action shall be brought in the name of the people of the State of California and the Labor Commissioner and the attorneys thereof may proceed and act for and on behalf of the people in bringing these actions."

Defendants point to the absence in sections 204 and 210 of "'clear, understandable, unmistakable terms" that a private right of action exists for violations of section 204. "If the Legislature had truly intended to create a private right to sue one would reasonably have expected that the Legislature simply would have directly imposed such liability in clear, understandable, unmistakable terms, as it has done [*11] in numerous other statutes." Crusader Ins. Co. v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 54 Cal.App.4th 121, 132, 62 Cal.Rptr.2d 620 (1997) (internal quotations omitted). "Thus when neither the language nor the history of a statute indicates an intent to create a new private right to sue, a party contending for judicial recognition of such a right bears a heavy, perhaps insurmountable, burden of persuasion." Crusader Ins., 54 Cal.App.4th at 133, 62 Cal.Rptr.2d 620; see Moradi-Shalal v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Companies, 46 Cal.3d 287, 300, 250 Cal.Rptr. 116, 758 P.2d 58 (1988) (fact that creation of a private right of action is not observed "is a strong indication the Legislature never intended to create such a right of action").

In Vikco Ins. Services, Inc. v. Ohio Indem. Co., 70 Cal.App.4th 55, 62-63, 82 Cal.Rptr.2d 442 (1999), the California Court of Appeal further explained:

> Adoption of a regulatory statute does not automatically create a private right to sue for damages resulting from violations of the statute. Such a private right of action exists only if the language of the statute or its legislative history clearly indicates the Legislature intended to create such a right to sue for damages. If the Legislature [*12] intends to create a private cause of action, we generally assume it will do so " 'directly[,] . . . in clear, understandable, unmistakable terms . . . .' [Citation.]" (Moradi-Shalal v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Companies (1988) 46 Cal.3d 287, 294-295 [250 Cal.Rptr. 116, 758 P.2d 58] (Moradi-Shalal); see also Crusader Ins. Co. v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., supra, 54 Cal.App.4th at pp. 125-137 [because a judge may not insert what has been omitted from a statute, legislative intent alone determines whether a statute creates a new private right to sue]; Schaefer v. Williams (1993) 15 Cal.App.4th 1243, 1248 [19 Cal.Rptr.2d 212] [nothing in Elections Code creates a private cause of action to enforce a pledge to follow fair campaign practices; "Surely, if the Legislature had intended to create such a private action, it would have done so by clear and direct language"]; Nowlon v. Koram Ins. Center, Inc. (1991) 1 Cal.App.4th 1437, 1444-1445 [2 Cal.Rptr.2d 683] [absent some express provision for civil liability, courts cannot assume a private cause of action for negligence may be brought any time a legislative enactment is violated].)

Moreover, "when legislation expressly provides a particular remedy or [*13] remedies, courts should not expand the coverage of the statute to subsume other remedies." Passenger Corp. v. Passengers Assn., 414 U.S. 453, 458, 94 S. Ct. 690, 38 L. Ed. 2d 646 (1974).

Ms. Jeske offers no meaningful argument for survival of the complaint's (first) unpaid wages claim. Ms. Jeske merely recites the complaint's allegations that she was not paid her meal and rest period wages, waiting time penalties and other compensation due. Ms. Jeske offers that the claim's basis is "Defendant's failure to pay her wages that were owing to Plaintiff." Ms. Jeske fails to demonstrate that she is entitled to pursue a private right of action for a section 204 violation and offers nothing to suggest that she can rehabilitate the claim. As such, the complaint's (first) unpaid wages claim is dismissed with prejudice.

Ms. Jeske's Missed Meal Periods

The complaint's second claim alleges that Maxim "failed to provide Plaintiff with the required meal periods for numerous days worked" in that Ms. Jeske "worked for more than 6 hours per day without a meal break" to entitle Ms. Jeske "to one additional hour of wage at the employee's regular rate of compensation for each workday that the meal periods were not provided."

Section 512 [*14] and related California labor laws require an employer to provide no less than a 30-minute meal period when the employee works more than five hours in a day.

Defendants challenge the claim as "conclusory" with "no factual basis . . . that Maxim failed to provide her with required meal periods." Defendants point to the absence of facts to support how Ms. Jeske was denied meal periods, who denied them, and when they were denied. Defendants continue that although meal and rest period premiums are mandated payments under section 226.7, they are not contractually agreed upon "wages" to which section 204 applies.

Defendants are correct that the claim lacks facts to demonstrate that Maxim denied Ms. Jeske meal breaks. The claim merely alludes to "numerous days worked" without meal periods. Similar to the complaint's (first) unpaid wages claim, Ms. Jeske offers nothing meaningful to support survival of the (second) meal period premiums claim. Ms. Jeske merely reiterates the claim's allegations and provides no insight how to rehabilitate the claim. Despite Ms. Jeske's lack of meaningful support for the missed meal periods claim, she is granted leave to amend the claim.

Ms. [*15] Jeske's Missed Rest Periods

The complaint's third claim alleges that Maxim "failed to provide Plaintiff with the rest periods at the rate of ten minutes net rest per four hours of work or major fraction thereof" to entitle Ms. Jeske to one additional hour of wage at her regular compensation rate for each workday that rest periods were not provided.

California Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order 4-2001, Section 12 ("Section 12") requires rest periods "based on the total hours worked daily at the rate of ten (10) minutes net rest time per four (4) hours or major fraction thereof." Section 226.7 prohibits an employer to require an employee to work during a mandated meal or rest period.

Defendants fault the claim as "devoid of facts" and characterize it as "a recitation of applicable law" and "legal conclusions referencing" Maxim. Defendants criticize the claim's failure to apprise "how rest periods were allegedly not made available."

Defendants are correct that the claim lacks facts as to when and how Maxim denied Ms. Jeske rest periods. The claim merely alleges denial of rest periods and nothing more. Ms. Jeske again points to the claim's skeletal allegations to claim they are sufficient. [*16] Ms. Jeske offers no meaningful resistance to dismissal of the claim and fails to challenge defendants' points. Despite Ms. Jeske's meaningless defense of the claim, this Court grants Ms. Jeske leave to amend her missed rest periods claim.

Ms. Jeske's Waiting Time Penalties

The complaint's fourth claim alleges that Maxim refused to pay Ms. Jeske her unpaid wages for meal and rest period premiums required by section 203 to entitle her to waiting time penalties of 30 days' wages.

Section 201 requires within 72 hours, payment of employee wages when an employee quits. Section 203 provides: "If an employer willfully fails to pay, without abatement or reduction, in accordance with Sections 201 . . ., any wage of an employee who is discharged or who quits, the wages of the employee shall continue as a penalty from the due date thereof at the same rate until paid or until an action therefor is commenced; but the wages shall not continue for more than 30 days."

Defendants construe the claim to seek section 203 penalties for willful failure to pay final wages timely on termination. Defendants fault the claim's failure to identify "what wages were earned and unpaid at the time of her termination" [*17] and "how and in what manner a final wage payment was untimely" under Section 201 or 202. Defendants point to uncertainty whether the complaint alleges that defendants paid Ms. Jeske untimely when she terminated or that the final timely pay check did not cover all wages owed. Defendants note that the complaint's limited reference to unpaid wages is allegedly unpaid meal and rest period premiums which are not wages under section 203 and not subject to waiting time penalties. Defendants further fault the absence of allegations of Maxim's willfulness to fail to pay final wages.

Defendants raise valid points. The complaint fails to identify sufficiently wages at issue and to articulate Maxim's willful failure to pay such wages. Ms. Jeske offers that she "has alleged sufficient facts to apprise Defendant of its wrongful conduct." Based on a decision interpreting an applicable statute of limitations, Ms. Jeske characterizes payment of an additional hour as wages rather than a penalty. See Murphy v. Kenneth Cole Productions, Inc., 40 Cal.4th 1094, 1102, 56 Cal. Rptr. 3d 880, 155 P.3d 284 (2007). Such characterization is unavailing in that the complaint fails to identify adequately untimely paid wages to warrant [*18] dismissal of the waiting time penalties claim with leave to amend.

Fraud

The complaint's (fifth) fraud - deceit and misrepresentation claim alleges that Maxim promised to pay Ms. Jeske $12 per hour but that she was paid $10 per hour with her first pay check. The fraud claim further alleges that Ms. Jeske complained "about the misrepresentation until eventually Defendants agreed to pay her $11 per hour" but never paid her "the $12 per hour that she had originally been promised."

Defendants attack the misrepresentation claim as lacking sufficient particularity to satisfy F.R.Civ.P. 9(b).

Fraud Elements

The elements of a California fraud claim are: (1) misrepresentation (false representation, concealment or nondisclosure); (2) knowledge of the falsity (or "scienter"); (3) intent to defraud, i.e., to induce reliance; (4) justifiable reliance; and (5) resulting damage. Lazar v. Superior Court, 12 Cal.4th 631, 638, 49 Cal.Rptr.2d 377, 909 P.2d 981 (1996). The same elements comprise a cause of action for negligent misrepresentation, except there is no requirement of intent to induce reliance. Cadlo v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 125 Cal. App. 4th 513, 519, 23 Cal. Rptr. 3d 1 (2004).

"[T]o establish a cause of action for [*19] fraud a plaintiff must plead and prove in full, factually and specifically, all of the elements of the cause of action." Conrad v. Bank of America, 45 Cal.App.4th 133, 156, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 336 (1996). There must be a showing "that the defendant thereby intended to induce the plaintiff to act to his detriment in reliance upon the false representation" and "that the plaintiff actually and justifiably relied upon the defendant's misrepresentation in acting to his detriment." Conrad, 45 Cal.App.4th at 157, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 336. "The absence of any one of these required elements will preclude recovery." Wilhelm v. Pray, Price, Williams & Russell, 186 Cal.App.3d 1324, 1332, 231 Cal.Rptr. 355 (1986).

Particularity Pleading Standard

F.R.Civ.P. 9(b) requires a party to "state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud." [5] In the Ninth Circuit, "claims for fraud and negligent misrepresentation must meet Rule 9(b)'s particularity requirements." Neilson v. Union Bank of California, N.A., 290 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1141 (C.D. Cal. 2003). A court may dismiss a claim grounded in fraud when its allegations fail to satisfy F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s heightened pleading requirements. Vess, 317 F.3d at 1107. [*20] [6] A motion to dismiss a claim "grounded in fraud" under F.R.Civ.P. 9(b) for failure to plead with particularity is the "functional equivalent" of a F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Vess, 317 F.3d at 1107. As a counter-balance, F.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2) requires from a pleading "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."

F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard "is not an invitation to disregard Rule 8's requirement of simplicity, directness, and clarity" and "has among its purposes the avoidance of unnecessary discovery." McHenry v. Renne, 84 F.3d 1172, 1178 (9th Cir. 1996). F.R.Civ.P 9(b) requires "specific" allegations of fraud "to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct which is alleged to constitute the fraud charged so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong." Semegen v. Weidner, 780 F.2d 727, 731 (9th Cir. 1985). "A pleading is sufficient under Rule 9(b) if it identifies the circumstances constituting fraud so that the defendant can prepare an adequate answer from the allegations." Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 671-672 (9th Cir. 1993) (internal quotations omitted; citing Gottreich v. San Francisco Investment Corp., 552 F.2d 866, 866 (9th Cir. 1997)). The Ninth Circuit has explained:

> Rule 9(b) requires particularized allegations of the circumstances constituting fraud. The time, place and content of an alleged misrepresentation may identify the statement or the omission [*22] complained of, but these circumstances do not "constitute" fraud. The statement in question must be false to be fraudulent. Accordingly, our cases have consistently required that circumstances indicating falseness be set forth. . . . [W]e [have] observed that plaintiff must include statements regarding the time, place, and nature of the alleged fraudulent activities, and that "mere conclusory allegations of fraud are insufficient." . . . The plaintiff must set forth what is false or misleading about a statement, and why it is false. In other words, the plaintiff must set forth an explanation as to why the statement or omission complained of was false or misleading. . . .
> In certain cases, to be sure, the requisite particularity might be supplied with great simplicity.

[5] F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s particularity requirement applies to state law causes of action: "[W]hile a federal court will examine state law to determine whether the elements of fraud have been pled sufficiently to state a cause of action, the Rule 9(b) requirement that the circumstances of the fraud must be stated with particularity is a federally imposed rule." Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1103 (9th Cir. 2003) (quoting Hayduk v. Lanna, 775 F.2d 441, 443 (1st Cir. 1995)(italics in original)).

[6] "In some cases, the plaintiff may allege a unified course of fraudulent conduct and rely entirely on that course of conduct as the basis of a claim. In that event, the claim is said to be 'grounded in fraud' or to 'sound in fraud,' and the pleading of that claim as a whole must satisfy the particularity [*21] requirement of Rule 9(b)." Vess, 317 F.3d at 1103-1104.

In Re Glenfed, Inc. Securities Litigation, 42 F.3d 1541, 1547-1548 (9th Cir. 1994) (en banc) (italics in original) superseded by statute on other grounds as stated in Marksman Partners, L.P. v. Chantal Pharm. Corp., 927 F.Supp. 1297 (C.D. Cal. 1996); see Cooper v. Pickett, 137 F.3d 616, 627 (9th Cir. 1997) (fraud allegations must be accompanied by "the who, what, when, where, and how" of the misconduct charged); see Neubronner, 6 F.3d at 672 [*23] ("The complaint must specify facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity."); Moore v. Kayport Package Exp., Inc., 885 F.2d 531, 541 ("Rule 9(b) requires that the pleader state the time, place, and specific content of the false representations as well as the identities of the parties to the misrepresentation").

In a fraud action against a corporation, a plaintiff must "allege the names of the persons who made the allegedly fraudulent representations, their authority to speak, to whom they spoke, what they said or wrote, and when it was said or written." Tarmann v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 2 Cal.App.4th 153, 157, 2 Cal.Rptr.2d 861 (1991).

Defendants challenge the complaint's failure to identify who made the allegedly false promise to pay $12 per hour and that person's authority to speak for Maxim. Defendants fault the absence of facts that "the promise of $12 per hour was made with knowledge of its falsity and an intent to defraud Plaintiff." Defendants point to the absence of allegations that Ms. Jeske relied "on a false promise or how that reliance damaged her." Defendants attribute the complaint to allege no more than [*24] a "breach of promise which is wholly inadequate." Mills v. Polar Molecular Corp., 12 F.3d 1170, 1176 (2nd Cir. 1993) (failure to carry out a promise "does not constitute fraud unless, when the promise was made, the defendant secretly intended not to perform or knew that he could not perform").

The complaint's conclusory allegations fail to meet Rule 9(b)'s strict standard. Ms. Jeske appears to concede as much as she merely offers that the complaint alleges "the requisite elements of a fraud claim." The complaint lacks precise allegations as to whom at Maxim specifically made a $12 per hour promise and when. The complaint lacks facts to support fraud elements let alone the who, what, when, when and how of alleged misconduct. Defendants correctly equate the fraud claim to no more than a contract breach, especially given the lack of facts to support fraud elements of scienter, intent to defraud, Ms. Jeske's justifiable reliance, and resulting damages. The complaint fails to plead in full, factually and specifically, all fraud elements to warrant dismissal with prejudice of the fraud claim.

Wrongful Termination In Violation Of Public Policy

The complaint's (seventh) wrongful termination in [*25] violation of public policy claim ("Tameny claim") alleges that Ms. Jeske complained about failure to provide meal and rest breaks, suitable seating, and functional, sanitary bathrooms, to maintain adequate temperature, and to pay a promised hourly rate. The claim further alleges that Maxim, in violation of California public policy, constructively discharged Ms. Jeske "in retaliation for asserting her statutory rights and resisting employer's violations of laws that secure important public policies." [7]

Defendants fault the complaint's failure to allege facts of a constructive discharge.

"Under the constructive discharge doctrine, an employee's reasonable decision to resign because of unendurable working conditions is assimilated to a formal discharge for remedial purposes. The inquiry is objective: Did working conditions become so intolerable that a reasonable person in the employee's position would have felt compelled to resign?" Penn. State Police v. Suders, 542 U.S. 129, 141, 124 S.Ct. 2342, 159 L. Ed. 2d 204 (2004) (citation omitted).

[7] The complaint purports to allege a claim under Tameny v. Atlantic Richfield Co., 27 Cal.3d 167, 172, 164 Cal.Rptr. 839, 842, 610 P.2d 1330 (1980) ("an employer's traditional authority to discharge an at-will employee may be limited by statute . . . or by considerations of public policy"). There can be no right to terminate for an unlawful reason or purpose that contravenes fundamental public policy. Silo v. CHW Med. Found., 27 Cal. 4th 1097, 1104, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 698, 703, 45 P.3d 1162 (2002). "It is settled that an employer's discharge of an employee in violation of a fundamental public policy embodied in a constitutional or statutory provision gives rise to a tort action." Barton v. New United Motor Manufacturing, Inc., 43 Cal.App.4th 1200, 1205, 51 Cal.Rptr.2d 328 (1996); [*26] Cabesuela v. Browning-Ferris Industries of Cal., Inc., 68 Cal.App.4th 101, 107, 80 Cal.Rptr.2d 60 (1998). The plaintiff's remedy is a common law tort action: "A wrongful act committed in the course of a contractual relationship may afford both tort and contractual relief." Tameny, 27 Cal.3d at 174-175, 164 Cal.Rptr. at 843.

An employee is constructively discharged when "a reasonable person in his position would have felt that he was forced to quit because of intolerable and discriminatory working conditions." Satterwhite v. Smith, 744 F.2d 1380, 1382 (9th Cir. 1984). Courts are reluctant to predicate constructive discharge "solely on the fact of employment discrimination" [*27] and look for "aggravating factors," such as a "continuous pattern of discriminatory treatment." Clark v. Marsh, 665 F.2d 1168, 1174, 214 U.S. App. D.C. 350 (9th Cir. 1984).

Defendants note the absence of allegations that Ms. Jeske "was forced to quit" and fault the complaint's conclusions that she was "constructively discharged" and labeled a troublemaker. Defendants argue that such allegations fail to establish protected activity, especially given the absence of facts to describe Ms. Jeske's complaints. Defendants further fault the complaint's failure to allege violation of a public policy to satisfy elements of a Tameny claim. For "a policy to support a wrongful discharge claim, it must be: (1) delineated in either constitutional or statutory provisions; (2) 'public' in the sense that it 'inures to the benefit of the public' rather than serving merely the interests of the individual; (3) well established at the time of the discharge; and (4) substantial and fundamental." Stevenson v. Superior Court, 16 Cal.4th 880, 894, 66 Cal. Rptr. 2d 888, 941 P.2d 1157 (1997). Defendants note that the Tameny claim fails to identify a "specific constitutional or statutory provision" which Maxim violated. Defendants fault the Tameny claim's [*28] mere reference to discharge "against the public policy of the State of California as evidenced by the enactment of the Labor Code provisions and Wage Orders referenced above."

Ms. Jeske responds that failure to pay wages "owed by law and promised her" is sufficient to establish necessary intolerable working conditions to compel her to resign. Ms. Jeske attributes the complaint to allege "the statutory provisions that Defendant has violated."

Defendants correctly note that lack of alleged facts to support objectively intolerable working conditions. The complaint points to no pattern of discriminatory treatment or similar employer conduct to support constructive discharge, especially given the limited six-month duration of Ms. Jeske's employment. Defendants are further correct to fault the lack of facts of a violation of a public policy to support a Tameny claim. As addressed above, the complaint fails to support wage and hour violations and in turn the necessary public policy violation for a Tameny claim to warrant dismissal with leave to amend the complaint's (seventh) wrongful termination in violation of public policy claim.

Unfair Competition Claim

The complaint's sixth claim proceeds [*29] under California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 17200, et seq. The claims alleges: "Defendants' violations of the Labor Code provisions set forth above constitute unlawful business acts or practices."

Defendants argue that a UCL claim fails with the failure of the complaint's "substantive claims" from which a UCL claim derives. Defendants fault the complaint's failure to "specify which alleged violations of law are the 'unlawful business acts or practices'" in that the claim merely references Labor Code violations which "constitute unlawful business acts or practices."

"Unfair competition is defined to include 'unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising.'" Blank v. Kirwan, 39 Cal.3d 311, 329, 216 Cal.Rptr. 718, 703 P.2d 58 (1985) (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200). The UCL establishes three varieties of unfair competition - "acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Shvarts v. Budget Group, Inc., 81 Cal.App.4th 1153, 1157, 97 Cal.Rptr.2d 722 (2000). An "unlawful business activity" includes anything that can properly be called a business practice and that at the same time is forbidden [*30] by law. Blank, 39 Cal.3d at 329, 216 Cal.Rptr. 718 (citing People v. McKale, 25 Cal.3d 626, 631-632, 159 Cal.Rptr. 811, 602 P.2d 731 (1979)). "A business practice is 'unlawful' if it is 'forbidden by law.'" Walker v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 98 Cal.App.4th 1158, 1169, 121 Cal.Rptr.2d 79 (2002) (quoting Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.4th 377, 383, 6 Cal.Rptr.2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992)).

The UCL prohibits "unlawful" practices "forbidden by law, be it civil or criminal, federal, state, or municipal, statutory, regulatory, or court-made." Saunders v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 4th 832, 838, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1999). The UCL "thus creates an independent action when a business practice violates some other law." Walker, 98 Cal.App.4th at 1169, 121 Cal.Rptr.2d 79. According to the California Supreme Court, the UCL "borrows" violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices independently actionable under the UCL. Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.4th 377, 383, 6 Cal.Rptr.2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992).

A fellow district court has explained the borrowing of a violation of law other than the UCL:

> To state a claim for an "unlawful" business practice under the UCL, a plaintiff must [*31] assert the violation of any other law. Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 180, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999) (stating, "By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, section 17200 'borrows' violations of other law and treats them as unlawful practices that the unfair competition law makes independently actionable.") (citation omitted). Where a plaintiff cannot state a claim under the "borrowed" law, she cannot state a UCL claim either. See, e.g., Smith v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co., 93 Cal.App.4th 700, 718, 113 Cal.Rptr.2d 399 (2001). Here, Plaintiff has predicated her "unlawful" business practices claim on her TILA claim. However, as discussed above, Plaintiff's attempt to state a claim under TILA has failed. Accordingly, Plaintiff has stated no "unlawful" UCL claim.

Rubio v. Capital One Bank, 572 F.Supp.2d 1157, 1168 (C.D. Cal. 2008).

"Unfair" under the UCL "means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." [*32] Cal-Tech Communications, 20 Cal.4th 163 at187, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548. The "unfairness" prong of the UCL "does not give the courts a general license to review the fairness of contracts." Samura v. Kaiser Found. Health Plan, 17 Cal.App.4th 1284, 1299, 22 Cal. Rptr. 2d 20 & n. 6, 17 Cal. App. 4th 1284, 22 Cal.Rptr.2d 20 (1993), cert. denied, 511 U.S. 1084, 114 S. Ct. 1835, 128 L. Ed. 2d 463 (1994).

The "fraudulent" prong under the UCL requires a plaintiff to "show deception to some members of the public, or harm to the public interest," Watson Laboratories, Inc. v. Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 178 F.Supp.2d 1099, 1121 (C.D. Ca. 2001), or to allege that "members of the public are likely to be deceived." *Medical Instrument Development Laboratories v. Alcon Laboratories, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41411, 2005 WL 1926673, at 5 (N.D. Cal. 2005).

"A plaintiff alleging unfair business practices under these statutes [UCL] must state with reasonable particularity the facts supporting the statutory elements of the violation." Khoury v. Maly's of California, Inc., 14 Cal.App.4th 612, 619, 17 Cal.Rptr.2d 708 (1993).

Defendants construe the complaint to merely allege that Ms. Jeske worked for Maxim as a certified nursing assistant and that her employment ended in October 2010 such that the complaint [*33] lacks facts that Ms. Jeske was improperly denied meal and rest periods and payments for denied meal and rest periods and other amounts. To attempt to support the UCL claim, Ms. Jeske notes allegations of "Defendant's violation of its statutory obligations. Such violations, because 'unlawful,' are sufficient . . ."

The complaint fails to establish that defendants engaged in unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business practices under the UCL. In the absence of violation of a borrowed law, a UCL claim fails, especially given the lack of reasonable particularity of facts to support a UCL claim. Reliance on other invalid claims alleged in the complaint fails to support a viable UCL claim. The UCL claim lacks particularity of fraudulent circumstances, such as a misrepresentation, for a UCL claim, especially given failure of fraud-sounding claims, as discussed above. The complaint lacks facts to hint at a wrong subject to the UCL to warrant the UCL claim's dismissal with leave to amend.

California Private Attorneys General Act

The complaint alleges 11 PAGA claims to pursue civil penalties for labor violations suffered by Ms. Jeske and "aggrieved employees." Section 2699(a) provides that a Labor [*34] Code civil penalty may "be recovered through a civil action brought by an aggrieved employee on behalf of himself or herself and other current or former employees." Section 2699(c) defines an "aggrieved employee" as "any person who was employed by the alleged violator and against whom one or more of the alleged violations was committed." "Recovery of civil penalties under the act requires proof of a Labor Code violation . . ." Arias v. Superior Court, 46 Cal.4th 969, 987, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 588, 209 P.3d 923 (2009) (citing Lab. Code, § 2699(a), (f)).

Defendants challenge Ms. Jeske's ability to prove that aggrieved employees have suffered a Labor Code violation.

PAGA Exhaustion

Defendants argue that Ms. Jeske "has not properly exhausted her administrative remedies" to warrant dismissal of the complaint's 11 PAGA claims.

Section 2699.3(a)(1) requires an aggrieved employee or representative to provide "written notice by certified mail to the Labor and Workforce Development Agency [("LWDA")]and the employer of the specific provisions of this code alleged to have been violated, including the facts and theories to support the alleged violation." Section 2699.3(a)(2)(A) requires up to 33 days notice to the LWDA prior [*35] to commencement of a civil action.

Defendants fault Ms. Jeske's LWDA notice's failure to "describe factually . . . the alleged practices and how they impacted the aggrieved employees or even who was responsible for the alleged practices - Maxim or its client Wasco State Prison. Defendants further fault the PAGA claims as "based only on bald allegations that fail to describe a common policy or practice" to satisfy F.R.Civ.P. 8. Defendants challenge as "evasive" Ms. Jeske's claims that she "cannot know but Defendants would know of their own violations" and that discovery will determine defendants' violations.

Ms. Jeske relies on the complaint's allegation that her counsel gave written notice to the LWDA and defendants "stating the code violations set forth below" and the August 16, 2011 letter of Ms. Jeske's counsel which Ms. Jeske characterizes as "sufficient notice of the facts and law upon which Defendants' violations are based." Ms. Jeske argues that her PAGA letter did not need to allege "who was responsible for the alleged practices."

Defendants offer broad challenges to Ms. Jeske's August 16, 2011 notice of Labor Code violations to the LWDA and defendants. Defendants do not explain [*36] how the notice fails to describe alleged practices. Defendants point to no particular portions of the 10-page notice, which outlines various alleged violations with statutory references. Defendants' imprecise attacks fail to substantiate a failure of PAGA exhaustion.

Scope Of Aggrieved Employees

Defendants challenge the complaint's scope and definition of aggrieved employees which Ms. Jeske seeks to represent in that "'aggrieved employees' have not been sufficiently identified." The complaint alleges that "aggrieved employees include all employees staffed by MHS [Maxim] at state and federal prisons and other facilities within the State of California." The complaint defines aggrieved employees as "[a]ll persons who were or are employed by Defendants in the State of California and against whom one or more of the alleged violations described below was committed."

Defendants argue that the complaint lacks "fair notice as to what the scope of the PAGA claims are" given the absence of "specificity as to who the persons are that the plaintiff seeks to represent." Defendants hold Ms. Jeske to "identify the 'aggrieved employees' beyond the statutory language," especially given that the complaint [*37] alleges that Ms. Jeske is an aggrieved employee as to only "some" of the labor violations.

Ms. Jeske responds that a PAGA plaintiff need not be an aggrieved employee for all alleged PAGA violations in that section 2699(c) uses the phrase "against whom one or more of the alleged violations was committed."

Ms. Jeske is correct that she need not have suffered all PAGA violations for which she seeks to pursue civil penalties. However, she ignores defendants' chief attack that the complaint fails to identify aggrieved employees beyond reference to their Maxim employment. The complaint is unclear as to whether it seeks to pursue PAGA claims for certified nursing assistants, such as Ms. Jeske, or other healthcare employees. The complaint fails to identify how particular aggrieved employees were subject to particular violations. Ms. Jeske fails to justify the complaint's overly broad scope of aggrieved employees. This Court is unable to sanction PAGA claims for imprecisely defined aggrieved employees but grants Ms. Jeske leave to amend to define precisely the aggrieved employees for whom she seeks to recover civil penalties.

PAGA Claim For Unpaid Wages

The complaint's eighth claim alleges that [*38] Maxim failed to pay "all wages" earned by Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees since they "were not paid meal and rest period wages, waiting time penalties and other compensation."

Defendants fault the claim in that "neither meal or rest period premiums nor waiting time penalties are due at certain intervals during employment." As a reminder, section 204(a) provides that wages "are due and payable twice during each calendar month, on days designated in advance by the employer as the regular paydays." Defendants fault the claim's failure to allege a section 204 violation.

Ms. Jeske argues that the (eighth) PAGA claim for unpaid wages sufficiently alleges a section 204 violation in that meal and rest period premiums are wages which must be paid at least semi-monthly.

The PAGA unpaid wages claim fails to delineate how Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees missed meal and rest periods and were entitled to waiting time penalties. The claim rests on mere conclusions to warrant its dismissal without prejudice.

PAGA Missed Meal And Rest Period Claims

The complaint's ninth and tenth claims allege that defendants committed labor violations by failing to provide Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees with required [*39] meal and rest periods, by requiring Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees to work during meal and rest periods, and by failing to pay the "premium" for failure to provide proper meal and rest periods. The claims allege that Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees are entitled to one additional hour of wage at the employee's regular rate of compensation for each workday during which the meal or rest period was not provided.

Defendants characterize the claims as "conclusory" in the absence of facts to describe Maxim's meal and rest period practices and "how or why [Ms. Jeske] or any aggrieved employees were allegedly not provided meal and rest periods." Defendants point to the absence of "any actual illegal conduct."

Defendants are correct that the PAGA missed meal and rest period claims are predicated on general allegations of mere failure to provide meal and rest periods. The complaint neither describes Maxim's practices to deny meal and rest periods nor articulates precisely how and when Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees were denied meal and rest periods. The (ninth and tenth) PAGA missed meal and rest period claims are subject to dismissal with leave to amend.

PAGA Inaccurate Records Claims

The [*40] complaint's eleventh through fifteenth claims allege that Maxim violated section 226(a) and failed to provide Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees:

1. A "statement of wages that accurately reported gross wages earned in so far as it failed to reflect all wages due for meal and rest period premiums";
2. A "statement of wages that accurately reported the total hours worked";
3. An "accurate statement of wages reporting the net wages actually earned" in that Maxim failed "to pay all wages due for meal and rest period premiums";
4. An "accurate statement of wages showing the name and address of the legal entity that is the employer"; and
5. An "accurate statement of wages showing the applicable hourly rates in effect during the pay period and the corresponding number of hours worked at each hourly rate."

Section 226(a) requires pay stubs of non-exempt employees to include gross and net wages earned, total hours worked, the name and address of the legal entity that is the employer, and all applicable hourly rates in effect during the pay period and the corresponding number of hours worked at each hourly rate by the employee.

Defendants attribute the complaint to parse section 226(a) requirements [*41] into "five separate causes of action" although there is only one penalty for a section 226 violation, not a penalty for each enumerated requirement for wage statements under section 226(a). Defendants note that section 226(e) assesses penalties "for a pay period, not for each missing element on the pay stub" in that it provides: "An employee suffering injury as a result of a knowing and intentional failure by an employer to comply with subdivision (a) is entitled to recover the greater of all actual damages or fifty dollars ($50) for the initial pay period in which a violation occurs and one hundred dollars ($100) per employee for each violation in a subsequent pay period, not exceeding an aggregate penalty of four thousand dollars ($4,000), and is entitled to an award of costs and reasonable attorney's fees."

Defendants fault the inaccurate records claims' failure to allege basic supporting facts and to "show who experienced these violations, when, how, or why." Defendants criticize the failure to explain "why the name and address of the employer was incorrect on the wage statement."

Ms. Jeske argues that a violation of a section 226(a) subdivision gives rise to a separate penalty under [*42] section 226.3, which provides: "Any employer who violates subdivision (a) of Section 226 shall be subject to a civil penalty in the amount of two hundred fifth dollars ($250) per employee per violation in an initial citation and one thousand dollars ($1,000) per employee for each violation in a subsequent citation . . ." Ms. Jeske characterizes defendants' reference to section 226(e) as irrelevant in that Ms. Jeske does not assert a section 226(e) claim.

Defendants raise valid points as to the conclusory nature of the inaccurate records claims lacking supporting facts. The claims merely point to section 226(a) requirements and claim they were not satisfied with nothing more. The claims lack necessary facts to demonstrate defendants' failure to satisfy section 226(a) requirements. In addition, Ms. Jeske's rejection of section 226(e) in favor of section 226.3 is curious since section 226.3 provides for civil penalties subject to Labor Commissioner enforcement by stating that "the Labor Commissioner shall take into consideration whether the violation was inadvertent . . ." Section 226(e), on the other hand, empowers an "employee suffering injury as a result of a knowing and intentional [*43] failure by the employer to comply with subdivision (a)" to seek recovery. Ms. Jeske fails to substantiate that section 226.3 prevails in place of section 226(e) and that she, rather than the Labor Commissioner, is entitled to pursue section 226.3 relief. The (eleventh through fifteenth) PAGA inaccurate records claims are subject to dismissal with leave to amend.

Suitable Seats

The complaint's sixteenth claim alleges that employees were required to unnecessarily stand in the absence of suitable chairs to violate California Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order 4-2001, Section 14 ("section 14"), which provides:

> (A) All working employees shall be provided with suitable seats when the nature of the work reasonably permits the use of seats.
> (B) When employees are not engaged in the active duties of their employment and the nature of the work requires standing, an adequate number of suitable seats shall be placed in reasonable proximity to the work area and employees shall be permitted to use such seats when it does not interfere with the performance of their duties.

The claim alleges that Maxim failed to provide proper seating to Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees "when the nature of their [*44] work permitted and required the use of proper seats" in that Maxim required employees "to monitor the activities of inmates through a small rectangular window" and "employees were either provided with unsuitable chairs, broken chairs or not chairs at all" and "were required to unnecessarily stand during work hours."

Relying on an administrative advisory opinion, defendants challenge section 14's application to Ms. Jeske's certified nursing assistant position in that section 14 "was not intended to cover those positions where the duties require employees to be on their feet." Defendants fault the claim's absence of facts that the nature of Ms. Jeske's work "reasonably permitted the use of seats" or that Maxim failed to provide her a seat. Defendants further challenge the complaint's absence of facts that Ms. Jeske requested, wanted or was denied a seat. Defendants conclude that Maxim is required to provide seats "to the extent that employees want or request them; Maxim is not required to ensure that every employee is given a seat."

The complaint fails to allege sufficient facts that the nature of Ms. Jeske's or aggrieved employees' work reasonably permits seats. The complaint appears [*45] to base the suitable seats claim on the mere allegation that employees were required to monitor employees through a small window and "unnecessarily stand." The claim lacks sufficient facts to support a section 14 claim to warrant its dismissal with leave to amend.

Adequate Temperature

The complaint's seventeenth claim alleges that Maxim failed to maintain an adequate working temperature to satisfy California Industrial Welfare Commission Wage Order 4-2001, Section 15 ("section 15") which provides:

> (A) The temperature maintained in each work area shall provide reasonable comfort consistent with industry-wide standards for the nature of the process and the work performed.
> (B) If excessive heat or humidity is created by the work process, the employer shall take all feasible means to reduce such excessive heat or humidity to a degree providing reasonable comfort. Where the nature of the employment requires a temperature of less than 60F, a heated room shall be provided to which employees may retire for warmth, and such room shall be maintained at not less that 68F.
> (C) A temperature of not less than 68F shall be maintained in the toilet rooms, resting rooms, and change rooms during hours of [*46] use.

The inadequate temperature claim alleges that the work environment temperature fell below "reasonable/acceptable standards" to require employees to wear heavy clothing and to bring in space heaters. The claim concludes that "nothing was done to remedy the problems with temperature."

Defendants fault the inadequate temperature claim's failure to allege facts that Maxim "had care, custody, or control of Wasco or could control the temperature." Defendants note the complaint's failure to explain "how or why the temperature was Wasco was not at reasonable/acceptable standards or was not consistent with industry-standards for the nature of the process and the work performed." Defendants criticize the absence of allegations as to inadequate temperatures at workplaces where other aggrieved employees were stationed.

The inadequate temperature claim generally alleges no more than a temperature to require heavy clothing and space heaters. The complaint lacks facts to demonstrate inadequate working temperatures, especially as to employees other than Ms. Jeske. Moreover, the complaint fails to explain how Maxim, as supplier of certified nursing assistants, had ability to control or address the [*47] temperature. The inadequate temperature claim is subject to dismissal with leave to amend.

Sanitary Restrooms

The complaint's eighteen claim alleges that Maxim violated section 2350 "by failing to provide proper sanitary restrooms" to require Ms. Jeske and aggrieved employees "to work in unsanitary conditions because of, among other things, the unkempt and unclean condition of the bathrooms at Wasco."

Section 2350 provides:

> Every factory, workshop, mercantile or other establishment in which one or more persons are employed, shall be kept clean and free from the effluvia arising from any drain or other nuisance, and shall be provided, within reasonable access, with a sufficient number of toilet facilities for the use of the employees. When there are five or more employees who are not all of the same gender, a sufficient number of separate toilet facilities shall be provided for the use of each sex, which shall be plainly so designated.

Defendants argue that there is no private right of action under section 2350 in that section 2355 provides that the California Labor Commissioner shall enforce Article 3 of the California Labor Code, which includes section 2350. Defendants contend that section 2350 [*48] fails to provide in "clear understandable, unmistakable terms" a private right of action. Defendants further note that section 2699.5 enumerates California Labor Code sections which may predicate PAGA violations and that section 2350 is missing. Defendants conclude "there can be no PAGA penalties for any alleged violation of section 2350."

Ms. Jeske does not dispute the absence of a private right of action under section 2350. This Court agrees with defendants that no private right of action exists under section 2350 to limit exposure to a PAGA claim. Ms. Jeske relies on section 2699.3(c) to permit a section 2350 PAGA claim in that section 2699.3(c) references "violation of any provision other than those listed in Section 2699.5." Ms. Jeske points to a viable avenue for a section 2350 PAGA claim to limit viability of a section 2350 claim under PAGA with no private right of action relief.

Class Action Prerequisites

Defendants contests the complaint's satisfaction of F.R.Civ.P. 23 prerequisites of class actions. F.R.Civ.P. 23(a) provides:

> One or more members of a class may sue . . . as representative parties on behalf of all members only if:
> (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all [*49] members is impracticable;
> (2) there are questions of law or fact common to the class;
> (3) the claims . . . of the representative parties are typical of the claims or defenses of the class; and
> (4) the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.

Defendants criticize the complaint's overbroad definition of "aggrieved employees" covering "every California employee employed by [Maxim] regardless of position, location, or duties." Defendants point to the absence of an "ascertainable class" bound by "common issues of fact and law" and the failure of Ms. Jeske's claims as "typical of those of the class." Defendants note that the complaint's "diverse claims will require individualized inquiries into specific facts pertaining to the employment of each of the allegedly aggrieved employees" to prevent "collective determination."

Ms. Jeske responds that her PAGA claims are "asserted on behalf of state law enforcement agencies, not individual employees" to avoid class action requirements. Ms. Jeske argues that as an employee bringing PAGA claims, she need not satisfy class action requirements. Ms. Jeske points to the California Supreme Court's holding in Arias, 46 Cal.4th at 975, 209 P.3d 923:

> We [*50] hold that an employee who, on behalf of himself and other employees, sues an employer under the unfair competition law (Bus. & Prof.Code, § 17200 et seq.) for Labor Code violations must satisfy class action requirements, but that those requirements need not be met when an employee's representative action against an employer is seeking civil penalties under the Labor Code Private Attorneys General Act of 2004 (Lab.Code, § 2698 et seq.).
> The California Supreme Court explained the rationale of its holding:
> An employee plaintiff suing, as here, under the Labor Code Private Attorneys General Act of 2004, does so as the proxy or agent of the state's labor law enforcement agencies. The act's declared purpose is to supplement enforcement actions by public agencies, which lack adequate resources to bring all such actions themselves. (Stats.2003, ch. 906, § 1 [Legislature's findings and declarations].) In a lawsuit brought under the act, the employee plaintiff represents the same legal right and interest as state labor law enforcement agencies—namely, recovery of civil penalties that otherwise would have been assessed and collected by the Labor Workforce Development Agency. (Lab.Code, § 2699, subds. (a), [*51] (f); see 95 Cal.Rptr.3d p. 596, 209 P.3d p. 930, ante.) The employee plaintiff may bring the action only after giving written notice to both the employer and the Labor and Workforce Development Agency (Lab.Code, § 2699.3, subd. (a)(1)), and 75 percent of any civil penalties recovered must be distributed to the Labor and Workforce Development Agency (id., § 2699, subd. (i)).
> . . . The act authorizes a representative action only for the purpose of seeking statutory penalties for Labor Code violations (Lab.Code, § 2699, subds. (a), (g)), and an action to recover civil penalties "is fundamentally a law enforcement action designed to protect the public and not to benefit private parties" (People v. Pacific Land Research Co. (1977) 20 Cal.3d 10, 17, 141 Cal.Rptr. 20, 569 P.2d 125).

Arias, 46 Cal. 4th 969, 986, 95 Cal. Rptr. 3d 588, 209 P.3d 923.

A fellow judge of this Court has noted the difference between a PAGA claim and a class action:

> A PAGA claim, therefore, is fundamentally different from a class action in terms of both the interests represented and the relief sought. In light of this essential disparity between the two types of claims, the California Supreme Court held that while actions under PAGA "may be [*52] brought as class actions," class certification is not mandatory. Id. at 981 n. 5, 95 Cal.Rptr.3d 588, 209 P.3d 923.

Mendez v. Tween Brands, Inc., 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 66454, 2010 WL 2650571, at *2 (E.D. Cal. 2010); see Machado v. M.A.T. & Sons Landscape, Inc., Case No. CV F 2:09-0459 JAM JFM, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 63414, *8 (E.D.Cal. July 23, 2009) ("Arias controls in federal court and PAGA claims need not be brought as class actions"); see also Franco v. Athens Disposal Co., Inc., 171 Cal.App.4th 1277, 1300, 90 Cal.Rptr.3d 539 (2009) (a PAGA claim "is fundamentally a law enforcement action designed to protect the public and penalize the employer for past illegal conduct. Restitution is not the primary object of a PAGA action, as it is in most class actions.")

Despite defendants' points to the contrary, the authorities are clear that PAGA claims are law enforcement actions, not class actions, to vitiate F.R.Civ.P. 23 adherence since a PAGA plaintiff brings claims as "the proxy or agent of the state's labor law enforcement agencies." Arias, 95 Cal.Rptr.3d 588, 209 P.3d at 933. The remedy sought in a PAGA suit consists of civil penalties, not individual or class damages. Cal. Lab.Code § 2699(a). This Court disagrees with defendants' notion that [*53] F.R.Civ.P. 23 trumps PAGA as a procedural statute. In effect, defendants ask this Court to ignore the California Supreme Court's holding in Arias as well as other courts' application of Arias. This Court will not hold Ms. Jeske to strict F.R.Civ.P. 23 prerequisites.

Relying on the general purposes of PAGA claims, Ms. Jeske argues that she "is not required to specifically allege the identity of the aggrieved employees who have been the subject of the unlawful employment practices." Ms.

Jeske points to section 2699(a) which permits recovery of civil penalties "through a civil action brought by an aggrieved employee on behalf of himself or herself and other current or former employees . . ." (Bold added.) Ms. Jeske argues that section 2699(a) "does not limit the employees on whose behalf a PAGA action may be brought to employees with the same job classification, or employees who were subject to the same violations." Ms. Jeske claims inability "to specifically allege each and every violation as to each and every group of employees at the pleading stage" without discovery.

Defendants respond that Ms. Jeske's "overbroad definition of 'aggrieved employees' essentially creates a class with no [*54] limits and threatens to give rise to costly and burdensome discovery as the parties dispute class boundaries."

Other than section 2699(a), Ms. Jeske points to no precise authority to support her imprecise scope of aggrieved employees. As such, Ms. Jeske takes the legally unsupported position that she is entitled to pursue PAGA claims for the universe of Maxim employees. Such position contravenes federal pleading requirements to provide defendants sufficient notice of the claims against them. Ms. Jeske's entitlement to pursue claims for current and former employees must be balanced with an ascertainable scope of aggrieved employees, presumably Maxim healthcare workers employed at Wasco. The complaints lacks sufficient definition of the scope of aggrieved employees, and Ms. Jeske is granted leave to amend to do so.

Ms. Jeske's UCL Claim Against Individual Defendants

The complaint's (sixth) UCL claim is asserted against Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship for Ms. Jeske. Defendants fault the absence of underlying meal and rest period violation claims against Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship to support a UCL claim against them. Defendants further note that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship are not [*55] subject to individual liability for Maxim's failure to pay wages. See Jones v. Gregory, 137 Cal.App.4th 798, 800, 807, 40 Cal.Rptr.3d 581 (2006) ("California law does not support imposing personal liability on corporate officers or agents as 'employers'" in that "a corporate officer or agent does not employ employees—the corporation does"); Reynolds v. Bement,36 Cal.4th 1075, 1087,32 Cal. Rptr. 3d 483, 116 P.3d 1162 (2005) ("corporate agents acting within the scope of their agency are not personally liable for the corporate employer's failure to pay its employees' wages"). Defendants continue that despite Mr. Tagayun's and Ms. Blankenship's alleged exercise over Ms. Jeske's wages, such control does not "convert" them into employers.

Defendants raise valid points. The complaint merely alleges that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship are managers/supervisors. No facts are present to connect Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship to Maxim control over meal and rest break policies and practices. The complaint at most raises inferences that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship carried out Maxim meal and rest break policies and practices. Ms. Jeske offers no meaningful opposition to dismissal of the UCL claims against Mr. Tagayun [*56] and Ms. Blankenship. The complaint lacks facts of Mr. Tagayun's and Ms. Blankenship's alleged wrongs to warrant dismissal of the UCL claim against Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship with prejudice.

PAGA Claims Against Individual Defendants

The complaint's (ninth and tenth) PAGA meal and rest period violations claims are asserted against Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship for the aggrieved employees to seek civil penalties. Defendants fault the complaint's absence of allegations that Mr. Tagayun or Ms. Blankenship had "control or responsibility for the aggrieved employees."

The complaint identifies Mr. Tagayun as "an account manager/supervisor of Jeske" and Ms. Blankenship as "the manager/supervisor of Jeske." The complaint's general allegations state that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship:

1. Are Maxim "managing agents, employees, executives, officers and/or directors";
2. "[E]xercised control over the wages of employees"; and
3. "[D]esigned and implemented policies regarding meal and rest breaks, working hours an deductions."

The PAGA meal and rest period violations claims allege that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship "controlled the working conditions of the aggrieved employees, including but not [*57] limited to meal and rest breaks."

Defendants criticize the complaint's failure to allege facts that Mr. Tagayun or Ms. Blankenship are owners, officers or corporate agents or "are responsible for the working conditions of all aggrieved employees." Defendants point to the lack of allegations of Mr. Tagayun's and Ms. Blankenship's direct causing of labor violations. Defendants hold Ms. Jeske to allege facts that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship "held positions or committed acts that would render them personally liable for PAGA penalties and wage and hour violations."

Ms. Jeske points to section 558, which subjects to civil penalty an employer "or other person acting on behalf of an employer" who commits or causes wage and hour violations. However, without specific facts of Mr. Tagayun's and Ms. Blankenship's wrongful conduct, reliance on section 558 is unavailing. The complaint lacks facts that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship acted on Maxim's behalf to cause wage and hour violations. The complaint merely alleges that Mr. Tagayun and Ms. Blankenship are managers/supervisors. Nonetheless, Ms. Jeske is granted leave to amend to allege facts to satisfy section 558 requirements as to Mr. Tagayun [*58] and Ms. Blankenship.

CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For the reasons discussed above, this Court:

1. DISMISSES with prejudice the complaint's (first) unpaid wages claim;
2. DISMISSES without prejudice the complaint's (second) meal period premiums claim;
3. DISMISSES without prejudice the complaint's (third) rest period premiums claim;
4. DISMISSES without prejudice the complaint's (fourth) waiting time penalties claim;
5. DISMISSES with prejudice the complaint's (fifth) fraud - deceit and misrepresentation claim;

This Court lacks the time and resources to re-do its work of educating the parties on pleadings and to address attacks on adequate, yet imperfect pleadings. The professionalism of the parties' respective counsel is expected.

Due to bearing the heaviest caseload in the nation with the recent retirement of former U.S. District Judge Oliver Wanger, limited resources, and the need to prioritize criminal and older civil [*60] matters over more recently filed actions, this Court ADMONISHES the parties that it is unable to commit to address this action to meet the parties' needs and expectations. As such, this Court urges the parties to consider the conduct of all further proceedings by a U.S. Magistrate Judge, whose caseload and availability is more accommodating to the parties. Forms to consent to a U.S. Magistrate Judge are available on this Court's website.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

HN3[] Jurors, Misconduct

Whether jury misconduct occurred and caused injury is a question of fact for the trial court. To obtain a new trial based on juror misconduct, an appellant must show (1) the misconduct occurred, (2) it was material, and (3) it probably caused injury. Tex. R. Civ. P. 327. A motion for new trial based upon jury misconduct must be supported by a juror's affidavit alleging that outside influences were brought to bear upon the jury. Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b).

Civil Procedure > ... > Jury Trials > Jurors > Misconduct

HN4[] Jurors, Misconduct

An outside influence must emanate from outside the jury and its deliberations. An outside influence does not include information not in evidence, unknown to the jurors prior to trial, acquired by a juror and communicated to one or more other jurors between the time the jurors received their instructions from the court and the rendition of the verdict and does not include information gathered by a juror and introduced to the other jurors by that juror, even if the information were introduced specifically to prejudice the vote. In sum, under this rule, a juror may testify about improper contacts with individuals outside the jury or matters or statements not occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations. However, a juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon his or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing him to assent to or dissent from the verdict concerning his mental processes in connection therewith, Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b).

HN6[] Jurors, Misconduct

Personal pressures felt by jurors to wrap up the deliberations do not constitute outside influences.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jury Trials > Jurors > Misconduct

HN7[] Jurors, Misconduct

Holding that internet research does not constitute an outside influence is consistent with the general rule that information gathered by a juror and introduced to the other jurors by that juror, even if the information were introduced to prejudice the vote, does not add up to outside influence.

Civil Procedure > ... > Jury Trials > Jurors > Misconduct

HN8[] Jurors, Misconduct

Where affidavits do not raise outside influence, the trial court is not required to receive the juror affidavits or testimony.

Civil Procedure > ... > Standards of Review > Substantial Evidence > Sufficiency of Evidence

HN9[] Substantial Evidence, Sufficiency of Evidence

When a party attacks the legal sufficiency of an adverse finding on an issue on which it has the burden of proof, that party must demonstrate on appeal that the evidence establishes, as a matter of law, all vital facts in support of the issue. When an appellant attacks the legal sufficiency of an adverse finding on an issue for which it did not have the burden of proof, the appellant must demonstrate that there is no evidence to support the adverse finding. Such a no-evidence challenge will be sustained only if: (1) there is a complete absence of evidence of a vital fact; (2) the court is barred by rules of law or of evidence from giving weight to the only evidence offered to prove a vital fact; (3) the evidence offered to prove a vital fact is no more than a mere scintilla; or (4) the evidence establishes conclusively the opposite of a vital fact. In conducting a legal sufficiency review, the court reviews the evidence presented at trial in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict and indulges every reasonable inference that would support it, crediting favorable evidence if reasonable jurors could and disregarding contrary evidence unless reasonable jurors could not. The final test for legal sufficiency must always be whether the evidence at trial would enable reasonable and fair-minded people to reach the verdict under review.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Clearly Erroneous Review

Civil Procedure > ... > Standards of Review > Substantial Evidence > Sufficiency of Evidence

HN10[] Standards of Review, Clearly Erroneous Review

In reviewing a factual-sufficiency challenge to a jury finding on an issue on which the appellant had the burden of proof, the appellant must show that the adverse finding is against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. In reviewing a factual-sufficiency challenge to a jury finding on an issue on which the appellant did not have the burden of proof, the court considers and weighs all of the evidence and sets aside the verdict only if the evidence that supports the jury finding is so weak as to make the verdict clearly wrong and manifestly unjust. In either type of factual-sufficiency challenge, the court must examine both the evidence supporting and that contrary to the judgment. Additionally, the jury is the sole judge of witnesses credibility, and it may choose to believe one witness over another; a reviewing court may not impose its own opinion to the contrary.

The Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act (TFEAA) provides that every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade is unlawful. In order to establish a violation of *Tex. Bus. & Com. To show a concerted action by two or more persons to illegally restrain trade, a plaintiff faces the threshold requirement of identifying a co-conspirator. Moreover, a company cannot conspire with its own employees as a matter of law. And one cannot sustain an action under § 15.05(a) of the TFEAA regarding conspiracies or combinations in restraint of trade when he has not provided any evidence that the defendant engaged in any concerted action with any other independent entity. Opinion

[*323] Opinion by Justice Rodriguez

This is a commercial dispute between appellants, Editorial Caballero, S.A. de C.V. (EC) and Grupo Siete International, Inc. (GSI), and appellee, Playboy Enterprises, Inc. (PEI). For over twenty years EC published and distributed a Spanish language version of Playboy magazine in Mexico and other Latin American countries. In October 1996, PEI and EC entered into a licensing agreement (License Agreement) that provided, in relevant part, that EC could publish a Spanish language version of Playboy for distribution in the United States. GSI was EC's assignee of the U.S. distribution rights to the Spanish language version of Playboy. In January 1998, PEI terminated the License Agreement because EC and GSI allegedly failed to pay certain monies due under the License Agreement and under a Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement. EC and GSI claimed that PEI caused the failure of the project. Suit was filed. EC and GSI filed claims against PEI, and PEI filed counter-claims against EC and GSI. The case was tried twice [2] to a jury.

Following the first trial, EC and GSI appealed. See Playboy Enter., Inc. v. Editorial Caballero, S.A. de C.V., 202 S.W.3d 250, 276 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 2006, pet. denied) (Playboy I). In Playboy I, this Court rendered judgment against EC and GSI on all claims except breach of contract and fraudulent concealment, remanding those claims for a new trial. Id. We also remanded all claims asserted by PEI against EC and GSI. Id.

The second trial, the judgment from which this appeal is taken, began on March 31, 2010. Rejecting PEI's argument that our 2006 decision and the law of the case doctrine precluded many of EC and GSI's claims, the trial court submitted EC and GSI's claims against PEI for breach of the License Agreement, common law fraud, statutory fraud, antitrust violations, and theft. In addition, the trial court submitted PEI's claims against EC and GSI for breach of the License Agreement, breach of the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement, and fraud. The jury found against EC and GSI on their claims and in favor of PEI on its claims. The trial court entered judgment in favor of PEI and awarded breach-of-contract damages in the amount of $410,000.[1] It also awarded $1,680,000 [3] in attorneys' fees, $500,000 in conditional appellate attorneys' fees, and interest. Following the entry of judgment in PEI's [*324] favor and the denial of EC and GSI's post-judgment motions, EC and GSI appealed.

By three issues, with multiple sub-issues, EC and GSI contend that (1) they are entitled to a new trial based on jury misconduct; and (2-3) the evidence is insufficient to support the adverse jury findings. We affirm.

I. JURY MISCONDUCT

[1] The jury also awarded fraud damages against EC and GSI, but PEI elected to recover on its contract claims instead.

By their first issue, EC and GSI contend that the trial court abused its discretion when it denied their motion for new trial based, in part, on allegations of material jury misconduct that caused injury. The jury returned a 10-2 verdict. EC and GSI argue that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to (1) admit and rely on affidavits from the two dissenting jurors; (2) hear live testimony from any of the jurors, especially the two juror affiants; and (3) grant a new trial based on juror misconduct. PEI responds that the juror affidavits did not contain competent, admissible evidence of jury misconduct, and its objections to those [4] affidavits were properly sustained. We agree with PEI.

A. Standard of Review and Applicable Law

HN1[] We review a trial court's ruling on a motion for new trial based on jury misconduct for an abuse of discretion. Vela v. Wagner & Brown, Ltd., 203 S.W.3d 37, 48 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2006, no pet.) (op. on reh'g). HN2[] An abuse of discretion will be found when the trial court's ruling is arbitrary, unreasonable, or without reference to guiding principles. Goode v. Shoukfeh, 943 S.W.2d 441, 446 (Tex. 1997).

HN3[] Whether jury misconduct occurred and caused injury is a question of fact for the trial court. Golden Eagle Archery, Inc. v. Jackson, 24 S.W.3d 362, 372 (Tex. 2000). To obtain a new trial based on juror misconduct, an appellant must show (1) the misconduct occurred, (2) it was material, and (3) it probably caused injury. Tex. R. Civ. P. 327; Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 372. A motion for new trial based upon jury misconduct must be supported by a juror's affidavit alleging that outside influences were brought to bear upon the jury. Weaver v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 739 S.W.2d 23, 24 (Tex. 1987) (per curiam); see Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b); see also Tex. R. Evid. 606(b).

HN4[] An outside influence [5] "must emanate from outside the jury and its deliberations." Soliz v. Saenz, 779 S.W.2d 929, 931-32 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1989, writ denied); see Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 370; King v. Bauer, 767 S.W.2d 197, 198 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 1989, writ denied). An outside influence does not include "information not in evidence, unknown to the jurors prior to trial, acquired by a juror and communicated to one or more other jurors between the time the jurors received their instructions from the court and the rendition of the verdict" and does not include "[i]nformation gathered by a juror and introduced to the other jurors by that juror, even if the information were introduced specifically to prejudice the vote . . . ." Soliz, 779 S.W.2d at 932; see, e.g., King, 767 S.W.2d at 198 (holding that "discussion of newspaper articles is not considered an outside influence"). In sum, under this rule, a juror may testify about "improper contacts with individuals outside the jury" or "matters or statements not occurring during the course of the jury's deliberations." Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 370. However, "[a] juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during [6] the course of the jury's deliberations or to the effect of anything upon his or any other juror's mind or emotions as influencing him to assent to or dissent from the verdict concerning his mental processes in [*325] connection therewith, ..." Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b); see Tex. R. Evid. 606(b) (HN5[] "[A] juror may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the jury's deliberations, or to the effect of anything on any juror's mind or emotions or mental processes, as influencing any juror's assent to or dissent from the verdict."); Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 370.

B. Discussion

1. Affidavits

In support of their jury misconduct allegations in their motion for new trial, EC and GSI attached the affidavits of the two dissenting jurors. The affidavits set out the following three instances that allegedly occurred during jury deliberations:

$ One juror reported to other jurors that she had been informed of a death in her family, and she switched her vote in order to conclude the deliberations more quickly;

$ Another juror admitted that he read on the internet the appellate decision concerning the first trial of this case; and

$ [7] A third juror stated that he knew that the Sanchez family[2] had a lot of money and that his (the juror's) sister was an attorney.

a. Death in Juror's Family

HN6[] Personal pressures felt by jurors to wrap up the deliberations do not constitute outside influences. See, e.g., Rosell v. Cent. W. Motor Stages, Inc., 89 S.W.3d 643, 660-61 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2002, pet. denied) (explaining that a statement by the bailiff to jurors that they would have to deliberate another day if they told the court that they were deadlocked was not outside influence); Perry v. Safeco Ins. Co., 821 S.W.2d 279, 281 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1991, writ denied) (concluding that family pressure to go on vacation was not outside influence); Kirby Forest Indus., Inc. v. Kirkland, 772 S.W.2d 226, 234 (Tex. App.—Houston [14th Dist.] 1989, writ denied) (holding that [8] pressure from employers to return to work, and family, recreational, and personal pressures are not outside influences). The trial court could have reasonably determined that the portions of the jurors' affidavits discussing another juror's statements about a death in her family related to the effect of the death on the juror's mind or emotions or mental processes, as influencing her assent to or dissent from the verdict. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b); Tex. R. Evid. 606(b); Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 370; Goode, 943 S.W.2d at 446. Therefore, misconduct did not occur, and the trial court could have concluded that the affidavits were incompetent and inadmissible in this regard.

b. Appellate Decision Read on the Internet

The trial court could have made the same determination regarding the portion of one juror's affidavit explaining that another juror said, during deliberations, that he had read the appellate decision involving the first trial. The affidavit which stated that the juror read the decision on the internet, implies internet research. The affidavit did not state, however, that the juror said anything more about the opinion.

[*326] In a criminal context, this Court recently decided [9] the issue of whether internet research constitutes an "outside influence." *See McQuarrie v. State, No. 13-09-00233-CR, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2859, at 13-18 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi Apr. 14, 2011, pet. granted) (mem. op., not designated for publication) (citing Soliz, 779 S.W.2d at 931-32).[3] In McQuarrie, we held that "independent research on the internet [conducted by a juror] during an overnight recess and conveyed . . . to the other jurors during deliberations the next morning" did not constitute an outside influence. Id.; *see Mathis v. State, No. 05-05-01119-CR, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 4645, at 24-27 (Tex. App.—Dallas May 31, 2006, no pet.) (not designated for publication) (holding internet research did not constitute an outside influence); *Johnson v. State, No. 08-05-00017-CR, 2006 Tex. App. LEXIS 8618, at 7-8 (Tex. App.—El Paso Oct. 5, 2006, no pet.) (not designated for publication) (concluding that information found on a computer system was not an outside influence); see also Lucero v. State, 246 S.W.3d 86, 95 (Tex. Crim. App. 2008) (noting that the State relied primarily on civil cases in support of its position "that the Bible reading [by the jury foreman during jury deliberations] [10] was not an "outside influence" and that appellant was, therefore, improperly attempting to impeach the jury's verdict under Rule 606(b)") (citing Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 366-75 (rules contemplate that an "outside influence" originates from sources other than the jurors themselves); Brandt v. Surber, 194 S.W. 3d 108, 134 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 2006, pet. denied) (a jury's discussion of newspaper articles is not an "outside influence"); Easly v. State, 163 S.W.3d 839, 842 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2005, no pet.) (a chart brought into jury room with calculations of time appellant would serve in prison after application of the parole laws is not an "outside influence"); Perry, 821 S.W.2d at 281 (juror using dictionary to share a definition with other jurors is not an "outside influence")). In McQuarrie, we also held that "the trial court properly excluded the affidavits and testimony" of the jurors because the affidavits did not contain any evidence of outside influence and that the trial court "did not abuse its discretion in denying [plaintiff's] motion for new trial on this basis." *2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 2859, at 17.

[2] At trial, Marco Antonio Sanchez described the Sanchez family business as a medium-size media company in Mexico. In late 1977, the Sanchez family acquired EC, known at that time as Caballero Con Le Mejor de Playboy. Marco's father, Javier Sanchez, was the president of EC who, on EC's behalf, executed the License Agreement that forms the basis of this lawsuit.

[3] The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals recently granted petition [11] in In re McQuarrie, without oral argument, on the following issue: Did the court of appeals violate McQuarrie's federal and state constitutional right to confrontation and cross-examination by upholding the trial court's exclusion, pursuant to Texas Rule of Evidence 606(b), of juror testimony and affidavits offered for purposes of his motion for new trial on the ground that a juror conveyed to other jurors harmful information obtained from her internet research during an overnight break in deliberations? *No. PD-0803-11, 2011 Tex. Crim. App. LEXIS 1517, at 1 (Tex. Crim. App. Nov. 16, 2011).

HN7[] Holding that internet research does not constitute an outside influence is also consistent with the general rule that "[i]nformation gathered by a juror and introduced to the other jurors by that juror, even if the information were introduced to prejudice the vote, does not add up to outside influence." Soliz, 779 S.W.2d at 932; see Brandt, 194 S.W.3d at 134 ("[One juror's] affidavit stating that other jurors discussed newspaper articles during deliberations was not evidence of any outside influence, but only described matters on the minds of other jurors during deliberations. The affidavit is, therefore, [12] incompetent to serve as evidence of juror misconduct."). The trial court could have [*327] reasoned that evidence of a juror reviewing this Court's earlier opinion found on the internet, without more, described only matters on the mind of this juror during deliberations. Thus, it could have concluded that the affidavit was incompetent on this basis as well. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b); Tex. R. Evid. 606(b).

c. Information Regarding the Sanchez Family and the Jury Foreman's Sister

The same analysis applies to EC and GSI's supporting affidavits setting out that "the jury foreman stated during jury deliberations that he knew the Sanchez family had a lot of money" and that "the jury foreman . . . sa[id] that his sister is an attorney and that he knew both the business and financial background of the Sanchez family." Once again, the trial court could have determined that these statements proffered by EC and GSI through the affidavits are incompetent and inadmissible because they occurred during deliberations and do "not add up to outside influence." Soliz, 779 S.W.2d at 932. The trial court could have, therefore, concluded that these statements from the affidavits describe only matters on the mind [13] of another juror during deliberations. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(b); Tex. R. Evid. 606(b); Brandt, 194 S.W.3d at 134.

2. Evidentiary Hearing

EC and GSI also argue that when an affidavit avers misconduct, the language of rule 327(a) requires that the trial court grant an evidentiary hearing. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(a) ("When the ground of a motion for new trial, supported by affidavit, is misconduct of the jury . . . the court shall hear evidence thereof from the jury or others in open court . . . ."). EC and GSI contend that, in this case, the trial court abused its discretion when it did not hold such a hearing.

In support of this argument, EC and GSI rely on Sharpless v. Sim. See 209 S.W.3d 825, 828 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2006, pet. denied). In Sharpless, a verdict for the plaintiff was entered in a double fatality driving accident. Id. at 827. After the verdict, the parties learned that one of the jurors had conducted her own independent internet research of the defendant's driving record. Id. After conducting an evidentiary hearing, the trial court denied the defendant's motion for new trial based upon jury misconduct. Id. EC and GSI argue that Sharpless demonstrates the necessity of an [14] evidentiary hearing when proof is adduced that a juror improperly conducted research on the internet.

However, the Sharples Court did not consider whether an evidentiary hearing on jury misconduct is mandatory or whether internet research constitutes an outside influence because neither party disputed these matters. See id. at 827-28. Rather, the Sharpless Court conducted an unchallenged hearing and considered only whether the internet research caused injury. Id. (citing Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(a); Golden Eagle Archery, 24 S.W.3d at 372). Finding none, the court concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it determined that Sharpless and Southwestern failed to discharge their burden under rule 327(a). See id. at 829. Sharpless is, thus, distinguishable from the present case and provides no support for EC and GSI's evidentiary hearing argument.

Moreover, while we agree with EC and GSI's basic contention that when an affidavit avers jury misconduct the trial court should grant an evidentiary hearing, in this case we have already concluded that the affidavits attached to EC and GSI's motion for new trial provided no evidence of an outside influence. See Tex. R. Civ. P. 327(a); [15] King, 767 S.W.2d at 198-99 (concluding [*328] trial court did not err in refusing to consider the juror's testimony concerning jury misconduct which included reading outside newspaper accounts because her affidavit did not raise an outside-influence issue); see also de *Damian v. Bell Helicopter Textron, Inc., No. 02-08-00210-CV, 352 S.W.3d 124, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 7316, at 91-95 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth Aug. 31, 2011, pet. dism'd) (concluding that HN8[] where affidavits did not raise outside influence, the trial court was not required to receive juror affidavits or testimony); *Davis v. BNSF Ry. Co., No. 10-09-00309-CV, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 8201, at 8 (Tex. App.—Waco Oct. 6, 2010, pet. denied) (mem. op.) (holding that affidavits filed in support of a motion for new trial were insufficient to require an evidentiary hearing because they raised "only speculation of possible outside influence"; therefore, the trial court did not err in quashing subpoenas of jurors); *WPS, Inc. v. Enervest Operating, L.L.C., No. 01-06-00759-CV, 2010 Tex. App. LEXIS 4233, at 51-53 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] May 28, 2010, pet. denied) (mem. op. on reh'g) (upholding the striking of juror affidavits regarding juror misconduct under rule 327(b) [16] and rule 606(b) because the affidavits were "patently inadmissible" which was implicitly acknowledged by WPS in its brief); *Villegas v. State, No. 13-05-371-CR, 2008 Tex. App. LEXIS 1899, at 40-46 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi Mar. 13, 2008, pet. denied) (mem. op., not designated for publication) (determining that when a juror affidavit failed to establish outside influence, a juror could not testify about what happened during deliberations, and the trial court did not err in striking juror affidavits). Because the affidavits did not aver jury misconduct, the trial court did not err in refusing to consider the affidavits or the testimony of the jurors at a hearing.

3. Summary

Based on the above, the matters set out in the affidavits did not constitute improper outside influences warranting a new trial under Texas law. Because EC and GSI submitted no evidence tending to show juror misconduct, the trial court properly sustained PEI's objections to the affidavits, properly struck the affidavits, and properly denied EC and GSI's request for an evidentiary hearing. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in so concluding and, further, did not abuse its discretion in denying EC and GSI's [17] motion for new trial on that basis. We overrule EC and GSI's first issue.

II. EVIDENTIARY CHALLENGES TO ADVERSE FINDINGS

By their second and third issues, EC and GSI challenge every adverse jury finding, most of which are challenges to the sufficiency of the evidence.

A. Standard of Review for Sufficiency Challenges

HN9[] "When a party attacks the legal sufficiency of an adverse finding on an issue on which [it] has the burden of proof, [that party] must demonstrate on appeal that the evidence establishes, as a matter of law, all vital facts in support of the issue." Dow Chem. Co. v. Francis, 46 S.W.3d 237, 241 (Tex. 2001) (per curiam). When an appellant attacks the legal sufficiency of an adverse finding on an issue for which it did not have the burden of proof, the appellant must demonstrate that there is no evidence to support the adverse finding. City of Keller v. Wilson, 168 S.W.3d 802, 810 (Tex. 2005); Croucher v. Croucher, 660 S.W.2d 55, 58 (Tex. 1983). Such a no-evidence challenge will be sustained only if: (1) there is a complete absence of evidence of a vital fact; (2) the court is barred by rules of law or of evidence from [*329] giving weight to the only evidence offered to prove a vital [18] fact; (3) the evidence offered to prove a vital fact is no more than a mere scintilla; or (4) the evidence establishes conclusively the opposite of a vital fact. City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 810; King Ranch, Inc. v. Chapman, 118 S.W.3d 742, 751 (Tex. 2003) (quoting Merrell Dow Pharms., Inc. v. Havner, 953 S.W.2d 706, 711 (Tex. 1997)). In conducting a legal sufficiency review, we review the evidence presented at trial in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict and indulge every reasonable inference that would support it, crediting favorable evidence if reasonable jurors could and disregarding contrary evidence unless reasonable jurors could not. Del Lago Partners, Inc. v. Smith, 307 S.W.3d 762, 770 (Tex. 2010); City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 822, 827. "The final test for legal sufficiency must always be whether the evidence at trial would enable reasonable and fair-minded people to reach the verdict under review." City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827.

HN10[] In reviewing a factual-sufficiency challenge to a jury finding on an issue on which the appellant had the burden of proof, the appellant must show that "the adverse finding is against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence." [19] Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 242. In reviewing a factual-sufficiency challenge to a jury finding on an issue on which the appellant did not have the burden of proof, we consider and weigh all of the evidence and set aside the verdict only if the evidence that supports the jury finding is so weak as to make the verdict clearly wrong and manifestly unjust. Cain v. Bain, 709 S.W.2d 175, 176 (Tex. 1986) (per curiam); Ins. Network of Tex. v. Kloesel, 266 S.W.3d 456, 469-70 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi 2008, pet. denied); Bay, Inc. v. Ramos, 139 S.W.3d 322, 329 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2004, pet. denied) (en banc). In either type of factual-sufficiency challenge, we must examine both the evidence supporting and that contrary to the judgment. See Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 242; Plas-Tex, Inc. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 772 S.W.2d 442, 445 (Tex. 1989). Additionally, the jury is the sole judge of witnesses' credibility, and it may choose to believe one witness over another; a reviewing court may not impose its own opinion to the contrary. See Golden Eagle Archery, 116 S.W.3d at 761.

B. EC and GSI's Claims Against PEI

By their second issue, EC and GSI argue that the evidence is legally insufficient to support [20] the jury's adverse findings on the following issues: (1) breach of the License Agreement; (2) common law fraud; (3) statutory fraud; (4) an antitrust violation; and (5) theft of property, a service, or trade secrets.[4] Because EC and [*330] GSI asserted these claims against PEI, they had the burden of proof on all related evidentiary issues.

1. Breach of the License Agreement

EC and GSI argue that the evidence is legally insufficient to support the jury's finding that PEI did not fail to comply with the License Agreement. They contend that there is undisputed and conclusive evidence that PEI breached the License Agreement in the following ways: (1) by failing to provide them with certain written information as required by Paragraph 8a of the Licensing Agreement; (2) by first agreeing to allow a monthly distribution of 225,000 copies

[4] Although EC and GSI title their second issue a "factually insufficient and/or against the overwhelming weight of the evidence" issue, factual sufficiency is not raised in the body of their brief. Rather, the substance of this issue is based only on legal sufficiency principles, and we will review the second issue accordingly. Compare HN11[] Tex. R. App. P. 47.1 ("The court of appeals must hand down a written opinion that is as brief as practicable but that addresses every issue raised and necessary to final disposition of the appeal."), and Martinez v. El Paso County, 218 S.W.3d 841, 844 (Tex. App.—El Paso 2007, pet. dism'd) ("When reviewing a civil matter, an appellate court has no discretion to consider an issue not raised in the appellant's brief."), with Tex. R. App. P. 38.1(f) ("The statement of an issue or point will be treated as covering every subsidiary [21] question that is fairly included."), and Hagberg v. City of Pasadena, 224 S.W.3d 477, 480 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 2007, no pet.) (providing that even though a specific point may not be recited within a statement of issues presented, that point is not waived if raised within the body of the brief). Nonetheless, to the extent the second issue could be construed as a challenge to the factual sufficiency of the evidence, under the proper standard of review we would further conclude that the adverse findings were not against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. See Dow Chem. Co. v. Francis, 46 S.W.3d 237, 242 (Tex. 2001) (per curiam).

into the U.S. and then unilaterally refusing [22] to allow any more than 39,950 copies for monthly distribution; and (3) by not complying with its contractual obligation of good faith and fair dealing.

a. Internal Memoranda

EC and GSI assert that PEI breached the last sentence of Paragraph 8a of the License Agreement which states, "In the event Licensor does not approve any aspect of the Foreign Edition, Special Issues or Calendar, Licensor [PEI] will advise Licensee [ES and GSI] in what respect any such aspect is unacceptable." EC and GSI complain that PEI breached this provision because it did not provide them with certain written internal memoranda dated December 9, 1996, February 4, 1997, and February 7, 1997—memoranda from Hugh Hefner to Playboy executives expressing his general concerns about a Spanish edition of Playboy being distributed in the U.S.[5] We disagree.

Paragraph 8a, in its entirety, provides the following:

> Licensee acknowledges that Licensor has an interest in maintaining the worldwide goodwill and recognition of the Trademarks and in being assured that the Foreign Edition, Special Issues, and Calendars correspond as closely as possible in quality, format and content to their American counterparts; and Licensor acknowledges that Licensee has [24] an interest in maintaining a quality that meets its standards and in producing a Foreign Edition, Special Issues and Calendars that meet the needs of the relevant market. For the foregoing reasons, it is agreed that both Licensor, or its authorized representative, and Licensee must approve in writing (by initialing where appropriate) in advance of publication, all aspects of each issue of [*331] the Foreign Edition, and each and every Special Issue and Calendar, including but not limited to, all aspects of advertising (including advertisers, products advertised, advertising copy, sales practices and terms), all editorial text (whether originating in the U.S.A., the Territory, or elsewhere, including translations), all photographs and cartoons, all aspects of editorial design and structure (including design, artwork, layout and design and copy lines of the front cover), all aspects of manufacturing and production (including paper, printing and binding), all advertisements, publicity and promotional material regarding the Foreign Edition, Special Issues and Calendars (including advance information to be given to news media) and all aspects of distribution (including the cover price and discount [25] for newsstand sale and subscription prices). In the event Licensor does not approve any aspect of the Foreign Edition, Special Issues or Calendar, Licensor will advise Licensee in what respect any such aspect is unacceptable.

EC and GSI contend that, in addition to Paragraph 8a's required pre-publication, written approval of all aspects of each issue, through Paragraph 17 of the License Agreement, Licensor PEI was to provide written notice of its disapproval of any such aspect. Paragraph 17 provided that "[a]ll legal notices, consents, and other communications required by the terms of this agreement . . . shall be in writing."

It is undisputed that Paragraph 8a provided for pre-publication, written approval of aspects of each issue or edition. Pursuant to Paragraph 8a, the specific aspects of distribution that required such approval included the cover price, any discounts for newsstand sales, and the subscription price. And, assuming without deciding that the last sentence of Paragraph 8a through Paragraph 17 required PEI to advise EC and GSI, in writing, of any unacceptable aspects, the question becomes, did the evidence establish that the Hugh Hefner written memoranda

[5] Hugh Hefner sent a December 9, 1996 memo to Christie Hefner, among others, reiterating that he did not want a second language version competing with Playboy in the United States and explaining that "[w]ith the acquisition of the Mexican Playboy by a U.S. firm, it is important to make clear that the editorial focus and distribution of this Spanish language version of [23] the magazine remain essentially Mexican." In his February 4, 1997 memo to Henry Marks, after setting out that he had no problem with a direct Spanish translation if they owned the magazine, Heftner continued, "But I have already rejected the idea of a separate Spanish language edition of PLAYBOY in the U.S. as being too confusing. And I am even more opposed to allowing some outside company [to] own and distribute a Spanish edition (Mexican or other) here in the U.S." Finally, Hefner's February 7, 1997 memo sent to Christie Hefner expressed the following: "I think it is naive to assume that distributing 100,000 copies of a Mexican edition of PLAYBOY in the United States won't have some impact on the newsstand sales of the U.S. edition when our own single copy sales are often no more than 500,000."

expressed disapproval [26] of an aspect of the magazine covered by Paragraph 8a, such that PEI was required to provide those memos to EC and GSI.

Although the evidence established that Hugh Hefner expressed his concern about the development of a Spanish language version of Playboy to be distributed in the U.S. and that PEI did not provide either EC or GSI with Hefner's written memoranda that addressed his concerns, a reasonable jury could have concluded that the Hefner memoranda did not address any aspect of any issue of the Foreign Edition, Special Issues, or Calendar that was identified in Paragraph 8a. The jury could have rationally concluded that, through these memos, PEI was not disapproving or refusing to approve any specific Paragraph 8a aspect. Thus, a reasonable jury could have concluded that PEI was not required to advise EC and GSI of Hefner's concern by providing them with his memoranda. Rather, the evidence establishes that three issues of the magazine, the October, November, and December 1997 issues, were distributed in the U.S. This evidence supports a determination that PEI approved, for U.S. distribution, all Paragraph 8a aspects of the three issues, including the cover price, the discount for [27] newsstand sale, and the subscription price. After so concluding, the jury could have reasonably determined that PEI did not fail to comply with the License Agreement in this regard. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827.

b. Number of Copies for Distribution in the U.S.

As a second breach-of-contract theory, EC and GSI argue that PEI [*332] breached the last sentence of Paragraph1.a(ii) of the License Agreement when it limited distribution of each of the three issues of the Foreign Edition to 39,950 copies. Paragraph 1.a.(ii) provides, in relevant part, the following:

> Licensor's approval of such distribution and sale in the United States, if at all, will not occur until at least six (6) months following the legal formation of the joint venture Grupo Siete International, Inc., and if such approval is granted, will not exceed one-hundred-fifty thousand (150,000) copies per issue.

EC and GSI assert that "[w]here, as here, a reasonable construction of this clause is that it allows the monthly distribution of a quantity higher than the actual sale[s] amount of 150,000 copies per month, this [t]rial [c]ourt should have declared that the contract was breached as a matter of law" because PEI approved [28] only 39,950 copies per issue for distribution in the U.S. EC and GSI contend that although this provision may limit sales, it does not limit distribution and PEI should have allowed monthly distribution of more than 150,000 issues in order to accomplish an actual sale of 150,000 copies.

At EC and GSI's request, the trial court submitted the meaning of this provision to the jury through the following instruction in Question 1A: "The [c]ourt further instructs you that [this] term of the License Agreement is ambiguous, which means that it is susceptible to more than one meaning." It is clear, however, that the jury rejected EC and GSI's suggested construction and resolved ambiguity, if any, against EC and GSI when it found that PEI did not fail to comply with the License Agreement. By so finding, the jury impliedly concluded that this provision expressly allowed PEI to set U.S. sales and distribution figures at a number not to exceed 150,000 copies per month, and therefore, PEI did not breach that provision when it formally approved a monthly distribution in the U.S. of 39,950 copies. Thus, we are not persuaded by this argument, especially in light of the fact that the ambiguity instruction [29] was submitted to the jury at EC and GSI's request. See Tittizer v. Union Gas Corp., 171 S.W.3d 857, 862 (Tex. 2005) (per curiam) (explaining that a party cannot complain on appeal that the trial court took a specific action that the complaining party requested).

EC and GSI also contend that, under this theory of recovery, the evidence is legally insufficient to support this adverse finding as a matter of law. They assert that there is undisputed and conclusive evidence that establishes PEI agreed to allow monthly distribution of 225,000 copies of the Spanish language version of Playboy in the U.S. and breached the License Agreement when it only allowed the monthly distribution of 39,950 copies. In support of this argument, EC and GSI point to PEI's approval of the use of a media kit which identified a monthly distribution objective of 225,000 copies.[6] However, we have already determined that the "media kit was not the formal written approval for U.S. distribution required by the License Agreement." Playboy I, 202 S.W.3d at 259. Thus, this argument fails under the law of the case doctrine. See Hudson v. Wakefield, 711 S.W.2d 628, 630 (Tex. 1986).

In support of their contention that the evidence conclusively establishes that PEI approved a 225,000 distribution figure, EC and GSI also reference testimony provided by Marco Sanchez, Paul Siegel, Randy Hills, and Fernando Peramo, all executives [*333] or employees of either PEI or EC during the relevant time period. Our review of the evidence, however, reveals that this referenced testimony is based on PEI's asserted approval of the media kit; therefore, it provides no support. EC and GSI refer us to no evidence, and we find none, that PEI gave written approval for the distribution of 225,000 copies per issue. Rather, reviewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the verdict, the testimony of Marco Sanchez and Hills supports a determination that the only written approval given by PEI was for the distribution of 39,950 copies.

Finally, the jury could have credited favorable testimony provided by Javier Sanchez, an experienced businessman who signed the License Agreement on behalf of EC, and disregarded contrary evidence, if any, that PEI approved the distribution of 225,000 copies. [31] See Del Lago Partners, 307 S.W.3d at 770; City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 822, 827. Javier Sanchez testified that he read and understood the agreement; his lawyers also read the agreement and advised him concerning it; and he discussed the meaning of the agreement with PEI representatives. In addition, Javier Sanchez agreed that, going into the agreement, he understood that the distribution and sale of the Spanish-language version of the magazine in any country other than Mexico would be subject to PEI's prior written approval that could be withdrawn once given on notice from PEI and that such approval, if any, would not exceed 150,000 copies per issue-in other words, the maximum amount of copies per issue would be 150,000. The jury could have reasonably concluded that Javier Sanchez understood that the License Agreement set out a maximum of 150,000 copies per issue for sale and for distribution in the U.S. and that the understanding or agreement did not set the lower or actual limit that PEI would approve. And after so concluding, the jury could have reasonably determined that PEI did not fail to comply with the License Agreement in this regard. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827.

c. [32] Good Faith and Fair Dealing

As a third theory of recovery on their breach-of-contract claim, EC and GSI argue that PEI did not act in good faith and failed to cooperate or to deal fairly with them.[7] EC and GSI contend that the following evidence conclusively established this breach: (1) certain internal memoranda were not turned over or discussed with EC and GSI; (2) PEI interfered with EC and GSI's attempt to distribute the magazines within the U.S.; and (3) after EC and GSI received a default letter and offered to pay PEI $50,000 in exchange for PEI's agreement to sit down in good faith and cooperate with them, PEI refused to do so, instead choosing to terminate the License Agreement. We disagree.

[6] Fernando Peramo, EC and GSI's editor-in-chief [30] for the Mexican Playboy magazine, described the media kit as a "presentation of what we send advertisers."

[7] As part of Question 1A, the failure-to-comply question, the trial court included the following instruction:

> The [c]ourt instructs you the License Agreement includes an implied duty of good faith and fair dealing. This ensures parties do not take advantage in a way that could not have been contemplated at the time the contract was drafted or do anything that would destroy the other party's right to receive the benefit of the contract. Accordingly, a party with absolute discretion under a contract [33] must exercise such discretion in a manner consistent with the reasonable expectations of the other party. Whenever the cooperation of one party is necessary for the other party's performance, there is an implied condition that such cooperation will be given.

HN12[] Under Illinois law, parties to a contract "are entitled to enforce the terms of a [*334] contract to the letter and an implied covenant of good faith cannot overrule or modify the express terms of a contract."[8] N. Trust Co. v. VIII S. Mich. Assocs., 276 Ill. App. 3d 355, 657 N.E.2d 1095, 1104, 212 Ill. Dec. 750 (Ill. App. Ct. 1995); see St. Mary's Hosp. v. Health Pers. Options Corp., 309 Ill. App. Ct. 1993) (explaining when a mortgage contract gave the lender a series of options to be exercised at its sole discretion, the duty of good faith and fair dealing could not negate the lender's right to choose and exercise those options). We have already concluded that PEI was exercising its rights under the terms of its contract with EC and GSI when it did not disclose its internal memoranda and when [34] it limited the distribution of monthly copies of the magazine. In addition, the evidence establishes that EC and GSI's $50,000 offer to pay was approximately half of what EC and GSI were contractually required to pay, and the License Agreement expressly gave PEI the right to terminate for non-payment. Therefore, the jury could have reasonably concluded that PEI was exercising its contractual rights, which cannot be overruled or modified by an implied covenant of good faith, and, therefore, did not fail to comply with the License Agreement in this regard. See N. Trust Co., 657 N.E.2d at 1104; see also City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827; *State Nat'l Bank v. Academia, Inc., 802 S.W.2d 282, 293 (Tex. d. Summary Reviewing the evidence presented at trial in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict and indulging every reasonable inference that would support it, we conclude that the evidence is legally sufficient to support the jury's adverse finding on all three breach-of-contract theories of recovery set out above. See Del Lago Partners, Inc., 307 S.W.3d at 770; City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 822, 827. The evidence would enable reasonable and fair-minded people to reach the verdict under review. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827.

2. Fraud

EC and GSI also contend that the evidence is legally insufficient to support the jury's adverse fraud findings. They argue that the undisputed evidence conclusively established that PEI committed common law fraud and statutory fraud against them.

a. Common Law Fraud

The jury answered "No" to Question 2A, "Did [PEI] commit fraud against [EC or GSI]?" For this question, the trial court instructed the jury that fraud occurs when, > a. a party fails to disclose a material fact within the knowledge of that party, > b. the party knows that the other party is ignorant of the fact and does not have an equal opportunity to discover the truth,

> [*335] c. the party [36] intends to induce the other party to take some action by failing to disclose the fact, and > d. the other party suffers injury as a result of acting without knowledge of the undisclosed fact.

[8] The trial court applied Illinois law to the License Agreement based on a choice-of-law provision contained in that agreement. The trial court also ruled that a duty of good faith and fair dealing existed under Illinois law. Because PEI contends that the trial court improperly imposed a duty of good faith in this case, for the purposes of this analysis we will only assume, without deciding, that such a duty exists under Illinois [35] law.

Based on this instruction, in order to recover on this common law fraud claim, EC and GSI had to establish not only failure to disclose, but also that they were ignorant of the undisclosed facts and did not have an equal opportunity to discover the truth, that PEI intended to induce them to take an action based on the non-disclosure, and that they suffered injury as a result of the non-disclosure. On appeal, EC and GSI have not challenged the jury finding with respect to all elements. Because HN13[] we must affirm the take-nothing judgment on EC and GSI's common law fraud claim unless the evidence conclusively establishes all elements of the fraud claim and because EC and GSI, the parties that had the burden of proof, have not challenged the jury finding with respect to every element of that claim, their argument that the take-nothing judgment on their fraud claim must be reversed fails. See Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 241; Rich v. Olah, 274 S.W.3d 878, 886-88 (Tex. App.—Dallas 2008, no pet.).

b. Statutory [37] Fraud

The jury also answered, "No," to the statutory fraud Questions 3A, 4A, and 5A, "Did [PEI] commit statutory fraud as defined [in the respective questions] against [EC and GSI]?" On appeal, EC and GSI assert that PEI committed statutory fraud because,

> PEI never told [EC and GSI] about the true extent of [Hugh Hefner's] objections and concerns. The internal memos from Hugh Hefner, referred to above, make reference to the fact that such concerns were "previously expressed," within the PEI organization. In addition, multiple other memos, such as ones from Dick Rosenzweig, the Executive Assistant to Hugh Hefner and member of PEI's Board of Directors, reveal the true depth of Mr. Hefner's concerns.

EC and GSI argue that PEI had a legal duty to disclose this information.

However, none of the statutory fraud jury questions involve non-disclosure. Question 3A asked about false representations of a past or existing material fact that was made to and relied on by EC or GSI in entering into a contract; Question 4A asked about a false material promise to do an act with the intent of not relying on it that was made to relied on by EC or GSI in entering into a contract; and Question 5A asked about [38] PEI's actual awareness of the falsity of a promise made by another person, its failure to disclose that false representation or promise, and a benefit received from it. Thus, all three questions required EC and GSI to prove a false representation or promise. On appeal, their statutory fraud arguments do not identify any false representations or promises that PEI allegedly made. Furthermore, as with the common law fraud analysis, because HN14[] we must affirm the take-nothing judgment on this statutory fraud claim unless the evidence conclusively establishes all elements of the claim and because EC and GSI have not challenged the jury finding with respect to all elements of that claim, their argument fails. See Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 241, Rich, 274 S.W.3d at 886-88.

4. Antitrust Violation

EC and GSI challenge the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's adverse antitrust finding that PEI did not engage in a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce that harmed EC or GSI. More specifically, EC and GSI assert the following:

> [*336] [T]he undisputed evidence conclusively established that PEI stole EC's and GSI's money, business, License Agreement, goodwill, [39] customer lists, advertisers, distributors, customers, vendors, and subscribers by duping EC and GSI into believing that the export of the Foreign Edition was a genuine project, when in reality this project would and could not go forward unless and until PEI owned it for itself. In furtherance of this theft, PEI allowed three issues of the Foreign Export to enter the United States in the fall of 1997, at a substandard number of distributed copies, knowing full well that EC's and GSI's business would not be viable at these numbers, but in an effort to test the market for consumer interest and potential for cannibalization of U[.]S[.] Playboy so that PEI could then force EC and GSI out of business and steal this project for PEI. Additionally, the undisputed evidence conclusively established that PEI engaged in the following conduct: (1) Hugh Hefner's and/or PEI's actions to own this project; (2) Hugh Hefner's and/or PEI's attempts to monopolize the marketplace in the USA and prevent competition with U[.]S[.] Playboy by EC and

> GSI; (3) PEI's internal plan to force EC and GSI into a material default under the License Agreement; (4) PEI's internal plan to forcibly take over one or both of [40] EC and GSI over their objection, so that PEI could own the project; (5) PEI's internal plan to sell Foreign Editions for direct PEI profit; and (6) PEI's internal plan to pursue this project as either a 100% PEI owned project or at least one in which PEI controlled the project and had a majority and/or substantial ownership interest in the project.[ ]

In support of this argument, EC and GSI rely on ten PEI memoranda that were admitted as trial exhibits. EC and GSI assert that "[t]hese documents evidence not only an agreement by and amongst employees of PEI, but also with Hugh Hefner, the majority stockholder of the entity, as well as persons outside the company." Without further citation to the reporter's record, EC and GSI contend that,

> [i]n addition to the document[s] mentioned above, there is undisputed and conclusive evidence of an agreement involving Christie Hefner and/or PEI and/or Hugh Hefner and/or Laura de Laviada and/or others, which demonstrates that there was an agreement between PEI and a third party to completely disrupt the contract that the parties had entered into.

The following antitrust question was submitted: "Did [PEI] engage in a contract, combination, or conspiracy [41] in restraint of trade or commerce that harmed [EC or GSI]?" See Tex. Bus. & Com. Code Ann. § 15.05(a) (West 2011).[9] The charge included no instructions or definitions.

At the charge conference, PEI requested the following instruction, which read in relevant part as follows:

> To establish their [antitrust violation] claim, EC and GSI must prove each of the following elements:
> > 1. That Playboy entered an agreement with another corporation or with a person who was not an officer, director, agent, or employee of Playboy . . . .

PEI correctly argued that the charge was defective because it submitted a claim for [*337] agreement in restraint of trade but omitted the required elements of that claim, including that PEI entered into an agreement with another person—another corporation or a person who is not an officer, director, agent, or employee of PEI. The trial court refused PEI's request.

And one cannot sustain an action under subsection 15.05(a) of the TFEAA regarding conspiracies or combinations in restraint of trade when he has not provided any evidence that the defendant engaged in any concerted action with any other independent entity. See *Copperweld Corp. v. App. LEXIS 4131, at *13 ("[A] violation [44] of subsection 15.05(a) cannot be based on concerted action between a corporation and its wholly-owned subsidiary . . . .").

Now, on appeal, because PEI objected to the charge as defective on the basis that it omitted a required element of an antitrust claim—that PEI entered into an agreement with another person—we measure the sufficiency of the evidence not by the charge but by the antitrust law set out above. See Osterberg v. Peca, 12 S.W.3d 31, 55 (Tex. 2000) (providing that when a complaining party has not alerted the trial court of an alleged defect by objecting to the court's charge, it is the charge, and not some other, unidentified law, against which we measure sufficiency of the evidence); see also Equistar Chem., L.P. v. Dresser-Rand Co., 240 S.W.3d 864, 868 (Tex. 2007) (concluding that an argument that the charge submitted an improper measure of [*338] damages was waived by failure to present to trial court); Gen. Chem. Corp. v. De La Lastra, 852 S.W.2d 916, 920 (Tex. 1993) (holding that the failure to object to jury questions based on state law waived assertion on appeal that federal maritime law controlled). Therefore, EC and GSI must show that the evidence establishes that PEI [45] entered into a conspiracy, combination, or conspiracy with a separate and independent business or person, see Levinthal, 902 S.W.2d at 511, and based on our review of the record, EC and GSI have not done so.

Much of EC and GSI's antitrust argument focuses on various alleged internal plans of PEI. The memoranda referenced by EC and GSI discuss PEI's position regarding distribution of the Spanish edition of Playboy in the U.S., its evolving relationship with EC and GSI, and viable options that would allow for the continued publication of a Spanish language magazine. The memoranda, however, do not conclusively establish that PEI engaged in a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce against EC and GSI with another person or business, as they assert. Rather, with only one exception, the referenced memoranda establish that PEI was reviewing the venture and was planning internally. HN16[] An internal plan is not a contract, combination, or conspiracy with a separate and independent business or person, and evidence of an agreement between or among PEI's employees, agents, officers, directors, and/or stockholders does not conclusively establish the agreement element of [46] an antitrust claim.

Additionally, although EC and GSI assert that the evidence establishes that there existed an agreement between PEI and other persons outside the company, our review of the record reveals that the only unaffiliated person with whom PEI communicated was Laura de Laviada, a Mexican business woman. Marks identified her as a possible successor to EC and GSI; however, there is nothing in the record that establishes PEI reached an agreement with her. Christie Hefner testified that while she might have communicated in writing with de Laviada about the matter, she did not think that she had met with her and agreed that she had never made a deal with her in Mexico. Instead, Christie Hefner testified that after the contract was terminated with EC and GSI, it took five years to find a new licensee to relaunch the publications in Mexico and the new licensee was not de Laviada.

Therefore, assuming without deciding that this is an antitrust claim and not just a claim for breach of contract as PEI urges,[10] reviewing the evidence presented at trial in the light most favorable to the jury's verdict and indulging every reasonable inference that would support it, we conclude that the [47] evidence is legally sufficient to support the jury's adverse finding on the antitrust claim. See Del Lago Partners, Inc., 307 S.W.3d at 770; City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 822, 827. The evidence would enable reasonable and fair-minded people to reach the verdict under review. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827.

5. Theft of Property, Service, or Trade Secrets

[10] PEI also asserts that there are other bases to deny recovery on this antitrust claim, including (1) EC and GSI do not have standing; (2) they failed to establish the relevant product and geographic market; and (3) they failed to establish any injury to their business in Texas. Because of the disposition of this issue, however, we need not address PEI's remaining responsive assertions. See Tex. R. App. P. 47.1.

[*339] Finally, EC and GSI contend that the undisputed evidence conclusively established that PEI committed theft of property, theft of a service, or theft of trade secrets from both EC and GSI. After generally asserting that the evidence conclusively establishes that PEI committed theft of property, a service, and trade secrets, EC and GSI repeat, for each asserted theft, the contentions and arguments made in their antitrust issue. [48] They also rely on the same evidence. EC and GSI do not, however, discuss the elements of their theft claims, elements that were detailed in the jury charge. See HN17[] Tex. R. App. P. 47.1 ("The court of appeals must hand down a written opinion that is as brief as practicable but that addresses every issue raised and necessary to final disposition of the appeal."); Martinez v. El Paso County, 218 S.W.3d 841, 844 (Tex. App.—El Paso 2007, pet. dism'd) ("When reviewing a civil matter, an appellate court has no discretion to consider an issue not raised in the appellant's brief, even if the ends of justice so require."). Neither do they argue why the evidence is insufficient to support the jury's finding with respect to those elements. See Tex. R. App. P. 47.1; Martinez, 218 S.W.3d at 844. Therefore, EC and GSI's argument that the take-nothing judgment on their theft claims must be reversed fails. See Tex. R. App. P. 47.1; Martinez, 218 S.W.3d at 844; see also Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 241; Rich, 274 S.W.3d at 886-88.

6. Summary

Based on the above analysis, we overrule EC and GSI's second issue challenging the jury's adverse findings on their claims against PEI. B. PEI's COUNTERCLAIMS

In their [49] third issue, EC and GSI challenge all of the jury's findings on PEI's counterclaims.

1. Breach-of-Contract Counterclaims

EC and GSI first address the jury's findings in favor of PEI on its breach-of-contract counterclaims. Specifically, EC and GSI challenge the findings that they failed to comply with the agreements and that their failures to comply were not excused. They also appear to assert charge error when they argue that PEI failed to use or rely on Illinois law in their breach-of-contract jury questions.

a. Sufficiency of the Evidence to Establish Breach

EC and GSI challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to support the jury's findings that EC and GSI breached the License Agreement and the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement—issues for which EC and GSI did not have the burden of proof.[11] However, the evidence establishes that the License Agreement entitled PEI to $450,000 in guaranteed royalties over the term of the License Agreement, plus percentage royalties. This included a guaranteed 1997 royalty of $100,000 to be paid quarterly. It is undisputed that as of November 1997 EC and GSI had not made their first three quarterly payments for that year and that the fourth quarterly [50] payment was due. EC and GSI also owed PEI $25,000 in other payments related to certain unaudited rebillables.

The License Agreement provided that the "failure of [EC] . . . to make any payment [*340] required hereunder within five (5) days after notice from [PEI] that . . . payment is past due" was an event authorizing termination. On November 14, 1997, however, the parties signed the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement, providing that EC could have until December 18, 1997 to pay $100,000 of the overdue amount and until February 28, 1998 to pay the remaining $25,000. Even with this extension, the evidence shows that EC did not make the payments as required. PEI provided EC with the required notice and an opportunity to cure. After EC failed to cure, PEI terminated the License Agreement.

[11] Question 15 asked whether EC and/or GSI failed to comply with the License Agreement, and Question 18 asked whether EC and/or GSI failed to comply with the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement. To each question, the jury answered "Yes" for EC and "Yes" for GSI.

Based on our review of the evidence under the appropriate standard, the evidence is sufficient to support the jury's findings that EC and GSI breached [51] the License Agreement and the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 810; Croucher, 660 S.W.2d at 58. It is legally sufficient because there is not a complete absence of evidence, but rather more than a scintilla of evidence, properly admitted, to support the findings and because the evidence does not establish conclusively the opposite of such findings, as urged by EC and GSI. See City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 810; King Ranch, Inc., 118 S.W.3d at 751. Furthermore, we conclude that the evidence is factually sufficient because it is not so weak as to make the verdict clearly wrong and manifestly unjust. See Cain, 709 S.W.2d at 176; Ins. Network of Tex., 266 S.W.3d at 469-70; Bay, Inc., 139 S.W.3d at 329.

b. EC and GSI's Excuse Defense

EC and GSI also challenge the jury's refusal to find that their breaches were excused—an affirmative defense for which EC and GSI had the burden of proof.[12] See Trencor, Inc. v. Cornech Mach. Co., 115 S.W.3d 145, 153 (Tex. App.—Fort Worth 2003, pet. denied) (citing HN18[] Tex. R. Civ. P. 94) (setting out that excuse is an affirmative defense upon which the defendant has the burden of proof). Although the jury questions instructed [52] the jury that EC and GSI's actions may be excused for PEI's prior breach, estoppel, or ratification, EC and GSI complain on appeal only of the jury's refusal to find prior breach—PEI's non-disclosure of the three Hefner internal memoranda—as an excuse. However, as set out above, there was sufficient evidence to support the jury's finding that PEI did not commit a breach of contract by keeping its internal memos internal. There likewise is evidence to support the jury's finding that EC and GSI's breaches of the License Agreement and the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement were not excused by any prior contractual breach on PEI's part. Thus, we conclude that the evidence is both legally and factually sufficient because the jury's answers are fully supported by the evidence that would enable reasonable and fair-minded people to reach the verdict under review, see City of Keller, 168 S.W.3d at 827, and those adverse findings are not against the great weight of the evidence. See Dow Chem. Co., 46 S.W.3d at 242.

c. Illinois Law

EC and GSI contend that PEI intentionally omitted any reference to Illinois law in their breach-of-contract jury questions and, thereby, eradicated any entitlement it had to the jury's affirmative findings of breach. EC and GSI did not, however, [*341] object to the jury questions on the ground that they were allegedly being submitted under the wrong state's law. And they did not request the submission of any jury instructions relating to Illinois law to accompany the questions concerning PEI's breach-of-contract counterclaims. As a result, EC and GSI have waived any error on this basis. See HN19[] Tex. R. Civ. P. 274 ("A party objecting to a charge must point out distinctly the objectionable matter and the grounds of the objection. Any complaint as to a question, definition, or instruction, on account of any defect, omission, or fault in pleading, is waived unless specifically included in the objections."); Jarrin v. Sam White Oldsmobile Co., 929 S.W.2d 21, 25 (Tex. App.—Houston [1st Dist.] 1996, writ denied) (HN20[] "To complain of the trial court's omission of a requested instruction on appeal, [54] a party is obliged to make a written request to the trial court . . . .").

d. Damage Award

Finally, EC and GSI argue that the evidence is insufficient to support the jury's awards of $312,500 and $48,750 in damages on PEI's breach-of-contract counterclaims. We are not persuaded by this argument because it is based on allegations which we have already concluded are not supported by the record—that the evidence demonstrates

---

[12] Question 16 asked if EC and/or GSI's failure to comply with the License Agreement was excused, and Question 19 asked if EC and/or GSI's failure to comply with the Renegotiated Payment [53] Plan Agreement was excused. To each question, the jury answered "No" for EC and "No" for GSI.

that neither EC nor GSI breached the agreements, that PEI submitted its breach of contract claim without reference to Illinois law, and that the evidence demonstrates that the breaches were legally excused. Therefore, we need not address this contention further. See Tex. R. App. P. 47.1.

2. Fraud Counterclaims

EC and GSI also contend that all findings against them on PEI's fraud claims were not supported by sufficient evidence. However, PEI elected to recover not on its fraud claims but on its breach of contract claims which we have concluded are supported by the evidence. We decline to address appellant's second issue as it is not dispositive to this appeal. See id.

3. Attorneys' Fees

Finally, EC and GSI challenge the jury's award of attorneys' fees in the amount of $1,680,000 [55] and $500,000 contingent appellate fees. They first argue that PEI is not entitled to recover attorneys' fees, asserting that Illinois law precludes such an award. Relying on Brundidge v. Glandale Fed. Bank and Hamer v. Kirk, EC and GSI acknowledge that Illinois law permits the recovery of attorneys' fees where an agreement between the parties allows the successful litigant to recover attorneys' fees and the expenses of suit. See Brundidge, 168 Ill. 2d 235, 659 N.E.2d 909, 911, 213 Ill. Dec. 563 (1995); Hamer, 64 Ill. 2d 434, 356 N.E. 2d 524, 526, 1 Ill. Dec. 336 (1976). Here, the License Agreement expressly authorizes the recovery of attorneys' fees and litigation costs. Thus, this argument fails.

EC and GSI further argue that the award should be disregarded because PEI failed to introduce evidence of attorneys' fees incurred solely in connection with the prosecution of the breach of contract claims, and because PEI brought both tort claims and contract claims, this failure to segregate fees is fatal to any right to recover fees. See Varner v. Cardenas, 218 S.W.3d 68, 69 (Tex. 2007). However, EC and GSI waived any objection to any failure to segregate by failing to object to the attorneys' fees jury question on the ground that PEI had not segregated [56] its attorneys' fees. HN21[] Where "[n]o objection [is] made based on the failure to segregate . . . any error in failing to segregate the fees [is] waived, and the trial court [can] only disregard the jury finding if it [is] unsupported by the evidence or [*342] [is] immaterial." Estate of Montague v. Nat'l Loan Investors, L.P., 70 S.W.3d 242, 250 (Tex. App.—San Antonio 2001, pet. denied); see also *Petroleum Solutions, Inc. v. Head, No. 13-09-00204-CV, 2011 Tex. App. LEXIS 3289, at 147 (Tex. App.—Corpus Christi Apr. 29, 2011, pet. filed) (mem. op.) (explaining that where the appellant "did not object to the segregation of [appellee's] attorney's fees and expenses, . . . [appellant's] segregation contention was waived"). In Montague, the court of appeals upheld the jury's attorneys' fee award where there had been no objection to the failure to segregate, and where, as here, the jury awarded less than the total amount of attorneys' fees sought. See 70 S.W.3d at 250.

Finally, EC and GSI also assert that the fees should be disregarded because the evidence conclusively demonstrated that neither EC nor GSI breached either the License Agreement or the Renegotiated Payment Plan Agreement and, if there was [57] any breach, it was excused as a matter of law. We have already decided these evidentiary issues against EC and GSI and, therefore, need not address them as a basis for their attorneys' fees argument. See Tex. R. App. P. 47.1.

4. Summary

Based on the above analysis, we overrule EC and GSI's third issue challenging the jury's findings in favor of PEI on PEI's counterclaims.

III. Conclusion

We affirm the judgment of the trial court.

HN1[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), a class may be certified only if questions of law and fact common to members of the class predominate over questions affecting only individual members of the class.

To be certified, a proposed class must satisfy the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a), as well as one of the three alternatives in Rule 23(b). As a threshold matter, a proposed class must always meet the Rule 23(a) requirements of numerosity, typicality, commonality, and adequacy of representation. When certification is sought under Rule 23(b)(3), proponents of the class must also show: (1) that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the proposed class predominate over questions affecting only individual class members; and (2) that a class action is superior to other available methods of resolving the controversy.

HN3[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In conducting the Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 analysis, the court should not turn the class certification proceedings into a dress rehearsal for the trial on the merits. On issues affecting class certification, however, a court may not simply assume the truth of the matters as asserted by the plaintiff. If there are material factual disputes, the court must receive evidence and resolve the disputes before deciding whether to certify the class. Plaintiffs bear the burden of showing that a proposed class satisfies the Rule 23 requirements, but they need not make that showing to a degree of absolute certainty. It is sufficient if each disputed requirement has been proven by a preponderance of evidence.

Civil Procedure > Appeals > Standards of Review > Abuse of Discretion

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Appellate Review

HN4[] Standards of Review, Abuse of Discretion

An appellate court reviews the denial of plaintiffs' motion for class certification for an abuse of discretion. If, however, the district court bases its discretionary decision on an erroneous view of the law or a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence, then it has necessarily abused its discretion.

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN5[] Expert Witnesses, Daubert Standard

Under Fed. R. Evid. 702 and Daubert, expert testimony is admissible only if (1) the expert testifies to valid technical, scientific, or other specialized knowledge; and (2) that testimony will assist the trier of fact.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses

HN6[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

When an expert's report or testimony is critical to class certification, a district court must make a conclusive ruling on any challenge to that expert's qualifications or submissions before it may rule on a motion for class certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Appellate Review

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN7[] Class Actions, Appellate Review

If a district court has doubts about whether an expert's opinions may be critical for a class certification decision, the court should make an explicit Daubert ruling. An erroneous Daubert ruling excluding non-critical expert testimony would result, at worst, in the exclusion of expert testimony that did not matter. Failure to conduct such an analysis when necessary, however, would mean that the unreliable testimony remains in the record, a result that could easily lead to reversal on appeal.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN8[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A district court cannot merely leave open the questions of what portions of an expert's testimony it may have decided (or will decide) to exclude in ruling on a class certification. Those tough questions must be faced and squarely decided.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN9[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Whenever an expert's report or testimony is critical to a class certification decision, a district court must rule conclusively on a challenge to the expert's qualifications or opinions before ruling on class certification, without regard to whether the district court ultimately grants or denies that motion.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Admissibility > Expert Witnesses > Daubert Standard

HN10[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Fed. R. Evid. 702 applies to plaintiffs and defendants alike, regardless of which side bears the burden of proof. The fact that a defendant is not required to present evidence to defeat class certification does not give that defendant license to offer irrelevant and unreliable evidence. A Daubert hearing is necessary only if the witness's opinion is "critical" to class certification. That requirement is not met if the court decides the motion for class certification on grounds not addressed by the witness.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) permits class certification only if the questions of law or fact common to class members "pre-dominate" over questions that are individual to members of the class. There is no mathematical or mechanical test for evaluating predominance. The United States Supreme Court has discussed predominance in broad terms, explaining that the Rule 23(b)(3) inquiry trains on the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member's case as a genuine controversy, with the purpose being to determine whether a proposed class is sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation. While similar to Rule 23(a)'s requirements for typicality and commonality, the predominance criterion is far more demanding. Predominance is a test readily met in certain cases alleging consumer or securities fraud or violations of the antitrust laws. Careful application of Rule 23 is necessary in antitrust cases, as in all cases, and in antitrust cases, Rule 23, when applied rigorously, will frequently lead to certification.

HN12[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement is satisfied when common questions represent a significant aspect of a case and can be resolved for all members of a class in a single adjudication. Or, to put it another way, common questions can predominate if a common nucleus of operative facts and issues underlies the claims brought by the proposed class. If, to make a prima facie showing on a given question, the members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member, then it is an individual question. If the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing, then it becomes a common question. Individual questions need not be absent. The text of Rule 23(b)(3) itself contemplates that such individual questions will be present. The rule requires only that those questions not predominate over the common questions affecting the class as a whole.

Analysis of predominance under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) begins, of course, with the elements of the underlying cause of action. Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 15, requires plaintiffs to prove: (1) that the defendant violated federal antitrust law; and (2) that the antitrust violation caused them some injury. Plaintiffs also must show damages, but individual proof of this element of a claim under the Clayton Act is not an obstacle to a showing of predominance. It is well established that the presence of individualized questions regarding damages does not prevent certification under Rule 23(b)(3).

Under the proper standard for class certification in an antitrust action, plaintiffs' burden at the class certification stage is not to prove the element of antitrust impact, but only to demonstrate that the element of antitrust impact is capable of proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual to its members.

A class will often include persons who have not been injured by the defendant's conduct; indeed this is almost inevitable because at the outset of the case many of the members of the class may be unknown, or if they are known still the facts bearing on their claims may be unknown. Such a possibility or indeed inevitability does not preclude class certification. A court may not decline to certify a class merely because it believes the class's claims will fail on the merits.

HN21[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

If a proposed class consists largely (or entirely, for that matter) of members who are ultimately shown to have suffered no harm, that may not mean that the class was improperly certified but only that the class failed to meet its burden of proof on the merits. If, however, a class is defined so broadly as to include a great number of members who for some reason could not have been harmed by the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct, the class is defined too broadly to permit certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN22[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

A class should not be certified if it is apparent that it contains a great many persons who have suffered no injury at the hands of the defendant. There is no precise measure for "a great many." Such determinations are a matter of degree, and will turn on the facts as they appear from case to case.

HN23[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The problem posed by class members whose claims may fail on the merits for individual reasons is the obverse of a different problem with class definition: the problem of the "fail-safe" class: one that is defined so that whether a person qualifies as a member depends on whether the person has a valid claim. Such a class definition is improper because a class member either wins or, by virtue of losing, is defined out of the class and is therefore not bound by the judgment. Defining a class so as to avoid, on one hand, being overinclusive and, on the other hand, the fail-safe problem is more of an art than a science. Either problem can and often should be solved by refining the class definition rather than by flatly denying class certification on that basis.

HN24[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In circumstances involving minor overbreadth problems that do not call into question the validity of the class as a whole, the better course is not to deny class certification entirely but to amend the class definition as needed to correct for the overbreadth.

Opinion

[*808] HAMILTON, Circuit Judge. HN1[] Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(b)(3), a class may be certified only if questions of law and fact common to members of the class predominate over questions affecting only individual members of the class. In this case, plaintiff-appellant Steven Messner and other named plaintiffs alleged that a merger between defendant-appellee [2] Northshore University HealthSystem and Highland Park Hospital violated federal antitrust law. In fact, the Federal Trade Commission found that the merger violated section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Plaintiffs seek treble damages and injunctive relief under section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, and they seek certification of a class of individual patients and third-party payors who allegedly paid higher prices for hospital care as a result of the merger.

One key issue on the merits will be proof that the merger had an antitrust impact on the plaintiff class, primarily in the form of higher prices. To show the predominance of common questions regarding the merger's antitrust impact on class members, plaintiffs proposed to rely on the same economic and statistical methods used by the Federal Trade Commission staff and Northshore's own economic experts to analyze antitrust impact in the merger litigation before the FTC. The basic method, called "difference-in-differences," is designed to estimate the amount of Northshore's price increases that resulted from exercise of market power rather than from other factors. This analysis, plaintiffs claimed, will show that Northshore [3] leveraged its newfound market power to impose higher prices on insurers and patients.

The district court denied plaintiffs' motion for class certification, concluding that their expert had not shown that his proposed methodology could address the antitrust impact issue on a class-wide basis. The district court believed that plaintiffs' proposed methodology required proof that defendant raised its prices at uniform rates affecting all class members to the same degree. Finding a lack of uniformity in price increases, the district court concluded that plaintiffs could not show predominance and that class certification should be denied. The district court based this conclusion on its belief that plaintiffs' expert had conceded that the common methodological framework by which he proposed to demonstrate impact to members of the class was invalid absent uniform price increases. Plaintiffs sought interlocutory appeal under Rule 23(f).

Because of the importance of the issue for this case and for private antitrust enforcement, particularly with respect to hospitals and health care providers with complex pricing systems, we granted the petition for interlocutory appeal. We find that the district [4] court's conclusion that a lack of uniform price increases required denial of class certification was erroneous as a matter of both fact and law, resulting in a denial that we must find was an abuse of discretion. Although plaintiffs' expert initially believed that Northshore did in fact increase its prices uniformly across all services, he acknowledged that it might not have done so, and he explained how his common methodology could show impact to the class despite such complications. Apart from the expert's supposed concession, the degree of uniformity the district court demanded simply is not required for class certification under Rule 23(b)(3). In essence, it is important not to let a quest for perfect evidence become the enemy of good evidence. We vacate the district court's denial of class certification and remand this matter for further proceedings.

We begin by reviewing Northshore's merger and the FTC proceedings that found it unlawful, and then turn to the [*809] proceedings in the district court on class certification. On the merits of the appeal, we consider first the district court's procedural handling of a challenge to the testimony of Northshore's expert witness, then the central [5] substantive issue of proving antitrust impact on a class-wide basis. We conclude by considering some additional objections to class certification raised by Northshore.

I. The Merger and the FTC Proceedings

On January 1, 2000, defendant Northshore, then doing business as Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Corporation, merged with Highland Park Hospital, located in Highland Park, Illinois. Prior to the merger, Northshore owned Evanston Hospital in Evanston, Illinois, as well as Glenbrook Hospital in nearby Glenview, Illinois.

In February 2004, the Federal Trade Commission filed an administrative complaint against Northshore alleging that the merger violated section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18, by substantially lessening competition for general acute care inpatient hospital services in the "area directly proximate to the three [Northshore] hospitals and contiguous geographic areas in northeast Cook County and southeast Lake County, Illinois." *In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Corp., 2007 FTC LEXIS 210, 2007 WL 2286195, at 3 (F.T.C. Aug. 6, 2007). Following an eight-week trial, an administrative law judge concluded that the merger violated the Clayton Act. The judge ordered Northshore to divest [6] Highland Park Hospital. *2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at 4.

On appeal in 2007, the Federal Trade Commission agreed with the ALJ that the merger enabled Northshore to exercise increased market power and that it used that power to increase its prices by a substantial amount. The FTC pointed out that Northshore's own economic expert found a price increase of nine to ten percent. *2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at 66. The FTC concluded that the evidence as a whole demonstrated that Northshore's "substantially higher-than-predicted merger-coincident price increases were due to market power, rather than competitively-benign factors." Id. None of Northshore's alternative explanations for those price increases, the FTC concluded, were supported by the record. Id. The FTC rejected Northshore's arguments that the merger made Highland Park a meaningful competitor in the market, that the merger's anticompetitive effects were outweighed by quality improvements at Highland Park resulting from the merger, and that Northshore's not-for-profit status reduced the potential for anticompetitive harm. 2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at *67-*73. The FTC affirmed the ALJ's ruling that the merger violated section 7 of the Clayton Act. 2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at *76.

When it came to the question of remedy, [7] however, the FTC concluded that divestiture of Highland Park was not required. The FTC instead required Northshore to use "separate and independent" teams — one for Evanston and Glenbrook, and another for Highland Park — to negotiate contracts going forward. 2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at *77-*79. This remedy, the Commission concluded, would provide for effective competition between the hospitals and avoid the "complex, lengthy, and expensive process" of divestiture. 2007 FTC LEXIS 210, [WL] at *79.

II. Proceedings in the District Court

In April 2008, plaintiff Messner filed this class action suit against Northshore. (Dkt. 64, Ex. A.) Messner's suit was one of several similar actions challenging the merger, all of which were consolidated under the title In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Antitrust Litigation. In their consolidated class action complaint, Messner and the other named plaintiffs accuse Northshore of monopolization and attempted monopolization of the market for "general inpatient and hospital-based outpatient services" in the "the geographic [*810] triangle created by . . . Evanston Hospital, Glenbrook Hospital, and Highland Park Hospital," in violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. (Dkt. 224.) They [8] also allege that the merger substantially lessened competition in that market in violation of section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 18. Plaintiffs bring their claims under sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 15 & 26, requesting injunctive relief and treble damages for injuries they suffered as a result of the alleged antitrust violations.

Plaintiffs moved for class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(3) on behalf of "All persons or entities . . . who purchased or paid for inpatient hospital services or hospital-based outpatient services directly from Northshore . . . , its wholly-owned hospitals, predecessors, subsidiaries, or affiliates . . . from at least as early as January 1, 2000 to the present."[1] In support of that motion, plaintiffs offered the expert report of Dr. David Dranove, an economist on the faculty of Northwestern University who specializes in the health care industry. He would use common economic and econometric methods to prove the antitrust impact of Northshore's actions on the class and to estimate damages. Dranove would do so with the difference-in-differences method, by comparing "the percentage change in [Northshore's] prices between the pre- [9] and post-merger periods . . . to the percent change in prices at a control group of local hospitals during the same period." App. 126. "If the percentage change at [Northshore] is higher than the change at the control group by a statistically significant amount," plaintiffs said, "impact can be demonstrated." App. 126-27. Plaintiffs said that this same method could also provide an estimate of damages to individual class members.

In light of the FTC's findings that the merger had violated the law and enabled Northshore to raise its prices at least nine or ten percent above competitive prices, it is understandable that Northshore put up a determined opposition to class certification. The central issue under Rule 23(b)(3) became whether plaintiffs could show on a class-wide basis the antitrust impact of [10] Northshore's actions on the proposed class. Northshore argued that plaintiffs' proposed class included a number of members who, for a variety of reasons, were not affected by the alleged price increases, and that plaintiffs had failed to propose "a common methodology for identifying purported class members . . . included within these 'no impact' categories." In support of this argument, Northshore relied primarily on the expert testimony and report of Dr. Monica Noether, an expert on whom it had also relied during the FTC proceedings.

After extensive briefing and an evidentiary hearing, the district court denied plaintiffs' motion for class certification. In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Corp. Antitrust Litig., 268 F.R.D. 56 (N.D. Ill. 2010). Although the district court found that plaintiffs' proposed class satisfied the requirements of Rule 23(a), it concluded that questions of law

[1] Excluded from the proposed class were "those who solely paid fixed amount co-pays, uninsureds who did not pay their bill, Medicaid and Traditional Medicare patients, governmental entities, [Northshore itself], other providers of healthcare services, and the present and former parents, predecessors, subsidiaries, and affiliates of [Northshore] and other providers of healthcare services."

and fact individual to proposed class members regarding the antitrust impact of the merger predominated over questions common to the class as a whole. Id. at 61-65, 87.[2]

[*811] III. Analysis

A. Requirements for Class Certification

HN2[] To be certified, a proposed class must satisfy the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 23(a), as well as one of the three alternatives in Rule 23(b). Siegel v. Shell Oil Co., 612 F.3d 932, 935 (7th Cir. 2010). As a threshold matter, a proposed class must always meet the Rule 23(a) requirements of numerosity, typicality, commonality, and adequacy of representation. When certification is sought under Rule 23(b)(3), as it is here, proponents of the class must also show: (1) that the questions of law or fact common to the members of the proposed class predominate over questions affecting only individual class members; and (2) that a class action is superior to other available methods of resolving the controversy. Id.

HN3[] In conducting this analysis, the court should not turn the class certification proceedings into a dress rehearsal for the trial on the merits. See, e.g., Schleicher v. Wendt, 618 F.3d 679, 685 (7th Cir. 2010); Kohen v. Pacific Investment Management Co., 571 F.3d 672, 677 (7th Cir. 2009); [12] Payton v. County of Kane, 308 F.3d 673, 677 (7th Cir. 2002). On issues affecting class certification, however, a court may not simply assume the truth of the matters as asserted by the plaintiff. If there are material factual disputes, the court must "receive evidence . . . and resolve the disputes before deciding whether to certify the class." Szabo v. Bridgeport Machines, Inc., 249 F.3d 672, 676 (7th Cir. 2001). Plaintiffs bear the burden of showing that a proposed class satisfies the Rule 23 requirements, see, e.g., Trotter v. Klincar, 748 F.2d 1177, 1184 (7th Cir. 1984), but they need not make that showing to a degree of absolute certainty. It is sufficient if each disputed requirement has been proven by a preponderance of evidence. Teamsters Local 445 Freight Div. Pension Fund v. Bombardier Inc., 546 F.3d 196, 202 (2d Cir. 2008).

HN4[] We review the denial of plaintiffs' motion for class certification for an abuse of discretion. See Arreola v. Godinez, 546 F.3d 788, 794 (7th Cir. 2008). If, however, the district court bases its discretionary decision on an erroneous view of the law or a clearly erroneous assessment of the evidence, then it has necessarily abused its discretion. Cooter & Gell v. Hartmarx Corp., 496 U.S. 384, 405, 110 S. Ct. 2447, 110 L. Ed. 2d 359 (1990); [13] accord, Ervin v. OS Restaurant Services, Inc., 632 F.3d 971, 976 (7th Cir. 2011) (reversing denial of class certification).

Plaintiffs argue here that the district court made two reversible errors, one procedural, the other substantive. First, they contend that the district court failed to determine whether defense expert Noether's report and opinions were admissible under Federal Rule of Evidence 702 before ruling on the motion for class certification. Second, they argue that the district court incorrectly applied Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement. We agree on both points, turning our attention first to the procedural issue, then to the substantive issue, and finally to additional arguments that Northshore makes in support of the denial.

B. Daubert and Class Certification

HN5[] Under Rule 702 and Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals Inc., 509 U.S. 579, 113 S. Ct. 2786, 125 L. Ed. 2d 469 (1993), expert testimony is admissible only [*812] if (1) the expert testifies to valid technical, scientific, or other specialized knowledge; and (2) that testimony will assist the trier of fact. NutraSweet Co. v. X-L Eng'g Co., 227 F.3d 776, 787-88 (7th Cir. 2000). Before the hearing on class certification, plaintiffs moved to exclude the

[2] The district court did not consider whether plaintiffs had satisfied Rule 23(b)(3)'s additional requirement that "a class action [11] is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently adjudicating the controversy." Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 268 F.R.D. at 87 n.32.

[14] report of defendant's expert, Dr. Monica Noether, a private consulting economist. Plaintiffs argued that Noether's "economic analyses are fundamentally defective" and that her opinion "should be stricken as a whole."[3]

The district court denied plaintiffs' motion. Although it agreed that "Noether's report . . . include[s] some misleading information and analysis," the court concluded that plaintiffs' "two opportunities — in their reply brief and at oral argument — to respond to the conclusions contained in Noether's report" were sufficient to address the report's failings. Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 268 F.R.D. at 77. For this reason, the district court declined to "undertake a Daubert analysis at this procedural juncture," explaining that it was giving "Noether's report the weight it believes it is due." Id.

HN6[] When an expert's report or testimony is "critical to class certification," we have held that a district court must make a conclusive ruling on any challenge to that expert's qualifications or submissions before it may rule on a motion for class certification. American Honda Motor Co. v. Allen, 600 F.3d 813, 815-16 (7th Cir. 2010); see also Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2553-54, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011) (expressing doubts regarding district court's conclusion that "Daubert [16] did not apply to expert testimony at the certification stage of class-action proceedings").[4]

In American Honda, we used the word "critical" broadly to describe expert testimony important to an issue decisive for the motion for class certification. HN7[] If a district court has doubts about whether an expert's opinions may be critical for a class certification decision, the court should make an explicit Daubert ruling. An erroneous Daubert ruling excluding non-critical expert testimony would result, at worst, in the exclusion of expert testimony that did not matter. Failure to conduct such an analysis when necessary, however, would mean that the unreliable testimony remains in the record, a result that could easily lead to reversal on appeal.

The district court's refusal to rule on plaintiffs' Daubert motion was an error under American Honda. Noether's opinions were undoubtedly "critical" to the district court's decision. Her report [17] and [*813] testimony laid the foundation for Northshore's entire argument in opposition to class certification, and the district court obviously relied on Noether's reasoning when making its decision, quoting and discussing it many times. E.g., Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 268 F.R.D. at 86 (noting that Noether's "analysis . . . cast[s] doubt" on Dranove's contract analysis); id. (observing that Noether's supplemental report "suggest[s]" errors in Dranove's contract analysis). Given the importance of Noether's opinions, the district court needed to rule conclusively on plaintiffs' challenge to her opinions before it turned to the merits of plaintiffs' motion for class certification.

Instead of ruling on the admissibility of Noether's report, the court said it would give the report "the weight . . . it is due." Id. at 77. We recognize that this is a time-honored and often acceptable approach toward many difficult evidentiary issues when the judge is the trier of fact. This approach does not suffice, however, when expert testimony is in fact critical to class certification. As we explained in American Honda, HN8[] a district court cannot merely "leave[ ] open the questions of what portions of [18] [the expert's] testimony it may have decided (or will decide) to exclude." American Honda, 600 F.3d at 816. Those tough questions must be faced and squarely decided. Id. at 817, citing West v. Prudential Securities, Inc., 282 F.3d 935, 938 (7th Cir. 2002); see also Szabo,

[3] Northshore argues that plaintiffs moved to strike only Noether's initial report, not her later testimony and supplemental report, thereby waiving any argument to exclude those materials. We disagree. Plaintiffs moved to strike Noether's expert report and also explicitly requested that "her opinion . . . be stricken as a whole," App. 1261, in part because Noether lacked expertise regarding antitrust issues affecting "consumers of healthcare plans." App. 1264. Plaintiffs renewed that objection at the start of the hearing on class certification, Dkt. 418 at 5, and objected when Noether offered new information during that hearing in response to Dranove' rebuttal report, id. at 67-68, 94-95. The district court repeatedly put off dealing with the substance of these objections. Id. at 5, 69, 95. Plaintiffs' objections gave the district court and defendant ample opportunity to address the issues. Where the district court repeatedly put off dealing with the issues, plaintiffs [15] did not need to renew their unsuccessful objection every time the same witness attempted to provide additional information.

[4] We issued American Honda one day after the district court here issued its initial decision denying class certification. The redacted version of the district court's decision available to the public was released some time later, after our decision in American Honda.

249 F.3d at 676 ("Before deciding whether to allow a case to proceed as a class action . . . a judge should make whatever factual and legal inquiries are necessary under Rule 23.").

To avoid this conclusion, Northshore proposes that we adopt the asymmetric rule that a definitive Daubert ruling is necessary only when a district court grants class certification, as in American Honda, but not when the court denies certification, as here. In effect, Northshore argues that a plaintiff should be allowed to rely on an expert's opinion in support of class certification only if that opinion is backed by reliable methods and information, but that a defendant may rely on unqualified or unhelpful "expert" opinions.

This result-oriented attempt to narrow American Honda finds support in neither the irrelevant cases cited by Northshore nor anything in American Honda itself. We did not suggest in American Honda that denials of class [19] certification should be exempt from the strictures of Daubert and Rule 702. We made clear that HN9[] whenever an expert's report or testimony is critical to a class certification decision, a district court must rule conclusively on a challenge to the expert's qualifications or opinions before ruling on class certification, without regard to whether the district court ultimately grants or denies that motion. See American Honda, 600 F.3d at 815-16. The ruling is just as important to the plaintiffs as it is to the defendants. Northshore's proposed rule would also create an unworkable logical conundrum, requiring a court to determine first whether to certify a class before considering the admissibility of the evidence it relied upon in making that determination.

We also reject two secondary arguments Northshore makes for its proposed limitation of American Honda. First, Northshore emphasizes that such a limitation must be read into American Honda because only plaintiffs bear the burden of satisfying Rule 23's requirements while defendants may present no evidence if they so choose. Northshore Br. 29, citing Carnegie v. Household Int'l, Inc., 376 F.3d 656, 662 (7th Cir. 2004); In re American Medical Systems, Inc., 75 F.3d 1069, 1086 (6th Cir. 1996). [20] The general point about the burden of proof is correct but has no bearing on HN10[] Rule 702, which [*814] applies to plaintiffs and defendants alike, regardless of which side bears the burden of proof. The fact that a defendant is not required to present evidence to defeat class certification does not give that defendant license to offer irrelevant and unreliable evidence. Second, Northshore argues that we must have meant for American Honda to apply only to decisions granting class certification because a Daubert hearing is unnecessary when certification is denied on grounds not addressed by the expert in dispute. (Northshore Br. 30). But a Daubert hearing is necessary under American Honda only if the witness's opinion is "critical" to class certification. That requirement is not met if the court decides the motion for class certification on grounds not addressed by the witness.

To conclude on this procedural issue, we decline Northshore's invitation to cut the holding of American Honda in half with a new exception for denials of class certification. The district court should have ruled definitively on plaintiffs' Daubert motion and objections before ruling on their motion for class certification. [21] Northshore also argues that any error under American Honda was harmless. We disagree. As explained in the following section, the district court frequently discussed Noether's opinions in reaching the substantive decision that we find erroneous. We proceed to the primary substantive dispute between the parties regarding the proper application of Rule 23(b)(3) to the facts of this case.

C. Predominance and Antitrust Impact

HN11[] Rule 23(b)(3) permits class certification only if the questions of law or fact common to class members "pre-dominate" over questions that are individual to members of the class.[5] There is no mathematical or mechanical

[5] Rule 23(b)(3) also conditions class certification on whether the class action device is superior to other available methods for fairly and efficiently resolving the dispute in question. We need not consider whether plaintiffs have shown superiority in this case, as this issue was neither considered by the district court nor raised by either party on appeal. There are so many common issues of law and fact relating to the issue of Northshore's liability, however, that the superiority requirement [23] likely poses no serious obstacle to class certification here. See Klay v. Humana, Inc., 382 F.3d 1241, 1269 (11th Cir. 2004) (finding superiority under Rule 23(b)(3) and noting that "the more common issues predominate over individual issues, the more desirable a class action lawsuit will be as a vehicle for adjudicating the plaintiffs' claims"). And this case, at least on its face, implicates test for evaluating predominance. See 7AA Wright & Miller, Federal Practice & Procedure § 1778 (3d ed. 2011). The Supreme Court has discussed predominance in broad terms, explaining that the Rule 23(b)(3) "inquiry trains on the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member's case as a genuine controversy," with the purpose being to determine whether a proposed class is "sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." Amchem Products, Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 623, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997). While similar to Rule 23(a)'s requirements for typicality [22] and commonality, "the predominance criterion is far more demanding." Id. at 623-24. At the same time, the Supreme Court also commented in Amchem: "Predominance is a test [*815] readily met in certain cases alleging consumer or securities fraud or violations of the antitrust laws." Id. at 625. We understand the comment to mean that careful application of Rule 23 is necessary in antitrust cases, as in all cases, and that in antitrust cases, "Rule 23, when applied rigorously, will frequently lead to certification." Robert H. Klonoff, Antitrust Class Actions: Chaos in the Courts, 11 Stan. J.L. Bus. & Fin. 1, 7 (2005) (discussing Amchem); accord, Behrend v. Comcast Corp., 655 F.3d 182, 191 (3d Cir. 2011).

HN12[] Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance requirement is satisfied when "common questions represent a significant aspect of [a] case and . . . can be resolved for all members of [a] class in a single adjudication." Wright & Miller, supra, [24] § 1778. Or, to put it another way, common questions can predominate if a "common nucleus of operative facts and issues" underlies the claims brought by the proposed class. In re Nassau County Strip Search Cases, 461 F.3d 219, 228 (2d Cir. 2006), quoting Waste Mgmt. Holdings, Inc. v. Mowbray, 208 F.3d 288, 299 (1st Cir. 2000). "If, to make a prima facie showing on a given question, the members of a proposed class will need to present evidence that varies from member to member, then it is an individual question. If the same evidence will suffice for each member to make a prima facie showing, then it becomes a common question." Blades v. Monsanto Co., 400 F.3d 562, 566 (8th Cir. 2005). Individual questions need not be absent. The text of Rule 23(b)(3) itself contemplates that such individual questions will be present. The rule requires only that those questions not predominate over the common questions affecting the class as a whole.

HN13[] Analysis of predominance under Rule 23(b)(3) "begins, of course, with the elements of the underlying cause of action." Erica P. John Fund, Inc. v. Halliburton Co., 131 S. Ct. 2179, 2184, 180 L. Ed. 2d 24 (2011). Section 4 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15, requires plaintiffs [25] to prove: (1) that Northshore violated federal antitrust law; and (2) that the antitrust violation caused them some injury. In re Hydrogen Peroxide Antitrust Litig., 552 F.3d 305, 311 (3d Cir. 2008); Blades, 400 F.3d at 566; Bell Atlantic Corp. v. AT&T Corp., 339 F.3d 294, 302 (5th Cir. 2003). The same cases, and many others, also show that plaintiffs also must show damages, but individual proof of this element of a claim under the Clayton Act is not an obstacle to a showing of predominance. It is well established that the presence of individualized questions regarding damages does not prevent certification under Rule 23(b)(3). See Wal-Mart v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. at 2558 (deeming it "clear that individualized monetary claims belong in Rule 23(b)(3)"); Arreola, 546 F.3d at 801 (recognizing that "the need for individual damages determinations does not, in and of itself, require denial of [a] motion for certification" under Rule 23(b)(3)); Hardy v. City Optical, Inc., 39 F.3d 765, 771 (7th Cir. 1994) ("There have been many antitrust class actions in which the relief sought was damages, and the fact that the damages would generally be different for each member of the class was not deemed [26] an insuperable obstacle."); Allapattah Servs. v. Exxon Corp., 333 F.3d 1248, 1261 (11th Cir. 2003) ("numerous courts have recognized that the presence of individualized damages issues does not prevent a finding that the common issues in the case predominate"), aff'd, 545 U.S. 546, 125 S. Ct. 2611, 162 L. Ed. 2d 502 (2005); see also Klay v. Humana, Inc., 382 F.3d 1241, 1260 (11th Cir. 2004) (only in rare, extreme cases would individual issues of damages be so complex as to defeat class certification under Rule 23(b)(3)).

In this case, common questions clearly predominate in regard to whether Northshore's [*816] merger violated federal antitrust law. The focus of the dispute here is on the second element, referred to as "antitrust impact," Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311, or "fact of damage," Bell Atlantic, 339 F.3d at 302 n.12. Under Rule 23(b)(3), none of the specific concerns that we have previously said will prevent a finding of superiority. See, e.g., Harper v. Sheriff of Cook County, 581 F.3d 511, 516 (7th Cir. 2009) (finding no superiority where plaintiff's challenge to defendant's allegedly illegal jail management practices "can be satisfied in an individual suit without the management issues of a class action"); Andrews v. Chevy Chase Bank, 545 F.3d 570, 577 (7th Cir. 2008) (finding no superiority where class action seeking rescission of home mortgages would require a "multitude" of "individual rescission procedures").

plaintiffs had to show that it was possible to use common evidence to prove that Northshore's merger injured the members of the proposed class. To do so, plaintiffs presented Dranove's expert report and opinion. Dranove claimed that "if [Northshore] overcharged an insurer by a certain percentage, all or substantially all class members covered by that insurer will be overcharged [27] by approximately the same percentage." App. 1900. As a result, he said, "Overcharges to an insurer result in injury to that insurer as well as to all or substantially all other class members who are covered by that insurer." App. 1901. As the issue was developed further in the district court, however, it became considerably more complex.

If the market for health care services functioned like a market for a generic, undifferentiated commodity (i.e., corn, wheat, or pork bellies) traded on an exchange with standard contract terms and little opportunity for individual bargaining, showing antitrust impact through such overcharges would have been relatively simple. In such a market, one can in theory, at least, estimate simple supply and demand curves to show that an acquisition of market power raised price and lowered supply. That's antitrust impact from monopolization.

Real markets are not as simple and elegant as the classic economic model, and the market for hospital services seems to be particularly complex. Insurers and other third-party payors negotiate sophisticated contracts with health care providers. Through multi-year contracts for health care services, the parties may lock those [28] prices in place or negotiate for long-term price changes significantly different than would have been agreed if the prices were renegotiated each year. Factors such as a hospital's location, quality of services, and reputation also can affect the price of a particular service.

Adding even more complexity is the fact that insurers and health care providers negotiate contracts that cover not a single service but complex bundles of many different services and products. See, e.g., John C. Render & Neal A. Cooper, Survey of Recent Developments in Health Care Law, 37 Ind. L. Rev. 1161, 1189 (2004). A hypothetical bill for a Caesarian section, for example, might consist of a variety of bundled items: anesthesia, operating room use, surgeon's fee, post-operative care for the mother, newborn care for the baby, etc. A hospital could unbundle and re-bundle those items in different ways, adding some items in the overall charge and removing others, so that a later bill for a service still called a Caesarian section would charge for a different set of items and have a very different overall price. The record here reflects such complexity. For example, one contract repriced cardiology services after [29] the physicians' fees were "unbundled" from the prices and were charged separately. The nominal prices of the hospital's charges for cardiology services dropped, but after accounting for the unbundling to ensure an apples-to-apples comparison, the overall prices increased significantly.

Even without such unbundling or re-bundling, the prices of the individual component items are themselves subject to a wide variety of market influences. For example, an advance in anesthesia technology might result in a sharp decrease in the cost of anesthesia at the same time that a new and higher standard of care for a related service requires expensive new machinery. Without any exercise of market [*817] power, therefore, the price for the bundled service (say, a Caesarian section or a cardiac catheterization) might go up, go down, or stay level, despite substantial changes in the prices of the components.

As a result of these complexities, changes in the nominal prices charged for particular services might actually conceal rather than reveal a health care provider's exercise of unlawful market power. The price for a service may remain nominally the same or even decrease, but only because changes in the prices [30] of the underlying components of that service have changed or because the service has been restructured in a way that conceals the anticompetitive price increase.

Dranove proposed to account for these complexities by conducting what is known as a "difference-in-differences" or "DID" analysis. He would compare prices at Northshore's hospitals with prices at a control group of comparable area hospitals not party to the merger but otherwise presumably subject to the same market forces affecting prices in hospitals. App. 1901, 1904. The difference between price changes for Northshore and the control group, he explained, would estimate the average overcharge imposed on Northshore's patients due to Northshore's exercise of increased market power after the merger. App. 1904. "For example," he explained, if Northshore's hospitals "raise prices by 30% after the merger and a control group of hospitals raises price by 10%, . . . the 'difference-in-differences' is approximately 20%" and represents the approximate amount of Northshore's overcharges. App.

1921. If Northshore overcharged an insurer by this percentage, he explained, "all or substantially all class members covered by that insurer will [31] be overcharged by approximately the same percentage." App. 1926. Accordingly, Dranove concluded, a contract's "increase in average price will have a common impact on all or substantially all class members." Id.

As things turned out, however, even that approach does not deal sufficiently with all of the relevant variations that could confound the antitrust impact analysis. In denying class certification, the district court concluded that the viability of Dranove's methodology turned on "whether [Northshore] increased prices at a uniform rate across services." Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 268 F.R.D. at 85. The court added: "Dranove's method of proving classwide impact . . . rests on an assumption that [Northshore] increased prices at a uniform rate across services." Id. Such uniformity was absent, the district court concluded, noting for example that "even a cursory examination of the 2000 Payor A contract and the September 22, 2002 Payor A contract makes clear that the prices of some services changed at a variable rate." Id. at 86.[6] To the extent that Dranove claimed that the prices increased uniformly, the court believed that he "focused primarily on price changes within contracts [32] — changes that are usually attributable to escalator clauses." Id. Price changes controlled by escalator clauses "were not due to an exercise of market power," Northshore's expert testified, because Northshore "had the opportunity to exercise market power not within a contract period, but only at the time of renegotiation." Id.[7] Because plaintiffs' [*818] proposed method for proving classwide impact "relies on an assumption that [Dranove has] not been able to validate," the district court concluded, plaintiffs failed to establish predominance in regard to antitrust impact, so class certification was denied. Id. at 87.

On appeal, the parties raise two general arguments regarding the district court's denial of class certification. For their part, plaintiffs contend that the district court applied an incorrect standard of predominance under Rule 23(b)(3) when it made uniformity of price increases a condition for class certification. In response, Northshore contends that the district court was correct to require uniformity of price increases because plaintiffs conceded that such uniformity was necessary to Dranove's methodology for showing impact [34] to members of the class. We explain first that the district court applied too stringent a standard in evaluating predominance. We explain second that plaintiffs did not agree to or invite the use of the wrong standard.

1. Predominance and Non-Uniform Price Increases

The district court misapplied Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance standard when it made uniformity of nominal price increases a condition for class certification. HN14[] Under the proper standard, plaintiffs' "burden at the class certification stage [was] not to prove the element of antitrust impact," but only to "demonstrate that the element of antitrust impact is capable of proof at trial through evidence that is common to the class rather than individual to its members." Behrend v. Comcast Corp., 655 F.3d at 197, quoting with emphasis Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311-12; accord, Schleicher, 618 F.3d at 686 (noting that Rule 23's present structure is the result of a "decision . . . to separate class certification from the decision on the merits"); Blades, 400 F.3d at 566 ("To determine whether common questions predominate . . . the court must look only so far as to determine whether . . . common evidence could suffice to make out a [35] prima facie case for the class.").

[6] The published opinion refers to "Payor A" because much of the relevant pricing and contractual evidence was subject to a protective order.

[7] The district court and Noether appear to have believed that escalator clauses — increasing contract prices during a long-term contract — can never reflect the exercise of market power because they take effect long after contract negotiations have concluded. This is not correct. The fact that an escalator clause may be triggered months or even years after contract negotiations occurred does not necessarily mean that the escalator clause was [33] immune from one contracting party's exercise of market power. Like the initial prices set in the contracts, the terms of the escalator clauses — the services to which those clauses would apply, the frequency of any price increases, and the magnitude of those price increases — were the products of the negotiations between the parties to those contracts. A firm may use market power to ensure that those negotiations result in an initial contract price higher than it might have otherwise been able to obtain. We see no general reason such a firm could not also use that market power to obtain escalator clauses more generous than would have been possible otherwise.

Through his proposed difference-in-differences or DID analysis of the contracts between Northshore and its insurers, Dranove claimed that he could show whether and to what extent Northshore's post-merger price increases were the result of increased market power resulting from the merger. In other words, Dranove claimed that he could use common evidence — the post-merger price increases Northshore negotiated with insurers — to show that all or most of the insurers and individuals who received coverage through those insurers suffered some antitrust injury as a result of the merger. App. 2541. That was all that was necessary to show predominance for purposes of Rule 23(b)(3). See Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311-12.

Contrary to Northshore's view, Dranove's ability to use common evidence to show impact on the class did not ultimately depend on assuming the uniformity of the nominal price increases imposed under any [*819] individual contract. For reasons we explained above, such uniformity would certainly simplify matters. It would allow Dranove to plug a single percentage ? the uniform price increase imposed on all patients covered under an individual contract [36] — into his DID analysis to calculate the antitrust impact on those patients covered by that contract. But as Dranove explained in his report, a lack of uniformity would only require him to do more DID analyses for each contract — one analysis for each individual non-uniform price increase imposed in the contract being analyzed. App. 2540. As a simple example, if one post-merger contract raised the cost of hypodermic needles by 30 percent but increased the cost of saline solution by only 20 percent, DID comparison to price changes for the control group for those individual price increases could still be used to show any antitrust impact those price increases had on all patients who paid for hypodermic needles, saline solution, or both under that contract. App. 2540-41. In a more complex world, multiple analyses would be needed to show more accurately a contract's precise impact on class members. That need does not change the fact that those analyses all rely on common evidence — the contract setting out the non-uniform price increases — and a common methodology to show that impact. HN15[] The ability to use such common evidence and common methodology to prove a class's claims is sufficient [37] to support a finding of predominance on the issue of antitrust impact for certification under Rule 23(b)(3). See Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 311-12.

By requiring uniformity of nominal price increases within and across contracts, the district court misread Rule 23(b)(3) to require a greater showing of common evidence than is contemplated by that rule. Under the district court's approach, Rule 23(b)(3) would require not only common evidence and methodology, but also common results for members of the class. That approach would come very close to requiring common proof of damages for class members, which is not required. To put it another way, the district court asked not for a showing of common questions, but for a showing of common answers to those questions. Rule 23(b)(3) does not impose such a heavy burden. See Blades, 400 F.3d at 566 ("The nature of the evidence that will suffice to resolve a question determines whether the question is common or individual."); see also Rule 23(b)(3) (requiring that common "questions" predominate). Because the district court applied the wrong legal standard when analyzing plaintiffs' motion for class certification, the district court abused its discretion [38] when it denied the motion. See Ervin, 632 F.3d at 976; Hydrogen Peroxide, 552 F.3d at 312.

2. The Concession Issue

Northshore argues that these principles do not matter in the end because, it says, plaintiffs conceded that their case for common impact depended on uniform nominal price increases. In support, Northshore relies primarily on Dranove's confirmation at the hearing on the motion for class certification that "the viability of [his] method" came down to whether Northshore "really [did] increase prices at a uniform rate across services." Dkt. 418 at 41. On cross-examination, however, Dranove clarified that his "DID analysis can be performed with or without the uniformity." Id. at. 57. These statements, seemingly contradictory on their face, are easily reconciled once it is remembered that Dranove proposed two alternative methodologies: one in which the uniformity of merger-related price increases was presumed, and another in which such uniformity was absent. Which method to use depended on the degree of uniformity.

If price increases were, as Dranove initially believed, entirely or largely uniform, [*820] then he proposed to show the merger's impact on the individual class members by [39] simply plugging the average price increase imposed by any given contract into his DID analysis. App. 1904-06, 1909, 1926, 1931, 2523-25, 2530, 2584. In those circumstances, the average price would accurately reflect the individual price increases found in that contract. If the average contract price went up an average of 20 percent, and all of the services in that contract experienced uniform price increases, each individual service also went up 20 percent in price. App. 1909, 2523, 2571.

This specific methodology relied on uniform nominal price increases, but the actual evidence was not that simple. As Dranove implicitly acknowledged in his reply report, if a contract's individual service prices went up at non-uniform rates due to Northshore's unequal exercise of market power, then DID analysis using that contract's overall average price increase would reveal little about the merger's antitrust impact on individual class members covered by that contract. App. 2523 n.1. According to Dranove, however, it would be most unusual for a firm possessing market power in a geographic market to exercise that power selectively to increase the prices of only some of its services. App. 1931-33, [40] 2539.

For this reason, Dranove believed that any non-uniform price increases observed in Northshore's contracts with insurers could be explained by what he called "restructuring," or changes in price resulting from variations in Northshore's marginal costs or the re-bundling of component services discussed above. App. 2530, 2543-45. Such restructuring, he said, was unrelated to market power, meaning that services exhibiting non-uniform price increases could be treated as if they were subject to the same percentage price increase imposed on all other services covered in the same contract. App. 2543-44. If, for example, the price for one service went up 30 percent while all other services in that same contract went up only 20 percent, that additional 10 percent increase would not be treated as an exercise of market power for purposes of his DID analysis. Only the 20 percent increase shared by all other services in the same contract would reflect the use of market power. App. 2544. As a result, he explained, any non-uniform price increases imposed in a single contract with an insurance provider did not foreclose his use of that contract's average price increase to calculate accurately [41] the impact to all patients covered by that contract. App. 2545.

Even if non-uniform price increases in a contract resulted not from restructuring but from Northshore's differential exercise of market power across different services, Dranove explained that he could still use those contracts to show impact on the class members. At his deposition, Dranove explained that if his review of documents revealed a lack of uniformity unexplained by restructuring, he would simply "adapt the methodology." Dkt. 284, Ex. I at 113, 157-58. In his initial report, Dranove explained that he could adapt his analysis if needed to accommodate "selective" price increases regarding certain services. App. 1932. And his reply report showed exactly how he would do that. The reply report emphasized that the DID analysis was fully capable of addressing non-uniform price increases: "it is still possible to apply a common methodological framework to measure impact even [when Northshore] increased prices for different services at different rates." App. 2539. As noted above, he would do so simply by conducting as many DID analyses as there were non-uniform price increases in a particular insurer's contract with Northshore. [42] App. 2540. In this way, Dranove explained, he would be able to calculate "different overcharges [*821] across different service categories" despite any non-uniform increase in the prices charged for those services. App. 2540-41.

In other words, uniformity of nominal price increases was not necessary to Dranove's proposed methodology for determining antitrust impact to the proposed class. This explains why Dranove was willing (though perhaps a little too reluctant for his own good) to concede the non-uniformity of the price increases in Northshore's post-merger contracts. In fact, Dranove acknowledged several times that Northshore's prices did not always increase uniformly, explaining that Northshore "almost invariably increase[d] prices at the same rate," App. 2523, and that price increases "are applied across-the-board for all or nearly all services," App. 2524, in the "vast majority of cases." App. 2525 (emphases added). He acknowledged that one contract called for "a dramatic decrease in the price" for some services at the same time it "impose[d] a significant increase in the price of other service[s]." App. 2543.

The data in Appendix D of Dranove's reply report became the focus of attention [43] during the hearing, in the district court's decision, and on appeal. The parties make much of the evidence regarding "Payor A" contained in Exhibits 161 and 162 admitted under seal in the class certification hearing. Dranove had included the price changes in Payor A's contracts in his analysis showing generally uniform rates of price changes. Noether used Payor A's contracts to show he was wrong. The district judge focused on the issue, and counsel for the plaintiffs told the judge: "I think you're just going to have to look at the numbers yourself." Dkt. 418 at 127-28. The judge did so, and in her opinion denying class certification asserted that "of the 18 prices listed in the renegotiated September 22, 2002 contract, 6 increased at a uniform rate, 9 increased at variable rates, and 3 changed pricing methodologies from the previous contract, making it difficult to draw a comparison." 268 F.R.D. at 86.

We have also examined the contract, by comparing the 2002 prices in Exhibit 162 to the 2000 prices in Exhibit 161. The prices for eight categories of inpatient services all increased by approximately 6.0 percent. In other words, those price increases were uniform.[8] For three categories [44] of outpatient services, the pricing methodology stayed the same for two (a discounted percentage of billed charges), while the third changed from a flat rate per case to a percentage of the billed charges.[9] Where the superficial variation occurred was in the pricing for specified cardiac services. There were nine categories. Five showed decreases of 9.3 to 13.0 percent. Two showed increases of 14.8 and 60 percent, respectively, and two changed from flat rates to a percentage of billed charges. The cardiac price changes, both in terms of variations and the significant price reductions, appear to be inconsistent with Dranove's approach. When one looks more closely, however, one sees that there was a significant restructuring of these services and their pricing. The baseline prices from 2000 all included the professional services of physicians. App. 2725. In the 2002 contract, the professional services of physicians have been removed from the prices. App. 2728. These superficially non-uniform changes in prices [*822] therefore merely pose the sort of manageable challenge that Dranove's methodology can handle. They do not undermine the methodology itself.

If Dranove believed that his entire methodology was invalidated by non-uniform price increases, he expressed that belief in a most unusual way. He admitted the existence of non-uniform increases in nominal prices. He offered an economic explanation — restructuring — why this apparent lack of uniformity was misleading. He included data in Appendix D of his reply report showing that some non-uniformity appeared even in contracts that had not undergone any restructuring. And he explained in his reports how he would account for that lack of uniformity. Dranove did not concede away (and certainly not in a single statement at the class certification hearing) the viability of the very methodology that he had defended so vigorously over the course of two lengthy expert reports. The district court's conclusion to the contrary was a [46] clear error.[10]

D*. Class Members Who Did Not, or Could Not, Suffer Injury*

The district court based its denial of class certification on two critical errors: (1) a misapplication of Rule 23(b)(3)'s predominance standard; and (2) an erroneous belief that Dranove's DID methodology would be valid only if Northshore's contracts with insurers uniformly increased prices across all services. On appeal, Northshore argues that, even absent these errors, plaintiffs' proposed class cannot be certified because it contains many individuals [47] who were not injured by Northshore's alleged exercise of market power. First, Northshore argues that the evidence shows that Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois, plaintiffs' "largest putative class member," as well as a number of other individuals, suffered no injury at all. Second, Northshore argues that, for several reasons, a number of class members could not have been harmed by its post-merger price increases. We address each of these analytically distinct categories of individuals in turn.

1. Blue Cross and Other Allegedly Uninjured Parties

[8] The categories of inpatient services [45] were general inpatient care, intensive care, vaginal delivery, C-section, boarder baby, psychiatric/substance abuse care, telemetry/PCU, and skilled nursing.

[9] The two categories of outpatient services that stayed the same were ambulatory surgery and "other outpatient services," which included emergency room services. The third category was cardiac catheterization.

[10] The district court expressed serious doubt that all nominally non-uniform price increases were actually uniform price increases that only appeared non-uniform because of behind-the-scenes restructuring. Evanston Northwestern Healthcare, 268 F.R.D. at 86 n.31. Because such uniformity was as unnecessary under Rule 23(b)(3) as it was to Dranove's DID analysis, our analysis remains the same regardless of whether the district court's doubts were well-founded. It appears that the difference of opinion on this point may have stemmed from an ambiguity in how the experts and the parties were using the term "restructure" to deal with some non-uniformity in nominal prices.

Northshore first contends that a number of members of the putative class were not harmed by any post-merger price increases. Northshore argues that Blue Cross was not actually harmed by any post-merger price increases, relying largely on Blue Cross's affidavit stating, without any real explanation, that it "did not pay artificially inflated prices" and did not suffer "any injury or damage," App. 722-23, as well as the FTC's conclusions that Blue Cross experienced no merger-related price increases between the merger in 2001 and the FTC proceedings in 2005.[11] As a result, Northshore argues, none of the class [*823] members who paid prices negotiated by [48] Blue Cross were harmed either. Northshore makes a similar argument regarding individuals who it says were not injured because "any price increases were passed on or borne by someone other than the class member."[12]

All of this is at best an argument that some class members' claims will fail on the merits if and when damages are decided, a fact generally irrelevant to the district court's decision on class certification. See, e.g., Schleicher, 618 F.3d at 687 ("The chance, even the certainty, that a class will lose on the merits does not prevent its certification."); Payton v. County of Kane, 308 F.3d 673, 677 (7th Cir. 2002) (observing that "a determination on the propriety of class certification should not turn on [the] likelihood of success on the merits"). As we have previously explained:

> HN17[] a class will often include persons who have not been injured by the defendant's conduct; indeed this is almost inevitable [50] because at the outset of the case many of the members of the class may be unknown, or if they are known still the facts bearing on their claims may be unknown. Such a possibility or indeed inevitability does not preclude class certification . . . .

Kohen, 571 F.3d at 677.

The reasons a court may not decline to certify a class merely because it believes the class's claims will fail on the merits should be clear. For one thing, it is unlikely that discovery regarding the merits of a claim will be complete by the time the court is called upon to certify a class. See HN18[] Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(c)(1) (requiring ruling on class certification at "an early practicable time"). Any consideration of the merits at the class certification stage also runs the risk of supplanting the jury as the finder of fact. See Behrend, 655 F.3d at 199. This risk is particularly troubling because HN19[] the procedural protections available for such early judicial evaluations of the merits — such as the assumption under Rule 12(b)(6) that allegations in the complaint are true and the Rule 56 requirement to give the non-moving party the benefit of conflicting evidence — are not available under Rule 23. See Szabo, 249 F.3d at 675 [51] ("The proposition that a district judge must accept all of the complaint's allegations when deciding whether to certify a class cannot be found in Rule 23 and has nothing to recommend it.").

Perhaps Northshore could have used its evidence regarding Blue Cross to argue that Dranove's methodologies were flawed. That would be an appropriate and limited use of merits evidence at the certification stage. See Schleicher, 618 F.3d at 685 (HN20[] "a court may take a peek at the merits before certifying a class," but the peek must be "limited to those aspects of the merits that affect the decisions essential [*824] under Rule 23"). But Northshore never developed such an argument in its briefs to this court, thus waiving that argument on appeal. E.g.,

[11] The ALJ observed during the FTC proceedings that this was likely because Blue Cross "had a very strong bargaining position against [Northshore]" and had "power to limit [Northshore's] price increases," and did not "undermine the conclusion that [Northshore] gained market power through the merger. *In re Evanston Northwestern Healthcare Corp., 2005 FTC LEXIS 146, 2005 WL 2845790, at 138 (F.T.C. 2005). On review, the FTC declined to address this "sticky and unsettled issue[ ]" because "the record demonstrates that the merger likely gave [Northshore] sufficient market power to increase the average price that it charged to all [insurers]." *2007 FTC LEXIS 210, 2007 WL 2286195, at 52. We express no opinion on this matter, which, for the same reasons we explain below, is an issue beyond the scope of class certification.

[12] Northshore's reasons for making this latter argument are evident but misguided: the third parties to whom those costs were passed on by members of plaintiffs' proposed class lack federal antitrust standing [49] under the "indirect purchaser" rule. See Illinois Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977). But under Illinois Brick, HN16[] the ability of a direct purchaser to pass on higher costs to others does not undermine its ability to sue under the Clayton Act. BCS Services, Inc. v. Heartwood 88, LLC, 637 F.3d 750, 756 (7th Cir. 2011) ("antitrust violators are not allowed to offset against their liability the amount of loss that the direct purchasers . . . who are allowed to sue, were able to pass on").

Awe v. Ashcroft, 324 F.3d 509, 512-13 (7th Cir. 2003). The argument that Northshore has made, however, is one that we have rejected time and again. See Schleicher, 618 F.3d at 687; Kohen, 571 F.3d at 677; Payton, 308 F.3d at 677. We now reject yet again. Also, even if we could reach the merits of plaintiffs' claims involving Blue Cross, the barebones affidavit on which Northshore relies did not so thoroughly disprove those claims as to render any further presentation [52] of evidence to the contrary pointless.[13]

2. Class Members "Immune" From Injury

Northshore next argues that class certification is inappropriate because the class contains a number of individuals who could not have been harmed by any post-merger price increases. Among such individuals, Northshore says, are those putative class members who "met their annual plan out-of-pocket maximum or their deductible regardless of any price increase," as well as those individuals whose contracts "protect[ ] against any price increases."

At first glance, it would seem that Northshore is arguing, as it did in regard to Blue Cross, that certification must be denied because plaintiffs' proposed class contains members whose claims will fail on the [53] merits. In actuality, however, Northshore is arguing that the class for which certification is requested is fatally overbroad because it contains members who could not have been harmed by any post-merger price increases — Blue Cross certainly could have been harmed, but arguably might not have been for one reason or another.[14]

This distinction is critical for class certification purposes. As explained above, HN21[] if a proposed class consists largely (or entirely, for that matter) of members who are ultimately shown to have suffered no harm, that may not mean that the class was improperly certified but only that the class failed to meet its burden of proof on the merits. See Schleicher, 618 F.3d at 686 ("Rule 23 allows certification of classes that are fated to lose as well as classes that are sure to win."). If, however, a class is defined so broadly as to include a great number of members who for some reason could not have been harmed by the defendant's allegedly unlawful conduct, the class is defined too broadly to permit certification. [54] See Kohen, 571 F.3d at 677 (explaining that "if the [class] definition is so broad that it sweeps within it persons who could not have been injured by the defendant's conduct, it is too broad" and the class should not be certified). For example, if plaintiffs had sought certification of a class shown to include an high percentage of individuals who paid for medical services at Northshore's hospitals after the merger but under Northshore's pre-merger contracts with insurers (i.e., a multi-year contract signed in 1999), that class obviously could not be certified — it would contain a vast number of people who could not have been harmed by the merger because they purchased medical services in the absence of the market power allegedly [*825] created by that merger. See, e.g., Oshana v. Coca-Cola Co., 472 F.3d 506, 514 (7th Cir. 2006) (affirming, in class action alleging deceptive advertising, denial of certification of class defined so broadly that it included "millions" of individuals who were not deceived).

This distinction — between class members who were not harmed and those who could not have been harmed — stems in part from the "in terrorem character of a class action." Kohen, 571 F.3d at 678. [55] Even if a class's claim is weak, the sheer number of class members and the potential payout that could be required if all members prove liability might force a defendant to settle a meritless claim in order to avoid breaking the company. Id. While that prospect is often feared with large classes, the effect can be magnified unfairly if it results from a class defined so broadly as to include many members who could not bring a valid claim even under the best of circumstances. E.g., Oshana, 472 F.3d at 514. For this reason, HN22[] "a class should not be certified if it is apparent that it contains a great many persons who have suffered no injury at the hands of the defendant." Kohen, 571 F.3d at 677. There is no precise measure for "a great many." Such determinations are a matter of degree, and will turn on the facts as they appear from case to case.

[13] This discussion may prove wholly academic. Blue Cross has indicated that it does not wish to participate in any class action against Northshore, App. 723, so if a class is certified, it will opt out as is its right under Rule 23(b)(3). In light of Dranove's analysis indicating that Blue Cross and its policyholders suffered losses of $110 million as a result of the merger, however, Blue Cross probably would be within its rights if it chose to rethink its position.

[14] Northshore failed to appreciate this distinction, which is why it erroneously included all of these individuals in a single argument concerning overbreadth.

HN23[] The problem posed by class members whose claims may fail on the merits for individual reasons is the obverse of a different problem with class definition: the problem of the "fail-safe" class: one that is defined so that whether a person qualifies as a member depends on whether the person has a valid claim. Such a class definition is improper because [56] a class member either wins or, by virtue of losing, is defined out of the class and is therefore not bound by the judgment. See Randleman v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 646 F.3d 347, 352 (6th Cir. 2011) (fail-safe class definition was one of two grounds for decertifying class); Premier Electrical Const. Co. v. National Elec. Contractors Ass'n, 814 F.2d 358, 361-63 (7th Cir. 1987) (explaining that Rule 23 was amended in 1968 to prevent "one-way intervention"); Adashunas v. Negley, 626 F.2d 600, 604 (7th Cir. 1980) (affirming denial of class certification), quoting Dafforn v. Rousseau Associates, Inc., 1976 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 13910, 1976 WL 1358 (N.D. Ind. 1976) (Eschbach, J.); Campbell v. First American Title Ins. Co., 269 F.R.D. 68, 73-74 (D. Me. 2010); Roe v. Bridgestone Corp., 492 F. Supp. 2d 988, 992 n.1 (S.D. Ind. 2007); Genenbacher v. CenturyTel Fiber Co. II, 244 F.R.D. 485, 488 (C.D. Ill. 2007); Indiana State Employees Ass'n. v. Indiana State Highway Comm'n, 78 F.R.D. 724, 725 (S.D. Ind. 1978).

Defining a class so as to avoid, on one hand, being overinclusive and, on the other hand, the fail-safe problem is more of an art than a science. Either problem can and often should be solved by refining the class [57] definition rather than by flatly denying class certification on that basis. See, e.g., Campbell, 269 F.R.D. at 73-74 (court revised class definition to correct problem); Lewis v. First American Title Ins. Co., 265 F.R.D. 536, 551 (D. Idaho 2010) (same); Carson P. ex rel. Foreman v. Heineman, 240 F.R.D. 456, 492 (D. Neb. 2007) (same); Flanagan v. Allstate Ins. Co., 228 F.R.D. 617, 618-19 (N.D. Ill. 2005) (same).

We are not persuaded that plaintiff's proposed class is so overly broad as to require denial of certification in this case. As for the individuals whose contracts purportedly protected them from price increases, Northshore has given us no indication how many such individuals actually exist. In fact, Northshore's brief does not call our attention to even a single contract actually containing such a provision, let alone provide any basis to believe [*826] that a "great many" putative class members entered into such contracts. And Northshore admits that only about 2.4 percent of the putative class members paid only their out-of-pocket maximums or deductibles. While this may prove, depending on the ultimate size of the class at issue here, to be a significant number of additional plaintiffs, [58] a 2.4 percent decrease in the size of the class is certainly not significant enough to justify denial of certification. Cf. Oshana, 472 F.3d at 514 (affirming denial of certification and noting that millions of people were improperly included in the proposed class).[15] Accordingly, we reject Northshore's argument that plaintiffs' proposed class is impermissibly overbroad. Of course, the district court is free to revisit this issue at a later time if discovery shows that the number of members who could not have been harmed by the merger was more significant than it appears at this time. See Kohen, 571 F.3d at 679 (noting that defendant was free to depose a random sample of the class to determine whether an impermissibly high portion of the class could not have been harmed by the defendant's actions and, if so, request decertification of the class).

IV. Conclusion

As explained above, the district court's denial of class certification was based on a misinterpretation of the factual record, namely, the court's erroneous conclusion that Dranove had conceded away the validity of the common method by which he proposed to show antitrust impact on members of the proposed class. Once that erroneous conclusion is set aside, the evidence shows that Dranove can use common evidence and his difference-in-differences methodology to estimate the antitrust impact, if any, of Northshore's merger on the members of that class. Together with the common questions and evidence on other liability issues, this was sufficient to show predominance under Rule 23(b)(3). Northshore's remaining arguments against class certification are not

---

[15] HN24[] In circumstances such as these, involving minor overbreadth problems that do not call into question the validity of the class as a whole, the better course is not to deny class certification entirely but to amend the class definition as needed to correct for the overbreadth. Cf. Washington v. Walker, 734 F.2d 1237, 1240 (7th Cir. 1984) (noting [59] that district court conditioned grant of certification on plaintiff's redefinition of class). The district court is free to address this issue as it sees fit after remand.

ELECTRICAL CONTRACTORS, INC., ET AL. v. DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ET AL.

Prior History: [*1] Action for injunctive relief in connection with the plaintiffs' submission of bids on certain municipal construction projects, for declaratory relief with respect to the imposition of certain mandatory project labor agreements by the defendant city of Hartford, and for other relief, brought to the Superior Court in the judicial district of Hartford, where the case was removed to the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut; thereafter, the District Court, Underhill, J., determined that the plaintiffs had standing to bring their action but dismissed their federal constitutional claims and remanded the case to the judicial district of Hartford for resolution of the remaining state claims; subsequently, the court, Sheldon, J., granted the plaintiffs' motion to add Mark K. McQuillan as a defendant and the defendants' motions to dismiss and rendered judgment thereon, from which the plaintiffs appealed.

A project labor agreement is a prehire collective bargaining agreement, which requires all contractors and subcontractors on a construction project to comply with the terms of all existing collective bargaining agreements with unions representing workers from the trades performing work on the project, and requires all project workers to join the unions for their respective trades, to remain members in good standing of such unions, and not to strike while the project is under construction.

HN2[] Justiciability, Standing

Standing is the legal right to set judicial machinery in motion. One cannot rightfully invoke the jurisdiction of the court unless he or she has, in an individual or representative capacity, some real interest in the cause of action, or a legal or equitable right, title or interest in the subject matter of the controversy. When standing is put in issue, the question is whether the person whose standing is challenged is a proper party to request an adjudication of the issue. Standing requires no more than a colorable claim of injury; a party ordinarily establishes standing by allegations of injury. Similarly, standing exists to attempt to vindicate arguably protected interests.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > Injury in Fact

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > Personal Stake

HN3[] Standing, Injury in Fact

Standing is established by showing that the party claiming it is authorized by statute to bring suit or is classically aggrieved. The fundamental test for determining aggrievement encompasses a well-settled twofold determination: first, the party claiming aggrievement must successfully demonstrate a specific, personal and legal interest in the subject matter of the challenged action, as distinguished from a general interest, such as is the concern of all members of the community as a whole. Second, the party claiming aggrievement must successfully establish that this specific personal and legal interest has been specially and injuriously affected by the challenged action. Aggrievement is established if there is a possibility, as distinguished from a certainty, that some legally protected interest has been adversely affected.

Public Contracts Law > Dispute Resolution > Bid Protests

HN4[] Justiciability, Standing

In the context of competitive bidding, it is well established that an unsuccessful bidder on a state or municipal contract has no contractual right under the common law that would afford standing to challenge the award of a contract. A bid, even the lowest responsible one, submitted in response to an invitation for bids is only an offer which, until accepted by the municipality, does not give rise to a contract between the parties. An unsuccessful bidder, therefore, has no legal or equitable right in the contract. Not unlike any other person whose offer has been rejected, the disappointed bidder has no right to judicial intervention. Moreover, no statute grants unsuccessful bidders standing to challenge the award of a state contract. In particular, state and local competitive bidding laws have not been enacted in order to protect bidders. These laws serve to guard against abuses in the award of contracts such as favoritism, fraud or corruption and are enacted solely for the benefit of the public and in no sense create any rights in those who submit bids.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > General Overview

Public Contracts Law > Dispute Resolution > Bid Protests

HN5[] Justiciability, Standing

Despite substantial constraints, courts recognize a limited exception to the rules of standing in order to provide a means of protecting the public's interest in properly implemented competitive bidding processes. Under this exception, unsuccessful bidders have standing to challenge the award of a public contract where fraud, corruption or acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process existed. Such a suit is brought by one who suffers injury as a result of the illegal activity, but the suit itself is brought in the public interest by one acting essentially as a private attorney general. The policy to limit standing so as to deny some claims brought by unsuccessful and precluded bidders is designed to protect twin goals that serve the public interest in various, sometimes conflicting, ways. The standing rules aim to strike the proper balance between fulfilling the purposes of the competitive bidding statutes and preventing frequent litigation that might result in extensive delay in the commencement and completion of government projects to the detriment of the public.

HN6[] Standards of Review, De Novo Review

Because the issue of standing implicates subject matter jurisdiction, it may be a proper basis for granting a motion to dismiss. Conn. Gen. Prac. Book, R. Super. Ct. § 10-31(a)(1). The standard of review for a court's decision on a motion to dismiss is well settled. A motion to dismiss tests, inter alia, whether, on the face of the record, the court is without jurisdiction. Appellate review of the court's ultimate legal conclusion and resulting determination of the motion to dismiss is de novo. When a court decides a jurisdictional question raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss, it must consider the allegations of the complaint in their most favorable light. In this regard, a court must take the facts to be those alleged in the complaint, including those facts necessarily implied from the allegations, construing them in a manner most favorable to the pleader. The motion to dismiss admits all facts which are well pleaded, invokes the existing record and must be decided upon that alone. It is the burden of the party who seeks the exercise of jurisdiction in his favor clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute.

Civil Procedure > ... > Justiciability > Standing > Personal Stake

HN7[] Standing, Injury in Fact

In order to have standing to challenge a bid specification for a municipal project that required the successful bidder to agree to abide by a project labor agreement (PLA), a general contractor member has to establish a colorable claim that: (1) either it bid on the project, or it would have submitted an equivalent bid, but for the PLA requirement; and (2) inclusion of the PLA requirement effectuated fraud, corruption, favoritism or other acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process.

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent > Dicta

HN8[] Judicial Precedent, Dicta

Once it becomes clear that a trial court lacks subject matter jurisdiction to hear the plaintiffs' complaint, any further discussion of the merits is pure dictum. Dictum is an observation or remark made by a judge in pronouncing an opinion upon a cause, concerning some rule, principle, or application of law, or the solution of a question suggested by the case at bar, but not necessarily involved in the case or essential to its determination. Statements and comments in an opinion concerning some rule of law or legal proposition not necessarily involved nor essential to determination of the case are obiter dicta, and lack the force of an adjudication.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN9[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

Trial courts addressing motions to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction apply different rules and procedures depending on the state of the record at the time the motion is filed: When a trial court decides a jurisdictional question raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss on the basis of the complaint alone, it must consider the allegations of the complaint in their most favorable light. In this regard, a court must take the facts to be those alleged in the complaint, including those facts necessarily implied from the allegations, construing them in a manner most favorable to the pleader. In contrast, if the complaint is supplemented by undisputed facts established by affidavits submitted in support of the motion to dismiss, other types of undisputed evidence, and/or public records of which judicial notice may be taken, the trial court, in determining the jurisdictional issue, may consider these supplementary undisputed facts and need not conclusively presume the validity of the allegations of the complaint.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN10[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

If affidavits and/or other evidence submitted in support of a defendant's motion to dismiss conclusively establish that jurisdiction is lacking, and the plaintiff fails to undermine this conclusion with counteraffidavits or other evidence, the trial court may dismiss the action without further proceedings. If, however, the defendant submits either no proof to rebut the plaintiffs jurisdictional allegations or only evidence that fails to call those allegations into question, the plaintiff need not supply counteraffidavits or other evidence to support the complaint, but may rest on the jurisdictional allegations therein.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

HN11[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

When a jurisdictional determination is dependent on the resolution of a critical factual dispute, it cannot be decided on a motion to dismiss in the absence of an evidentiary hearing to establish jurisdictional facts. Likewise, if the question of jurisdiction is intertwined with the merits of the case, a court cannot resolve the jurisdictional question without a hearing to evaluate those merits. An evidentiary hearing is necessary because a court cannot make a critical factual jurisdictional finding based on memoranda and documents submitted by the parties.

Civil Procedure > ... > Responses > Defenses, Demurrers & Objections > Motions to Dismiss

Public Contracts Law > Dispute Resolution > Bid Protests

HN12[] Defenses, Demurrers & Objections, Motions to Dismiss

In most cases involving competitive bidding on public contracts, the allegations alone should provide a sufficient factual basis for deciding the jurisdictional issue of whether the plaintiff made a colorable claim of injury.

Conn. Gen. Stat. § 4a-100, also known as the prequalification statute, requires all bidders on public construction projects to satisfy certain minimum standards in order to bid or perform work on such projects. Thus, given that the competitive bidding laws provide that a contract shall be awarded to the lowest responsible qualified bidder, Conn. Gen. Stat. § 10-287(b)(1), the prequalification statute ensures that bidders are both responsible and qualified, and cost necessarily rises to the top of the list of appropriate considerations for public contract specifications.

HN28[] Collective Bargaining & Labor Relations, Federal Preemption

Congress implicitly mandates two types of preemption as necessary to implement federal labor policy. The first, known as Garmon preemption is intended to preclude state interference with the National Labor Relations Board's interpretation and active enforcement of the integrated scheme of regulation established by the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C.S. § 141 et seq. To this end, Garmon preemption forbids states to regulate activity that the Act protects, prohibits, or arguably protects or prohibits. The second, known as Machinists preemption, forbids both the National Labor Relations Board and states to regulate conduct that Congress intended be unregulated because left to be controlled by the free play of economic forces. Machinists preemption is based on the premise that Congress struck a balance of protection, prohibition, and laissez-faire in respect to union organization, collective bargaining, and labor disputes.

Civil Procedure > ... > Federal & State Interrelationships > State Sovereign Immunity > General Overview

HN32[] Federal & State Interrelationships, State Sovereign Immunity

Sovereign immunity relates to a court's subject matter jurisdiction over a case and therefore presents a question of law over which an appellate court exercises de novo review. The principle that the state cannot be sued without its consent, or sovereign immunity, is well established under the case law. It has deep roots in Connecticut and the legal system in general, finding its origin in ancient common law. Not only do courts recognize the state's immunity as an entity, but they also recognize that because the state can act only through its officers and agents, a suit against a state officer concerning a matter in which the officer represents the state is, in effect, against the state. Exceptions to this doctrine are few and narrowly construed under Connecticut jurisprudence. The presumption of sovereign immunity is not absolute and may be overcome (1) when the legislature, either expressly or by force of a necessary implication, statutorily waives the state's sovereign immunity, (2) when an action seeks declaratory or injunctive relief on the basis of a substantial claim that the state or one of its officers has violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, and (3) when an action seeks declaratory or injunctive relief on the basis of a substantial allegation of wrongful conduct to promote an illegal purpose in excess of the officer's statutory authority.

HN33[] State Sovereign Immunity, Waiver of Immunity

Statutes in derogation of sovereign immunity should be strictly construed. When there is any doubt about their meaning or intent they are given the effect which makes the least rather than the most change in sovereign immunity.

Syllabus

The plaintiffs, E Co., a nonunion contractor, and six of its individual nonunion employees, brought an action in state court against the defendants, the city of Hartford, the state department of education and its commissioner, [2] and certain other contractors, seeking, inter alia, injunctive and declaratory relief after E Co.'s bids to perform work on two state financed municipal school construction projects in Hartford were rejected when the city enforced a project labor agreement in the prebid specifications that required the successful bidder to perform all project work with union labor. The case was removed to federal court, where that court dismissed all of the plaintiffs' federal claims and remanded the case to state court for consideration of the plaintiffs' remaining state claims. Thereafter, the trial court dismissed the plaintiffs' remaining claims for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, concluding that E Co. lacked standing to challenge the project labor agreement requirement because E Co. failed to make a colorable claim that such a requirement effectuated fraud, corruption, favoritism or otherwise undermined the objective or integrity of the competitive bidding process in accordance with the test for unsuccessful bidder standing set forth in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford (251 Conn. 169, 740 A.2d 813). The trial court also concluded that the remaining individual plaintiffs lacked [3] standing because they were not prequalified contractors and, therefore, could not and did not bid on the construction projects at issue. On appeal, the plaintiffs claimed that the trial court incorrectly concluded that they lacked standing to assert their state claims. Held:

1. The trial court incorrectly concluded that E Co. lacked standing, as an unsuccessful bidder, to challenge the imposition of the project labor agreement requirement and the rejection of its bids; E Co. having submitted bids on both projects, and the plaintiffs' complaint, the supporting affidavits and other evidence in the record having contained detailed allegations as to the discriminatory effect that the project labor agreement requirement would have on E Co. and other nonunion contractors, E Co. made a colorable claim that fraud, corruption, favoritism or other conduct had undermined the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process.

2. The trial court properly concluded that the individual employees did not having standing to challenge, under the state constitution, the imposition of the project labor agreement requirement because they did not suffer the direct or actual injury required to establish [4] standing; the claims of the individual employees, namely, that the project labor agreements violated their rights to freedom of speech and association because they mandated that they join a union in order to work on the school construction projects and that they violated their rights to equal protection because they barred nonunion employees from working on the projects, were too remote and speculative, as the individual employees were not prequalified to submit bids directly and, therefore, did not and could not bid on the projects.

3. The trial court incorrectly concluded that E Co. did not have standing to prosecute its claim against the city under the Connecticut Antitrust Act (act) (§ 35-24 et seq.); E Co., as an unsuccessful bidder in a municipal bidding process, had the statutory right to bring an antitrust claim against the city, and, because the city was acting in a proprietary rather than regulatory capacity, it was not entitled to qualified immunity under the provision in the act (§ 35-31 [b]) affording qualified immunity for anticompetitive conduct specifically required or directed by state or federal statutes.

4. The city could not prevail on its claim, as an alternative [5] ground for affirming the trial court's judgment, that the plaintiffs' claims were preempted by federal labor law, the city having acted in a proprietary capacity as a purchaser of construction services rather than in a regulatory capacity when it imposed the mandatory project labor agreements in the bid specifications for the school construction projects.

5. The dismissal of the plaintiffs' claims against the department of education and its commissioner was affirmed on the alternative ground that those claims were barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity, the plaintiffs' allegations having been insufficient to support a claim that the department and the commissioner acted in excess of their statutory authority.

[193] [*405] ZARELLA, J. The principal issue in this appeal is whether the nonunion plaintiffs, Electrical Contractors, Inc. (ECI), and six of its individual employees,[1] have standing to challenge prebid specifications requiring the successful bidder on two state financed [194] school construction projects[2] in the city of Hartford to perform all project work with union labor under the terms of a project labor agreement (PLA). The plaintiffs claim that the trial court incorrectly concluded that (1) ECI lacked standing, pursuant to this court's decision in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, 251 Conn. 169, 740 A.2d 813 (1999) (Associated Builders & Contractors), to challenge the PLA requirement and the rejection of its lowest, responsible, qualified bids on the two construction projects after ECI refused to sign and be bound by the mandatory PLA, (2) the PLA requirement did not violate the applicable competitive bidding [7] laws, General Statutes §§ 4a-100, 4b-91, 4b-92 [*406] and 10-287, (3) the individual plaintiffs did not have standing under article first, §§ 1, 4, 5 and 20, of the Connecticut constitution to challenge the PLA requirement, and (4) ECI did not have standing to prosecute its claim that the PLA requirement was in violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act, General Statutes § 35-24 et seq. The defendants, the city of Hartford (city), Morganti Group, Inc., Downes Construction Company, LLC, Custom Electric, Inc.,[3] the state department of education (department), and Mark K. McQuillan, the commissioner of education,[4] who allegedly approved the challenged contracts on behalf of the state,[5] disagree with the plaintiffs and raise two alternative grounds for affirmance, namely, that the plaintiffs' claims are (1) preempted by federal labor law, and (2) barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity.[6] We affirm in part and reverse in part the judgment of the trial court.

I

FACTS

The following relevant facts are set forth in the trial court's memorandum of decision. HN1[] "A PLA is a prehire collective bargaining agreement which requires all contractors and subcontractors on a construction project [*407] [9] to comply with the terms of all existing collective bargaining agreements with unions representing workers from the trades performing work on the project and requires all project workers to join the unions for their respective trades, to remain members in good standing of such unions, and not to strike while the project is under construction.[7] [195] The PLAs . . . at issue share these essential features, although they set aside 15 percent of all work on each project for minority-owned . . . and/or women-owned . . . business enterprises, which are not bound by the PLAs.[8]. . .

We refer to the city, Morganti Group, Inc., Downes Construction Company, LLC, and Custom Electric, Inc., collectively as the nonstate defendants.

[4] We refer to the department and McQuillan collectively as the state defendants.

Dicin Electric Company also was named as a defendant. The plaintiffs, however, subsequently withdrew their claims against Dicin Electric Company.

[5] The state provided 90 percent of the financing for the school construction projects.

[6] The federal preemption claim is raised by the nonstate defendants. The sovereign immunity claim is raised by the state defendants.

[7] See Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 176 (describing PLA in that case as prehire agreement signed by construction manager, local unions and contractors for purpose of enhancing timely completion of project without interruption or delay through establishment of framework for labor-management cooperation and stability, with terms remaining in full force and effect throughout project, contractors agreeing to abide by collective bargaining agreements of trade unions, including making contributions to employee benefit trust funds and recognizing trade unions as sole collective bargaining [10] representatives of employees working on project, and unions agreeing not to engage in any strike, slowdown or other disruption of work, but not requiring all project workers to be members of union); cf. New York State Chapter, Inc., Associated General Contractors of America v. New York State Thruway Authority, 88 N.Y.2d 56, 65, 666 N.E.2d 185, 643 N.Y.S.2d 480 (1996) ("[A] PLA is a prebid contract between a construction project owner and a labor union [or unions] establishing the union as the collective bargaining representative for all persons who will perform work on the project. The PLA provides that only contractors and subcontractors who sign a prenegotiated agreement with the union can perform project work. A PLA thus generally requires all bidders on the project to hire workers through the union hiring halls; follow specified dispute resolution procedures; comply with union wage, benefit, seniority, apprenticeship and other rules; and contribute to the union benefit funds. In return for a project owner's promise to insist in its specifications that all successful bidders agree to be covered by a PLA, the union promises labor peace through the life of the contract . . . ." [Citation [11] omitted.]).

[8] The challenged PLAs in the present case, which are described in detail in paragraphs twenty-eight through thirty-six of the plaintiffs' second amended complaint, required that the successful bidder on each project "draw all of its field labor through referrals from a designated trade union, or that its [nonunion] employees must first join a designated trade union, as a prerequisite to executing a contract and performing the subject work." The PLAs also required, inter alia, that the successful bidder (1) abide by the "'Project Work Rules for the Greater Hartford-New Britain Building and Construction Trade Council and its affiliated [u]nions and the [c]ity of Hartford, Hartford Public Schools Construction, Renovations and Additions Program' dated [April 14, 2004]," (2) ensure that all of its field employees working on each project remain members in good standing of the relevant union during the term of the applicable PLA, (3) agree to participate in a "Labor Management Cooperative Committee" and "submit to and comply with all rulings promulgated by [that committee and by] the PLA's Joint Administrative Council," (4) pay wages and fringe benefits to all workers on the project [12] in accordance with the prevailing union scale, (5) recognize the building trades council and its affiliated local unions as the sole and exclusive bargaining representatives for building trades [*408] "In their complaint, the plaintiffs [sought] several types of declaratory, injunctive and other extraordinary relief[9] in [196] connection with the projects . . . at issue based upon the common underlying claim that the city's imposition of mandatory PLAs upon successful bidders on those and similar state-financed construction projects is illegal. . . .

[*409] "After this case was filed in [the trial] court, the defendants successfully petitioned for its removal to the United States [15] District Court [for the District of Connecticut] so that [the] federal constitutional claims . . . could be adjudicated in a federal forum. Upon its removal, the case was assigned to [Judge] Stefan Underhill, before whom the parties presented oral arguments after submitting extensive briefs on comprehensive motions to dismiss[10] all counts of the plaintiffs' then operative first amended complaint.[11] At the conclusion of oral argument, Judge Underhill dismissed all of the plaintiffs' federal claims, declined to exercise jurisdiction over their pendent state claims, and ordered that the case be remanded to [the trial] court for further proceedings. Left undecided in this process, with the express intention that [the trial] court should decide them on remand, were the defendants' jurisdictional challenges to the plaintiffs' state law claims.

"After the case was remanded, the [trial] court met with counsel to establish a procedure for identifying those jurisdictional challenges that remained to be adjudicated, claiming such challenges for a hearing, and filing supplemental briefs thereon. Upon receipt of the parties' claims for hearing and supplemental briefs, which incorporated by reference all relevant portions of the briefs they had previously filed in federal court, the [trial] court heard oral argument on all challenges [*410] claimed for hearing on July 3, 2009. For the purpose of that hearing, mechanics and laborers employed on the projects and covered by their respective PLAs, (6) pay any person referred by the union whom it rejected for work on the project, as was its right, for "'reporting time'" even though the rejected person had performed no work on the project, and (7) deduct union dues from each field employee's pay and send it to the union on a monthly basis.

[9] The trial court described the requested relief as follows: "In particular, [the plaintiffs sought] (1) [a declaration] that the imposition of mandatory PLAs, by or on behalf of the city, on projects approved and funded by the state defendants is illegal and improper insofar as [13] PLAs restrict the performance of work on the projects, in whole or in part, to union member employees, union-referred employees, union contractors or PLA signatory contractors, (2) a [declaration] that the imposition of a mandatory PLA, by or on behalf of a public owner, that restricts the performance of work to union member employees, union-referred employees, union contractors or PLA signatory contractors for any municipal school construction project that is funded, in whole or in part, with state funds, [under] . . . § 10-287, is illegal, (3) [a declaration] that ECI's bids on the two projects were the lowest qualified responsible bids, and thus that the city's rejection of those bids, based upon ECI's refusal to agree to PLAs, was illegal and improper, (4) writs of mandamus ordering the city to award and execute contracts for the electrical work on each of the two projects to ECI, (5) an injunction ordering the city and its construction managers not to execute any contract to perform electrical work on either of the two projects with any other contractor than ECI, (6) an injunction ordering the state defendants not to provide any funds in furtherance of the work on the two projects [14] by any other electrical contractor than ECI, (7) a writ of mandamus ordering the state defendants to withhold funds in furtherance of the work on the two projects by any electrical contractor other than ECI, and (8) a writ of mandamus ordering the state defendants to withhold any funds in furtherance of work performed on any school construction project that is funded, in whole or in part, with state funds, [pursuant to] . . . § 10-287, for which a mandatory PLA of the type . . . at issue has been imposed. In addition to the foregoing, the plaintiffs [sought] the following types of monetary relief: (1) from the . . . city, damages under General Statutes § 35-34 for ECI's lost profits and bid preparation costs on the two projects and for the individual plaintiffs' lost wages and benefits, plus treble damages, reasonable attorney's fees and costs under . . . § 35-35, and (2) from all but the state defendants, such other monetary relief as is allowable by law, including but not limited to lost profits, bid preparation costs, reasonable attorney's fees and costs."

[10] These included the motion to dismiss, dated March 27, 2009, filed by the city, Downes Construction Company, LLC, and Morganti Group, Inc., the motion to dismiss, dated March 27, 2009, filed by Dicin Electric Company and Custom Electric, Inc., and the motion to dismiss, dated April 17, 2009, filed by the department before McQuillan was joined as a [16] defendant on June 15, 2009. Two separate stipulations of facts, one entered into by the city and the plaintiffs and another entered into by the department and the plaintiffs also were filed with the United States District Court on February 27, 2009, in connection with this action.

[11] The plaintiffs filed the currently operative second amended complaint on May 20, 2009, following remand by Judge Underhill to the Connecticut Superior Court.

the parties agreed that all documents and materials submitted by any party could be considered parts of the evidentiary record upon which to decide the contested issues presented on the pending motions.

"The [17] defendants, in their motions [to dismiss] . . . challenged [the trial] court's subject matter jurisdiction over the plaintiffs' state law claims on three separate [197] grounds. First, they claim[ed] that the plaintiffs lack[ed] standing to bring a bid protest under settled principles of Connecticut common law, as most recently applied . . . in [Associated Builders & Contractors] . . . . Second, the state defendants argue[d] that the plaintiffs' claims against them [were] barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity because such claims do not rest upon allegations which, if proved, would establish that their conduct in this case was clearly in excess of their statutory authority. Third, all defendants join[ed] in claiming that the plaintiffs' general challenge to the use of PLAs in state funded municipal school construction projects [was] preempted by federal labor law, which has long approved of their use [in] public construction projects."

Following the hearing, the trial court agreed with the defendants that the plaintiffs lacked standing and that the action should be dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. In its memorandum of decision, the court concluded that ECI had failed [18] to make a colorable claim that the PLA requirement effectuated fraud, corruption, favoritism or otherwise undermined the objective or integrity of the competitive bidding process under the common-law principles articulated in Associated Builders & Contractors. The court also concluded that the individual plaintiffs did not have standing because they were not prequalified electrical contractors and had "neither bid on either project nor could have done so . . . ." Accordingly, the trial court granted the defendants' [*411] motions to dismiss without reaching or deciding the alternative grounds advanced in support of their motions. Thereafter, the plaintiffs appealed to the Appellate Court from the trial court's judgment, and the appeal was transferred to this court pursuant to General Statutes § 51-199 (c) and Practice Book § 65-2.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

HN2[] "Standing is the legal right to set judicial machinery in motion. One cannot rightfully invoke the jurisdiction of the court unless he [or she] has, in an individual or representative capacity, some real interest in the cause of action, or a legal or equitable right, title or interest in the subject matter of the controversy. . . . When standing [19] is put in issue, the question is whether the person whose standing is challenged is a proper party to request an adjudication of the issue . . . . Standing requires no more than a colorable claim of injury; a [party] ordinarily establishes . . . standing by allegations of injury. Similarly, standing exists to attempt to vindicate arguably protected interests. . . .

HN3[] "Standing is established by showing that the party claiming it is authorized by statute to bring suit or is classically aggrieved. . . . The fundamental test for determining aggrievement encompasses a well-settled twofold determination: first, the party claiming aggrievement must successfully demonstrate a specific, personal and legal interest in [the subject matter of the challenged action], as distinguished from a general interest, such as is the concern of all members of the community as a whole. Second, the party claiming aggrievement must successfully establish that this specific personal and legal interest has been specially and injuriously affected by the [challenged action]. . . . Aggrievement is established if there is a possibility, as distinguished from a certainty, that some legally protected [*412] interest . . . has [20] been adversely affected." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) May v. Coffey, 291 Conn. 106, 112, 967 A.2d 495 (2009).

[198] HN4[] In the context of competitive bidding, it is well established that an unsuccessful bidder on a state or municipal contract has no contractual right under the common law that would afford standing to challenge the award of a contract. Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 178. "[A] bid, even the lowest responsible one, submitted in response to an invitation for bids is only an offer which, until accepted by the municipality, does not give rise to a contract between the parties. . . . An unsuccessful bidder, therefore, has no legal or equitable right in the contract. Not unlike any other person whose offer has been rejected, the disappointed bidder has no right to judicial intervention. . . .

"Moreover, no statute grants unsuccessful bidders standing to challenge the award of a state contract. . . . In particular, state and local competitive bidding laws have not been enacted in order to protect bidders. These laws serve to guard against abuses in the award of contracts such as favoritism, fraud or corruption and are enacted solely [21] for the benefit of the public and in no sense create any rights in those who submit bids. . . .

HN5[] "Despite these substantial constraints, we have recognized a limited exception to the rules of standing in order to provide a means of protecting the public's interest in properly implemented competitive bidding processes. . . . Under this exception, unsuccessful bidders have standing to challenge the award of a public contract where fraud, corruption or acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process existed . . . . [S]uch a suit is brought by one who suffers injury as a result of the illegal activity, but the suit itself is brought in the public interest by one acting [*413] essentially as a private attorney general." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 178-80.

"Our policy to limit standing so as to deny some claims brought by unsuccessful and precluded bidders is designed to protect twin goals that serve the public interest in various, sometimes conflicting, ways. The standing rules aim to strike the proper balance between fulfilling the purposes of the competitive bidding statutes and preventing frequent litigation that might result in extensive delay [22] in the commencement and completion of government projects to the detriment of the public." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 180.

Finally, HN6[] because the issue of standing implicates subject matter jurisdiction, it may be a proper basis for granting a motion to dismiss. E.g., May v. Coffey, supra, 291 Conn. 113; see Practice Book § 10-31 (a) (1). "The standard of review for a court's decision on a motion to dismiss is well settled. A motion to dismiss tests, inter alia, whether, on the face of the record, the court is without jurisdiction. . . . [O]ur review of the court's ultimate legal conclusion and resulting [determination] of the motion to dismiss will be de novo. . . . When a . . . court decides a jurisdictional question raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss, it must consider the allegations of the complaint in their most favorable light. . . . In this regard, a court must take the facts to be those alleged in the complaint, including those facts necessarily implied from the allegations, construing them in a manner most favorable to the pleader. . . . The motion to dismiss . . . admits all facts which are well pleaded, invokes the existing record and must be decided upon [23] that alone." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Gold v. Rowland, 296 Conn. 186, 200-201, 994 A.2d 106 (2010). [199] "[I]t is the burden of the party who seeks the exercise of jurisdiction in his favor . . . clearly to allege facts demonstrating that he is a proper [*414] party to invoke judicial resolution of the dispute."[12] (Internal quotation marks omitted.) May v. Coffey, supra, 113. Mindful of these principles, we address each of the plaintiffs' claims in turn.

Standing of ECI

ECI first claims that the trial court incorrectly concluded that it lacked standing to challenge the imposition of the PLA requirement and the rejection of its lowest, responsible, qualified bids for the school construction projects. ECI specifically claims that the trial court misapplied this court's narrow holding in Associated Builders & Contractors that the plaintiffs did not have standing because they had not bid on the project, as ECI had done in the present case. In addition, ECI claims that the court in Associated Builders & Contractors never considered the cost effects [24] on the public bidding process of disqualifying nonunion contractors and workers, who constitute 90 percent of the local electrical workforce and 80 percent of the overall construction workforce, and never ruled on the discriminatory effects of the plaintiffs' challenge to the PLA requirement. ECI further claims that the trial court in the present case disregarded the extensive factual record before it, including "overwhelming evidence" that the effect of the PLA requirement was to exclude nonunion contractors and employees from working on the projects, and did not properly consider that ECI was the lowest, responsible qualified bidder. In this regard, ECI maintains that the complaint and accompanying affidavits set forth numerous ways in which the [*415] PLA requirement discriminated against ECI and other nonunion contractors and caused them to suffer specific, actionable harm by effectively barring them from working on the projects.

---

[12] In the present case, additional facts also were entered into evidence. See part I of this opinion; see also footnote 17 of this opinion.

The nonstate defendants respond[13] that ECI's claim as to the validity of the PLA requirement is virtually identical to the claim that was unsuccessfully raised by the plaintiffs in Associated Builders & Contractors and that ECI's attempt to distinguish the present [25] case from that and other Connecticut precedent is without merit. In particular, the nonstate defendants argue that Associated Builders & Contractors determined that cost is not a factor to be considered in deciding whether the competitive bidding laws are undermined. They further argue that neither ECI nor other nonunion contractors presented evidence that the PLA requirement prevented nonunion contractors from bidding or working on the projects by making it economically unfeasible for them to do so. The nonstate defendants thus contend that ECI has failed to prove that it has standing because it did not establish that the PLA requirement was used to perpetuate fraud, corruption, favoritism or conduct that undermines the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process. We agree with ECI that the trial court incorrectly concluded that it did not have standing.

Because our analysis of this claim requires us to consider how the trial court [200] interpreted and applied Associated Builders & Contractors, we divide the following discussion into three parts. In the first part, we review the reasoning in Associated Builders & [26] Contractors. We next consider how the trial court applied Associated Builders & Contractors in the present case and explain why we disagree with the trial court's conclusions. We finally examine the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' [*416] allegations that the PLA requirement was used to perpetuate fraud, corruption, favoritism or other conduct that undermined the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process.

Associated Builders & Contractors

We begin with the reasoning in Associated Builders & Contractors. The trial court's decision was based almost entirely on its interpretation of that case, in which this court concluded that the plaintiffs did not have standing. The plaintiffs were a trade association of contractors and subcontractors (association) and two individual subcontractors who sought to enjoin the defendant, the city of Hartford, from awarding a contract for the construction of a municipal parking garage. Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 171. The association claimed that, but for a PLA requirement in the bid specifications, some of its contractor members would have submitted bids on the project. Id., 177. The defendant subsequently [27] sought to dismiss the complaint on jurisdictional grounds, alleging that the plaintiffs lacked standing. Id., 174.

At the outset of its decision, the court described the principal issue as "whether nonbidding contractors and subcontractors[14] ha[d] standing to challenge a bid specification for a municipal project that require[d] the successful bidder to agree to abide by a [PLA]." Id., 170-71. It then determined that the nonbidding general contractors, who were represented by the association, did not have standing to file the complaint. Id., 185, 186. The court explained: HN7[] "In order to have standing, a general contractor member would have had to establish a colorable [*417] claim that: (1) either it bid on the project, or it would have submitted an equivalent bid, but for the [PLA] requirement; and (2) inclusion of the [PLA] requirement effectuated fraud, corruption, favoritism or other acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process." Id., 186. The court stated that the plaintiffs had not established that the general contractor members of the association had met either part of the test because, "[w]ith respect to the first part, the association did not show that any of its [28] general contractor members had bid on the project or would have bid on the project. . . . The association cannot, therefore, invoke the standing of its general contractor members as a basis for its own standing to pursue its challenge to the validity of the [PLA] requirement." Id. After concluding that the association had not satisfied this foundational, or threshold, element, the court determined that, "[e]ven if this foundational element had been met by testimony of the association's general contractor members that they would have bid, but for the [PLA] specification, the association still cannot prevail under the second part of the standing test." Id., 186-87.

[13] The state defendants did not respond to this claim.

[201] With respect to the second part of the test, the association had claimed that the PLA requirement "arbitrarily and anticompetitively limit[ed] access to the bidding process" because it "imposed costs [on] nonunion general contracts that made it economically unfeasible for them to bid," and, therefore, it violated "the integrity of competitive bidding . . . [and] [29] injur[ed] the general public by driving up the cost of government funded projects." Id., 187. The court disagreed, explaining that, "[e]ven assuming that the [PLA] requirement might increase the project's cost, we know of no requirement in the competitive bidding statutes that propels cost considerations to the top of the list of appropriate considerations for public contract specifications. If cost alone were the determinative factor of appropriate bid [*418] criteria, disappointed bidders or nonbidders would have virtually unlimited opportunities to litigate project specifications on the ground of alternate designs, materials, safety requirements and so on. Such litigation would involve courts in comparative cost assessments that would severely impair the discretion of governmental bodies entrusted with the responsibility for governmental construction projects. It is neither unusual nor unfair for project specifications to give some potential bidders an economic advantage over others because of factors such as the bidder's expertise, specialization and reliability." Id., 187-88.

The court elaborated that the record failed to show that cost considerations had precluded nonunion general contractors [30] from participating in the bidding process, stating in a footnote that "the plaintiffs ha[d] provided no explanation as to how the alleged increased expense to some potential bidders would raise the costs of the overall project. An increase in costs in one aspect of a project can equally well result in overall cost savings for the project. By avoiding labor disruption and maintaining a supply of skilled workers, as the project construction manager testified the [PLA] was designed to do, the [PLA] could reduce overall costs. The record . . . does not, in fact, support the association's claim that cost considerations precluded nonunion general contractors from participating in the bidding process. Two of the five bidders were nonunion contractors. The association presented no testimony to support its claim that government projects using [PLAs] had higher total costs than other similar projects without [a PLA]." Id., 187 n.12. The court thus concluded that the association had failed to make "a colorable factual showing" to support its claim of economic disadvantage. Id., 187. The court stated that the "the record . . . demonstrates a nondiscriminatory decision by the [defendant] to use [31] a [PLA]"; id., 188; and that the "determinative [*419] factor" in a bidding challenge was "whether the requirements in that process had been applied consistently and in good faith." Id., 189.

Trial Court's Application of Associated Builders & Contractors

In relying on Associated Builders & Contractors when granting the defendants' motions to dismiss ECI's claim with respect to the competitive bidding statutes, the trial court initially acknowledged that none of the plaintiffs in that case had satisfied the threshold requirement of demonstrating that they had bid on the project or would have bid on the project but for the PLA requirement. The trial court then concluded that the court in Associated Builders & Contractors had reached the merits of the plaintiffs' claim by considering whether inclusion of the PLA requirement in the prebid specifications [202] had "'effectuated fraud, corruption, favoritism or other acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process'" through the imposition of costs on nonunion contractors that made it economically unfeasible for them to bid. Referring to the statements in Associated Builders & Contractors that cost considerations were not "'[at] the [32] top of the list of appropriate considerations for public contract specifications'" and that the defendant's decision to use a PLA was nondiscriminatory and within its discretion, the trial court determined that, because ECI had raised a "virtually identical" claim, the analysis of the claim on the merits in Associated Builders & Contractors was applicable and dispositive of the nonstate defendants' motions to dismiss in the present case.[15] We disagree with the trial [*420] court's interpretation of Associated Builders & Contractors and the nonstate defendants' claim that the holding in that case is dispositive of their motions to dismiss.

As previously discussed, the principal issue in Associated Builders & Contractors was "whether nonbidding contractors and subcontractors ha[d] standing to challenge a bid specification for a municipal project that require[d] the successful bidder to agree to abide by a [PLA]." (Emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 170-71. The court ultimately [34] determined that the plaintiffs had not shown that any of the association's general contractor members had bid on the project or would have bid on the project under the first part of the test, and, therefore, it could not "invoke the standing of its general contractor members as a basis for its own standing to pursue its challenge to the validity of the [PLA] requirement." Id., 186. The court nonetheless proceeded to consider whether the plaintiffs could have prevailed under the second part of the test. See id., 186-87. It is that portion of the analysis on which the trial court in the present case relied to resolve the standing issue. Its reliance, however, was misplaced for the following reasons.

First, any consideration of the second part of the test in Associated Builders & Contractors was unnecessary [*421] following the court's dispositive holding that the association lacked standing under the first part of the test. Accordingly, the court's conclusion in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 186-87, [35] that the plaintiffs could not prevail under the second part of the test and the reasoning on which its conclusion was based were [203] nothing more than dicta.[16] See, e.g., Statewide Grievance Committee v. Rozbicki, 211 Conn. 232, 246, 558 A.2d 986 (1989) (HN8[]) "Once it becomes clear that the trial court lacked subject matter jurisdiction to hear the plaintiffs' complaint, any further discussion of the merits is pure dict[um]. . . . When the trial court concluded . . . that subject matter jurisdiction was missing, the remainder of its [ruling was] merely advisory . . . ." [Citation omitted; internal [204] quotation marks omitted.]).

[15] The trial court concluded, on the basis of Associated Builders & Contractors, that (1) "a differential cost impact on union and nonunion contractors . . . affords the latter no basis for challenging [a PLA] requirement" and, therefore, "an unsuccessful bidder . . . lacks standing to complain of it . . . in a court of law," (2) "the ultimate issue to be decided on any proper bid challenge is whether the public authority gave fair and evenhanded consideration to each bidder instead of treating different bidders differently," (3) the common-law principle denying [33] standing to disappointed bidders remains intact unless abrogated by a statute that expressly confers standing, (4) Connecticut's competitive bidding statutes on their face do not identify overall project cost for special protection, (5) the prequalification statute, § 4a-100, which was enacted subsequent to Associated Builders & Contractors, does not "occup[y] the field" or preempt public officials from exercising their discretion and imposing other, or different, bid specifications, such as PLAs, as a precondition for the award of contracts on public works projects, and neither do any other related statutes; see General Statutes §§ 4b-91, 4b-92 and 10-287; and (6) there was no evidence that the use of PLAs for the projects in the present case was the result of fraud, corruption or favoritism.

[16] "[D]ictum is an observation or remark made by a judge in pronouncing an opinion upon a cause, concerning some rule, principle, or application of law, or the solution of a question suggested by the case at bar, but not necessarily involved in the case or essential to its determination . . . . Statements and comments in an opinion concerning some rule of law or legal proposition not necessarily involved nor essential to determination of the case . . . are obiter dicta, and lack the force of an adjudication." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) State v. Courchesne, 296 Conn. 622, 738 n.79, 998 A.2d 1 (2010).

Justice [36] Harper's assertion, in his concurrence and dissent, that the court's analysis under the second part of the test did not constitute dictum disregards our well established precedent and flies in the face of the court's own reasoning. The court made absolutely clear that it did not regard both parts of the test as threshold jurisdictional requirements when it referred to the first part of the test as its "foundational element"; Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 186; and further explained that, even if that part of the test had been satisfied, the association "still" could not prevail under the second part of the test. Id., 187. Moreover, to the extent Justice Harper cites twelve other cases as "weighty authority" for the proposition that the two parts of the test serve as independent grounds to support a judgment on standing, all but one are unpersuasive because they are from other jurisdictions, and the remaining Connecticut case lacks the dispositive language in Associated Builders & Contractors describing the first part of the test that was applied in that case as a threshold requirement.

Second, we disagree with the trial court and the nonstate [37] defendants that the court in *Associated Builders & [422] Contractors considered the merits of the plaintiffs' complaint or ruled that the plaintiffs had failed to establish that the PLA requirement had a potentially discriminatory effect on nonunion contractors due to increased costs. Although the court's reference to whether the plaintiffs had produced sufficient evidence of fraud, corruption or favoritism may have suggested that it was considering the merits of the defendant's decision to impose a PLA requirement, the court itself rejected such a notion when it stated that "[t]he general rule of standing . . . is not inconsistent with the particular standard applicable to disappointed and would-be bidders: By requiring [the plaintiffs] to produce evidence that the bidding process was undermined by fraud, corruption or favoritism, the court is simply forcing the party challenging the competitive bidding process to make a colorable claim of injury that it is within the zone of interests protected by the competitive bidding laws . . . . Although the plaintiffs were not required to prove the merits of their claim, they did have the lesser burden of establishing a colorable claim."[17] [*423] (Emphasis [38] altered; internal quotation marks omitted.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 181-82. Consistent with this view, the dissent in Associated Builders & Contractors

[17] The trial court in the present case heard argument by counsel but took no testimony on all challenges the parties had claimed for a hearing on July 3, 2009. The parties also agreed that all documents and materials filed by either side could be considered parts of the evidentiary record on which to decide the issues presented on the pending motions. This included documentation the parties previously had filed in federal court, including their briefs, stipulations of fact and supporting and supplemental affidavits.

Although the parties raise no issues pertaining to the hearing in this case, we note that such a hearing is not typically required or held when the court is considering a motion to dismiss. As we explained in Conboy v. State, 292 Conn. 642, 974 A.2d 669 (2009), HN9[] trial courts addressing motions to dismiss [40] for lack of subject matter jurisdiction apply different rules and procedures depending on the state of the record at the time the motion is filed: "When a trial court decides a jurisdictional question raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss on the basis of the complaint alone, it must consider the allegations of the complaint in their most favorable light. . . . In this regard, a court must take the facts to be those alleged in the complaint, including those facts necessarily implied from the allegations, construing them in a manner most favorable to the pleader. . . .

"In contrast, if the complaint is supplemented by undisputed facts established by affidavits submitted in support of the motion to dismiss . . . other types of undisputed evidence . . . and/or public records of which judicial notice may be taken . . . the trial court, in determining the jurisdictional issue, may consider these supplementary undisputed facts and need not conclusively presume the validity of the allegations of the complaint. . . . HN10[] If affidavits and/or other evidence submitted in support of a defendant's motion to dismiss conclusively establish that jurisdiction is lacking, and the plaintiff fails to undermine [41] this conclusion with counteraffidavits . . . or other evidence, the trial court may dismiss the action without further proceedings. . . . If, however, the defendant submits either no proof to rebut the plaintiffs jurisdictional allegations . . . or only evidence that fails to call those allegations into question . . . the plaintiff need not supply counteraffidavits or other evidence to support the complaint . . . but may rest on the jurisdictional allegations therein. . . .

"Finally, HN11[] [when] a jurisdictional determination is dependent on the resolution of a critical factual dispute, it cannot be decided on a motion to dismiss in the absence of an evidentiary hearing to establish jurisdictional facts. . . . Likewise, if the question of jurisdiction is intertwined with the merits of the case, a court cannot resolve the jurisdictional question without a hearing to evaluate those merits. . . . An evidentiary hearing is necessary because a court cannot make a critical factual [jurisdictional] finding based on memoranda and documents submitted by the parties." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 651-54.

To the extent this court stated in Associated Builders & [42] Contractors that "the trial court was required to conduct an evidentiary hearing to decide whether the plaintiffs had established a colorable claim that the [PLA] requirement had undermined the integrity or objective of the competitive bidding process"; (emphasis added) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 182; or declared in the companion case of Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Anson, 251 Conn. 202, 740 A.2d 804 (1999), that "the evidentiary showing for standing . . . was [the association's] burden to make"; id., 214; we now clarify that, HN12[] in most cases involving competitive bidding on public contracts, the allegations alone should provide a sufficient factual basis for deciding the jurisdictional issue of whether the plaintiff made a colorable claim of injury. Because the parties in the present case agreed, however, that the trial court could consider the materials and documents they had filed in federal court, all future references to the record in this case include that documentation as well as the facts alleged in the complaint.

observed multiple times that the majority had not reached the merits, stating that "[t]he court, in a hypertechnical ruling on standing, avoids a substantive issue that . . . we should review"; id., 193 (Berdon, J., dissenting); "[t]he public interest should compel this court [*424] to address this issue"; id. (Berdon, J., dissenting); "[t]he majority avoids [the plaintiffs'] substantive claims by narrowly ruling that the plaintiffs have no standing"; id., 194 (Berdon, J., dissenting); and that, "[b]y declining to afford the plaintiffs standing, the majority . . . simply ducks the issue of whether [PLA] requirements for a public construction contract violate state and local competitive bidding statutes." Id., 201 (Berdon, J., dissenting). In addition, the court stated on several occasions that its conclusion that the association [205] lacked standing was based on deficiencies in the record; see id., 187 n.12, 188, 189; and that the plaintiffs had failed to make "a colorable factual showing" in [39] support of their claim. Id., 187. Thus, neither the majority nor the dissent in Associated Builders & Contractors believed that the plaintiffs' claim had been decided on its merits, and the trial court in the present case should not have applied the so-called holding in Associated Builders & Contractors under the second part of the test to decide the issues in the present case.

Third, to the extent the trial court and the nonstate defendants regard the court's discussion of [43] cost in Associated Builders & Contractors as resolving the issue of whether a PLA requirement is discriminatory, and thus dispositive of the standing issue in the present case, they misconstrue the court's analysis and fail to consider the subsequent evolution of Connecticut's competitive bidding laws. Associated Builders & Contractors did not conclude that cost was not a factor to be considered in deciding whether the competitive bidding laws were undermined, nor did it evaluate or reach any conclusions regarding the broader question of whether the PLA requirement in that case contravened the competitive bidding laws. The court merely stated that it "[knew] of no requirement in the competitive bidding statutes that propels cost considerations to the top of the list of appropriate considerations for [*425] public contract specifications" and that "cost alone" should not be "the determinative factor"; (emphasis added) id., 187-88; a statement with which ECI's attorney in the present case agreed during oral argument before this court. The court also noted that "[a]n increase in costs in one aspect of a project can equally well result in overall cost savings for the project. By avoiding labor [44] disruption and maintaining a supply of skilled workers, as the project construction manager testified the [PLA] was designed to do, the requirement could reduce overall costs. The record . . . does not, in fact, support the association's claim that cost considerations precluded nonunion general contractors from participating in the bidding process." Id., 187 n.12. Accordingly, the court in Associated Builders & Contractors did not conclude, as the trial court concluded and the nonstate defendants claim, that a PLA requirement has no effect on competitive bidding because of increased costs to nonunion contractors and workers. It merely concluded that the "determinative factor" is whether the requirements of the bidding process have been applied consistently and in good faith, and that the plaintiffs had not made a "colorable factual showing" that the integrity of the bidding process had been affected by the additional costs allegedly imposed on nonunion contractors and workers by the PLA requirement. Id., 187-89.

Moreover, following the decision in Associated Builders & Contractors, the legislature enacted HN13[] General Statutes § 4a-100, also known as the "prequalification statute," which [45] requires all bidders on public construction projects to satisfy certain minimum standards in order to bid or perform work on such projects.[18] Thus, [19] We nonetheless agree with Associated Builders & Contractors that HN15[] "cost alone" may not always be "the determinative factor" in awarding a public construction contract. Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187-88.

[20] Justice Harper asserts that "[t]he majority's approach to cost appears to conflate two distinct levels of cost consideration," specifically, project costs associated with items such as the building's location and size, construction materials, remediation activities and time to completion, and the cost of the [54] project as determined by the winning bid in the competitive bidding process. Footnote 4 of the concurring and dissenting opinion. Thus, Justice Harper essentially contends that, because the PLA requirement is a bid specification, it cannot be challenged under the competitive bidding statutes or Connecticut precedent as effectuating fraud, corruption, favoritism or acts undermining the objective or integrity of the bidding process. See id. Justice Harper, however, ignores our holding in Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, 220 Conn. 689, 694-95, 600 A.2d 1019 (1991), that HN16[] "a plaintiff who ha[s] not submitted a proposal on a public project ha[s] standing to challenge a specification contained in the bid documents if that specification preclude[s] the plaintiff's participation in a manner that impair[s] the fairness of the bidding process." (Emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 180. Likewise, Justice Harper ignores the fact that Associated Builders & Contractors, which cited Unisys Corp. with approval; see id.; did not reject the association's claim because it was an improper challenge to the bidding specifications but because the association [55] had failed to make a "colorable factual showing," through allegations or other evidence, that "limiting the number of potential bidders violates not only the integrity of competitive bidding but also injures the general public by driving up the cost of government funded projects." Id., 187. To the extent Justice Harper suggests otherwise, we emphasize that Associated Builders & Contractors did not preclude any future claim that a bid specification with substantial cost effects on a

Finally, the statement in Associated Builders & Contractors that "[t]he trial court's determination that the [*430] decision to adhere to a [PLA] was within the defendant's discretion and the bounds of the competitive [56] bidding statutes [and], therefore, did not exceed the limits of our case law"; id., 182; did not mean that a PLA requirement may never affect the integrity of the competitive bidding process. The court made the foregoing comment in response to the plaintiffs' claim that the trial court improperly had reached the merits of whether the defendant's decision to use a PLA was a proper exercise of its discretion. See id., 181-82. In that context, the court merely was observing that the defendant's decision to use a PLA was discretionary and that the trial court had consulted our case law and properly determined that, in order to challenge the PLA requirement, the plaintiffs were required to make a colorable claim of injury by producing evidence that the bidding process had been undermined by fraud, favoritism or corruption.[21] See id., 182 [209] . The court made a similar [*431] observation in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Anson, 251 Conn. 202, 213-14, 740 A.2d 804 (1999),[22] a large group of potential bidders violates the competitive bidding statutes, which were enacted for the public benefit "to secure the best product at the lowest price"; Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, 189 Conn. 539, 543, 456 A.2d 1199 (1983); and the decision in Associated Builders & Contractors is not dispositive of ECI's claim that the PLA bid specification affects the fairness and integrity of the bidding process by imposing additional costs solely on bidders who are not union members.

[21] The court stated, with respect to this issue: "The plaintiffs argue that the trial court's analysis of standing was improper because it reached the merits of the plaintiffs' claims in evaluating whether the [defendant's] decision to use a [PLA] was a proper exercise of its discretion. We disagree.

"The plaintiffs observe . . . that standing concerns . . . the question whether the interest sought to be protected by the complainant is arguably within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute or constitutional guarantee in question and does not involve an inquiry into the merits of the claim. According to the plaintiffs, whether adoption of the [PLA] requirement was within the [defendant's] discretion was a question separate and apart from the question of their standing to challenge [59] the [defendant's] action.

"The general rule of standing cited by the plaintiffs is not contested. As the trial court noted, however, that rule is not inconsistent with the particular standard applicable to disappointed and would-be bidders: By requiring [the association] to produce evidence that the bidding process was undermined by fraud, corruption or favoritism, the court is simply forcing the party challenging the competitive bidding process to make a colorable claim of injury that it is within the zone of interests protected by the competitive bidding laws . . . . Although the plaintiffs were not required to prove the merits of their claim, they did have the lesser burden of establishing a colorable claim. See Maloney v. Pac, [183 Conn. 313, 321, 439 A.2d 349 (1981)]. . . . The trial court's determination that the decision to adhere to a [PLA] was within the [defendant's] discretion and the bounds of the competitive bidding statutes, therefore, did not exceed the limits of our case law." (Citation omitted; emphasis in original; internal quotation marks omitted.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 181-82.

[22] In Anson, the court summarized the [60] trial court's reasoning in granting the defendant's motion to dismiss the plaintiffs' claim that the PLA requirement in the bid specifications infringed on the plaintiffs' rights of free speech and association as follows: "The [trial] court . . . stated that inclusion of a [PLA] requirement in the project specifications was justified by the legitimate public interest in completion of a public works project within time and financial constraints. The nonstrike clause contained in [PLAs] would further that interest. The [defendant's] decision to use a [PLA] was not based on any improper motive. The court determined that [t]he state has a legitimate interest in completing a public works project within time and financial constraints. Evidence showed that the commissioner decided to use the [PLA] on this project based on knowledge of the use of [PLAs] by other public entities. The plaintiffs did not present any evidence that the [PLA] was a means to exclude nonunion contractors or amounted to such an exclusion. The purpose of the competitive bidding statutes is not to aid the contractors by making it economically feasible for all to bid . . . but to promote the public interest in the efficient [61] completion of public works projects. . . . The state's interest in its own finances when undertaking public works projects takes precedence over the finances or business methods of individual contractors. . . . The [defendant's] decision to try a [PLA] on this project was a legitimate exercise of his discretion to find a way to achieve the state's goal while remaining within the bounds of the competitive bidding statutes. . . .

"It is impossible to reconcile these findings with any conclusion other than that the association failed to establish that the use of a [PLA], under the circumstances of [the] case, constituted an infringement of the constitutional rights of its members. The constitution is not violated simply because a public agency adopts a legitimate public policy that runs counter to the philosophical views or business practices espoused by the membership of the association. The association did not make the evidentiary showing for standing that was its burden to make." (Emphasis added; internal quotation marks omitted.) Connecticut Associated companion case released on the same day as Associated Builders & Contractors. In other words, the court in both Associated Builders & Contractors and Anson was referring to the fact that HN17[] a public [*432] agency's discretion [57] to require a PLA in any given circumstance is not unfettered. A balance must be struck between the potentially desirable effects of a PLA, such as the completion of a public project within time and financial constraints, and the public's interest in the fairness and economy associated with the competitive bidding process. Viewed through this lens, the court in Associated Builders & Contractors [210] was attempting to determine whether the plaintiffs' allegations and other evidence in the record were sufficient to support a colorable claim that the integrity of the competitive bidding process would be seriously undermined by the imposition of the PLA requirement. See Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187-89 and n.12; see also footnote 17 of this opinion. Similarly, the court in Anson was attempting to determine whether the allegations and other evidence in the record concerning deprivation of the plaintiffs' rights of free speech and association were sufficient to support a colorable claim that the integrity of the competitive bidding process would be seriously undermined by the imposition of the PLA requirement. See Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Anson, supra, 251 Conn. 213-14. [58] In neither case was the court considering the claims on their merits. Consequently, for all of the foregoing reasons, we conclude that, to the extent the trial court in the present case treated the analysis of the PLA requirement in Associated Builders & Contractors under the second part of the standing test as a decision on the merits, it misunderstood and misapplied that decision.

Sufficiency of the Allegations

We also agree with ECI that the trial court failed to conduct an in-depth examination of the plaintiffs' allegations to determine whether they were sufficient [*433] to support a colorable claim of injury. See footnote 23 of this opinion. As previously noted, "[w]hen a . . . court decides a jurisdictional question raised by a pretrial motion to dismiss, it must consider the allegations of the complaint in their most favorable light. . . . In this regard, a court must take the facts to be those alleged in the complaint, including those facts necessarily implied from the allegations, construing them in a manner most favorable to the pleader. . . . The motion to dismiss . . . admits all facts which are well pleaded, invokes the existing record and must be decided upon that alone." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Gold v. Rowland, supra, 296 Conn. 200-201. The record includes "supporting affidavits that contain undisputed facts." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) May v. Coffey, supra, 291 Conn. 108. In the present case, we conclude, upon an examination of the allegations in the underlying [63] complaint,[23] together with the Builders & Contractors v. Anson, supra, 251 Conn. 213-14. We reiterate that the court's reference to an evidentiary showing must be [62] understood in light of our analysis in Conboy. See footnote 17 of this opinion.

[23] ECI alleged, inter alia, that (1) it was a nonunion electrical contractor with extensive experience in public construction projects, (2) bid packages for the two school construction projects were put out for competitive bidding by the city pursuant to the competitive bidding laws for the purpose of determining the lowest, responsible, qualified bidder and entering into a contract for the required work with the successful bidder, (3) ECI's bid was the lowest, responsible, qualified bid for each project, (4) the state is providing 90 percent of the funding for both projects, (5) state law provides that "[a]ll orders and contracts for school building construction receiving state assistance . . . shall be awarded to the lowest responsible qualified bidder . . . after a public invitation to bid"; General Statutes § 10-287 (b) (1); and that "the words 'lowest responsible and qualified bidder' shall mean the bidder who is prequalified pursuant to section 4a-100, and [64] whose bid is the lowest of those bidders possessing the skill, ability and integrity necessary to faithful performance of the work based on objective criteria considering past performance and information"; General Statutes § 4b-92; (6) ECI is prequalified under the applicable statutory provisions to bid and perform the work on both projects, (7) ECI fully meets the statutory definition of "lowest responsible and qualified bidder," (8) none of the statutory requirements that define lowest responsible qualified bidder and none of the other public bidding statutes suggest that a bidder must execute a PLA and must agree to draw all of its field labor through referrals from a designated trade union, or that its nonunion employees must first join a designated trade union as a prerequisite to execution of a contract and performance of the subject work, (9) based on the foregoing statutory requirements and regulations adopted thereto, it was illegal and beyond the city's authority to impose as a mandatory condition for the award of the two bid packages that the successful bidder execute a PLA and agree to draw all of its field labor through referrals from a designated trade union, or that [65] its nonunion employees must first join a designated trade union before execution of a contract and performance of the subject work could commence, (10) the city stated in the bid documents for both projects that all bidders would have to comply with a PLA requiring affidavits [211] and [*434] stipulations of fact provided in support thereof, that ECI [*435] made the [212] colorable factual showing that was missing in Associated Builders & Contractors. See footnote 17 of this opinion.

It is undisputed that ECI submitted a bid on both construction projects, thus satisfying the first part of the standing test. ECI also sustained its burden under the second part of the test because the complaint, the supporting affidavits and other evidence, considered in their most favorable light, contained detailed allegations as to the discriminatory effect of the PLA requirement on ECI and other nonunion contractors.

Specifically, paragraph thirty-seven of the complaint alleges twelve [69] ways in which the PLA requirement would "severely impair" ECI's ability as a nonunion contractor to successfully perform work on the projects and place ECI at a competitive disadvantage relative to union contractors bidding on the same projects. Similarly, in his affidavit dated March 25, 2009, William J. Flynn, Jr., ECI's vice president for nearly fifteen years, describes how the PLA requirement would penalize ECI, or any other nonunion contractor, their field [*436] employees and taxpayers by significantly increasing labor costs and how the alleged harm would be ongoing. Finally, in their joint affidavit dated March 23, 2009, which draws on four studies conducted by the Beacon Hill Institute at Suffolk University in Boston, Massachusetts, concerning PLAs and the cost of public school construction in Connecticut, Massachusetts and New York, David G. Tuerck[24] and Paul Bachman[25] apply the studies' findings to the PLA requirement in the present case and describe how it would drive up project construction costs by limiting competition and imposing the successful bidder, among other things, to draw all of its field labor through referrals from a designated trade union, or that its nonunion employees must first join a designated trade union as a prerequisite to execution of a contract and performance of the subject work, (11) there is no provision in the PLAs that an employee of ECI who wants to join the designated trade union solely for the purpose of working on the project would be granted membership, would be assigned to work on the project by the designated trade union at the request of the ECI employee, would be allowed to work on other non-PLA projects while a member of the union for the purpose of working on the project, would have any right to be reimbursed or enjoy the benefit of contributions made on his behalf to the union pension funds or to withhold funds or to be reimbursed for contributions designated for the union's political or social activities with [66] which the employee disagreed, (12) ECI, as a nonunion contractor, would incur significant and duplicative costs, as described in detail in the complaint, for providing the labor necessary to construct the projects under the required PLAs, which would severely impair ECI's ability successfully to perform the work on the projects and would place ECI at a severe competitive disadvantage relative to the union contractors bidding for the work, (13) in light of these issues, ECI requested a waiver of the PLA requirement for purposes of the subject bid on the electrical work for the projects but received no response, (14) ECI thereafter submitted its lowest responsible qualified bid with a second request for a waiver of the PLA requirement and a statement that it would not perform the work pursuant to the PLA requirement in the bid documents, (15) ECI subsequently was informed at a meeting with city officials and representatives that they intended to reject ECI's bids on the basis of ECI's refusal to agree to the PLA requirement, (16) ECI received no further written communication from the city in this regard, (17) on the basis of all information available to ECI, its bids for the projects [67] were rejected due to its refusal to agree to the mandatory PLA requirement, and the contract for electrical work was awarded to and a contract executed with a union contractor that was the third lowest bidder, (18) the city's actions and stated intent to bar any contractor from projects if it does not agree to a PLA constitute blatant favoritism for union contractors and union workers, which provides union contractors and construction trade unions with an unfair and illegal competitive advantage over nonunion contractors and nonunion construction workers, (19) as demonstrated by ECI's significantly lower bid, as well as by other objective data, the imposition of PLAs in the context of public school construction diminishes competition and increases the cost of construction by 10 to 20 percent, (20) nonunion construction contractors and workers comprise over 80 percent of the construction industry in Connecticut, and the imposition of PLAs severely discourages and often eliminates their bidding on those contracts, thus decreasing competition, (21) the imposition of mandatory PLAs undermines the object and integrity of the public competitive bidding process and exhibits patent favoritism [68] to the trade unions and union contractors, to the unfair and severe disadvantage of nonunion contractors such as ECI and its nonunion employees in this action, and (22) ECI would have been the successful bidder on both projects if it had not been for the mandatory PLA requirement, and because a significant amount of ECI's work is in public construction in Connecticut, the PLA requirement will severely and irreparably harm ECI's ongoing business operations as well as the employment opportunities of its individual employees, and will harm ECI's reputation and future ability to obtain work by causing future employers to raise questions about ECI's inability to obtain past work involving PLA requirements.

costly work and hiring rules on nonunion contractors. In their affidavit, Tuerck and Bachman also describe how the area labor market analysis for [70] the Hartford public school system, produced by the Fluor Corporation in March, 2003, for the purpose of recommending the most appropriate labor posture for the public works projects under consideration, recommended the use of PLAs without any analysis of cost, schedule, or quality impacts from imposing a mandatory PLA in Hartford and without any evidence that actual union disruptions of previous school construction projects had led to delays or increased costs in Connecticut such that PLAs were necessary to foster school construction in a more economical and efficient manner.[26] Accordingly, we conclude that ECI's allegations, as supplemented by the supporting affidavits and evidence in the record that the PLA requirement would have a discriminatory effect on ECI and other nonunion contractors, were sufficient [*437] to satisfy the second part of the standing test, which requires a colorable claim that fraud, corruption, favoritism or other conduct has seriously undermined the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process.

Insofar as the nonstate defendants insist that ECI provided insufficient evidence to establish that it has standing, we disagree. [213] One need only examine the reasons why the court in Associated Builders & Contractors concluded that the association did not have standing to understand why ECI in the present case does. In Associated Builders & Contractors, this court explained that the association had failed to make a colorable factual showing under the second part of the standing test because it had "provided no explanation as to how the alleged increased expense to some potential bidders would raise the costs of the overall project," the record did not "support the association's [72] claim that cost considerations [had] precluded nonunion general contractors from participating in the bidding process," and "[t]he association [had] presented no testimony . . . that government projects using [PLAs] had higher total costs than other similar projects without such a requirement." Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187 n.12. In other words, the complaint in Associated Builders & Contractors alleged a violation of the competitive bidding laws in the most general, conclusory terms, without any allegations as to the specific effects of the PLA requirement on the association and other nonunion contractors.[27] In the present case, the lengthy allegations [*438] in the complaint and the supporting affidavits of Flynn, Tuerck and Bachman provided such information. Accordingly, we conclude that ECI made a colorable claim of injury[28] and that the trial court has subject matter jurisdiction in this matter.[29]

[26] In their joint supplemental affidavit dated April 27, 2009, Tuerck and Bachman address the "Kotler paper"; see F. Kotler, School of Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University, "Project Labor Agreements in New York State: In the Public Interest" (March, 2009); which was attached as an exhibit to the city's reply brief on its motion to dismiss, and point out what they regard as significant errors in Fred B. Kotler's critique of the methodology used in the Beacon Hill Institute studies.

[27] The plaintiffs claimed in count one of their complaint, in which they alleged a violation of the competitive bidding statutes, that the PLA requirement imposed conditions that they would not otherwise have included in their bids unrelated to [73] a bidder's status as the lowest qualified bidder and that the PLA requirement was arbitrary and capricious and in violation of the competitive bidding statutes because the city (1) did not consider or analyze any data as to the effect of PLAs on the projects, including cost, timeliness or efficiency, (2) did not consider or analyze the effect of PLAs on competition for work on the projects, on nonunion workers and their right not to become members of a union, on nonunion workers' health insurance coverage and pension benefits, on safety, and on public policy objectives relating to employment opportunities for minorities, women and the economically disadvantaged, and (3) had no reason to believe the projects would be subject to delays because of strikes or labor unrest or that PLAs would ensure more timely completion of the projects or would relate in any way to the provisions or purposes of the competitive bidding requirements. The plaintiffs also alleged in count one that the city, by requiring bidders to agree to the terms of a PLA, was exceeding the scope of its authority under the applicable bidding statutes, favored union over nonunion contractors and subcontractors and, by failing [74] to inform bidders of the terms of the PLA, had made it impossible for a bidder to prepare a responsive bid. The plaintiffs thus alleged that the foregoing conduct caused them irreparable harm as potential bidders, interested parties, citizens and taxpayers.

[28] We do not consider ECI's claim that the trial court failed to discuss the criteria that a court should employ in determining the validity of a PLA bid specification for a publicly funded construction project because that claim would involve consideration of the merits, rather than the issue of the plaintiffs' standing. For the same reason, we do not consider the plaintiffs' claim that the trial court improperly concluded that the PLA requirement imposed by the city for the school construction projects did not violate the provisions of the applicable competitive bidding laws.

Standing of the Individual Plaintiffs

The six individual plaintiffs claim that the trial court incorrectly concluded that [78] they do not have standing to challenge the imposition of the mandatory PLAs for the school construction projects under article first, §§ 4[30] [*440] and 5,[31] of the Connecticut constitution, which guarantee freedom of speech and association, and article first, §§ 1[32] and 20,[33] of the Connecticut constitution, [215] which guarantee equal protection under the law.

[29] Justice Harper contends that the majority expands the court's subject matter jurisdiction by "depart[ing] from the narrowly circumscribed doctrine of standing established by our past cases dealing with [the competitive bidding] statutes," particularly this court's holding in Associated Builders & Contractors, and "disregards . . . the lawmaking authority of [75] the legislature." Citing Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, supra, 189 Conn. 545, Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, 191 Conn. 497, 499, 505, 467 A.2d 674 (1983), and Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 220 Conn. 696, Justice Harper specifically contends that the second part of the standing test, namely, that "the alleged illegalities amounted to fraud, corruption, favoritism or acts undermining the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process"; Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 181; is satisfied only when a plaintiff makes "a colorable claim that the bidding process-from the development of project specifications and bidding rules to the application of these to bidders-was tainted by procedural impropriety." We disagree. Although it is true that the alleged violations in Spiniello and Ardmare, respectively, involved irregular bids because of an oral rule addendum communicated to only one bidder and an improper signature on a bidding form, both of which flaws may be characterized as strictly procedural in nature; see Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, supra, 499-500; Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, supra, 544-45; [76] the alleged violation in Unisys Corp. was that the single source bid specifications favored a particular vendor. Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 691. Although the plaintiff in Unisys Corp. also alleged favoritism on the ground that the bid specifications had been prepared with the assistance of the vendor in question; see id.; the court ultimately held that the plaintiff would have standing if it could show that the restrictions imposed by the single source specifications alone precluded it from participating in a manner that impaired the fairness of the bidding process; see id., 695; see also Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 180; and that the plaintiff was entitled to an evidentiary hearing to determine whether the specifications had caused such an impairment. Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 695, 698. The court did not qualify its holding by adding that the plaintiff also would be required to show that the drafting of the specifications had been tainted by procedural impropriety. Thereafter, the court in Associated Builders & Contractors determined under the second part of the standing test that the plaintiffs in that case had [77] "failed to make even a colorable factual showing" in support of their claim that the use of a PLA illegally had resulted in the absence of a level playing field for union and nonunion contractors and subcontractors interested in participating in a government building project. Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187. The court did not conclude, as Justice Harper suggests, that the inclusion of a PLA bid specification never can be challenged on the ground that it favors union over nonunion bidders unless accompanied by a drafting impropriety, but only that the plaintiffs had failed to assert a colorable claim of injury in that case, which accounts for the court's repeated references to deficiencies in the record as the reason for its decision. Id., 187 n.12, 188-89. Accordingly, Associated Builders & Contractors cannot dictate the result here, as Justice Harper contends, because the record in the present case, unlike the record in Associated Builders & Contractors, is sufficient to support the conclusion that ECI had standing.

[30] Article first, § 4, of the Connecticut constitution provides: HN18[] "Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty."

[31] Article first, § 5, of the Connecticut constitution provides: HN19[] "No law shall ever be passed to curtail or restrain the liberty of speech or of the press."

[32] Article first, § 1, of the Connecticut constitution provides: HN20[] "All men when they form a social compact, are equal in rights; and no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive public emoluments or privileges from the community."

[33] Article first, § 20, of the Connecticut constitution provides: HN21[] "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the law nor be subjected to segregation or discrimination in the exercise or enjoyment of his civil or political rights because of religion, race, color, ancestry or national origin."

They specifically claim that the PLA requirement violates their rights to freedom of speech and association because it mandates that they join a union in order to work on the projects and requires them to make payments to the union that will be used to further social and political goals that they may not support and that are unrelated to collective bargaining. They also claim that the PLA requirement violates their equal protection rights because it would severely restrict, or effectively bar, nonunion contractors such as ECI and nonunion licensed journeymen and apprentices like themselves from working on the projects, thus conferring illegal benefits, advantages and privileges on union contractors and union journeymen and apprentices. The nonstate defendants respond that the trial court properly concluded that the individual plaintiffs [79] do not have standing to pursue their state constitutional claims because they are not prequalified electrical contractors, [*441] and, therefore, they did not, and could not have, bid on the projects.[34] We agree with the nonstate defendants that the trial court properly concluded that the individual plaintiffs lacked standing.[35]

A similar issue was raised in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Anson, supra, 251 Conn. 204. In that case, the plaintiffs included two subcontractors and one of their employees, who was suing in his capacity as an individual and a taxpayer. Id., 204 and n.1. The trial court concluded that the individual [81] plaintiff lacked standing to challenge the bidding process on the ground that it impaired his federal and state constitutional rights to freedom of speech and association. See id., 205-206. This court agreed, stating that the individual plaintiff and the plaintiff subcontractors had "no standing to pursue a challenge to general bid specifications because, in their own capacity, they never can bid directly for government projects. Their preclusion from the bidding process has no relationship to whether they operate union shops, or whether they are opposed philosophically to union shops. Their preclusion stems from the nondiscriminatory and uncontested industry practice of limiting bidding to general contractors. If general contractors were indeed to incur higher costs because of [PLA] contract specifications . . . the possible economic consequences of increased costs attributable to potential subcontractors [and individual employees] are too speculative and too attenuated to constitute 'some direct injury' for the purposes of conferring standing on such subcontractors [and individual [*442] employees]. [216] See Maloney v. Pac, 183 Conn. 313, 320-21, 439 A.2d 349 (1981)." Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Anson, supra, 251 Conn. 208-209; [82] see also id., 208 n.8.

In the present case, we agree with the trial court that the six individual plaintiffs have not suffered the direct or actual injury required under Connecticut law to establish standing because they are not prequalified electrical contractors, and, accordingly, they did not bid, nor could they have bid, on the school construction projects. Moreover, due to the fact that ECI was not the winning bidder, the individual plaintiffs never were compelled to make payments to the union or directly barred from working on the projects. We therefore conclude that they lacked standing to bring their state constitutional claims because the claims were too remote and speculative.

The individual plaintiffs rely on Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209, 212-13, 236-37, 97 S. Ct. 1782, 52 L. Ed. 2d 261 (1977), in which the United States Supreme Court held that the general allegations in a complaint filed by a group of teachers who were unwilling to join a union, refused to pay dues and opposed collective bargaining in the public sector were, "if proved," sufficient to establish a cause of action under the first and fourteenth amendments of the United States constitution. [83] Abood is distinguishable from the present case, however, because the teachers were compelled to pay, as a condition of their employment, a service fee equal in amount to union dues even if the teacher was not a union member, and any teacher who failed to meet that obligation was subject to discharge. Id., 212. In the present case, the individual plaintiffs were not required to

Although [80] article first, § 20, of the Connecticut constitution has been amended by articles five and twenty-one of the amendments to the Connecticut constitution, the classes of persons to which protection was extended under these amendments are not relevant for purposes of the individual plaintiffs' claims in this case.

[34] The state defendants did not respond to this claim.

[35] In their complaint, the individual plaintiffs made similar claims under the federal constitution. The District Court concluded that they had standing to bring those claims on the basis of its determination that the plaintiffs had made a prima facie showing that jurisdiction existed by way of their pleadings and affidavits but dismissed the claims on their merits. We adopt a different view as to the individual plaintiffs' standing to bring their state constitutional claims for the reasons discussed hereinafter.

comply with a condition of employment they opposed, such as payments to the union, nor were they subject to consequences for not joining a union, such as being barred from working on [*443] the projects, because ECI was not the winning bidder, and, thus, they had no opportunity to work on the projects. Consequently, unlike the teachers in Abood, the individual plaintiffs in the present case were only indirectly affected by the city's rejection of ECI's low bid, and they did not have standing to bring their claims.

C

Antitrust Claims

ECI's final claim is that the trial court incorrectly concluded that it did not have standing to prosecute its claim against the city for violation of the Connecticut Antitrust Act. It specifically contends that the PLA requirement in this case violates General Statutes §§ 35-26,[36] 35-28[37] [84] and 35-29[38] because, inter alia, it (1) bars ECI [217] and other nonunion contractors and subcontractors from executing contracts and performing work on the projects without signing the PLA and abiding by its restrictive terms, and (2) resulted in the city's refusal [*444] to award and execute the subject contracts with ECI, the lowest responsible qualified bidder, due to ECI's refusal to execute and abide by the PLA requirement. The nonstate defendants respond that ECI did not have standing to pursue its antitrust claim because it was inadequately briefed, and, even if it was adequately briefed, ECI failed to establish proof of a public injury to competition.[39] The trial court did not directly address ECI's antitrust claim but concluded more generally that the plaintiffs lacked standing to prosecute their "pending claims . . . ." We conclude that ECI had standing to bring its antitrust claim.

We first consider the nonstate defendants' contention that ECI's antitrust claim was inadequately briefed. It is well established that HN25[] "[w]e are not obligated to consider issues that are not adequately briefed. . . . Whe[n] an issue is merely mentioned, but not briefed beyond a bare assertion of the claim, it is deemed to have been waived. . . . In addition, mere conclusory assertions regarding a claim, with no mention of relevant authority and minimal or no citations from the record, will not suffice." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Connecticut Coalition Against Millstone v. Connecticut Siting Council, 286 Conn. 57, 87, 942 A.2d 345 (2008).

In its brief, ECI addresses the standard of review, the statutory provisions allegedly violated, the portions of the complaint containing the antitrust allegations, the manner in which the antitrust statutes were violated and the relevant legal precedent. Accordingly, we conclude that the claim was adequately briefed.[40]

[36] General Statutes § 35-26 provides: HN22[] "Every contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of any part of trade or commerce is unlawful."

[37] General Statutes § 35-28 provides: HN23[] "Without limiting section 35-26, every contract, combination, or conspiracy is unlawful when the same are for the purpose, or have [85] the effect, of: (a) Fixing, controlling, or maintaining prices, rates, quotations, or fees in any part of trade or commerce; (b) fixing, controlling, maintaining, limiting, or discontinuing the production, manufacture, mining, sale, or supply of any part of trade or commerce; (c) allocating or dividing customers or markets, either functional or geographical, in any part of trade or commerce; or (d) refusing to deal, or coercing, persuading, or inducing third parties to refuse to deal with another person."

[38] General Statutes § 35-29 provides: HN24[] "Every lease, sale or contract for the furnishing of services or for the sale of commodities, or for the fixing of prices charged therefor, or for the giving or selling of a discount or rebate therefrom, on the condition or understanding that the lessee or purchaser shall not deal in the services or the commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller, shall be unlawful where the effect of such lease or sale or contract for sale or such condition or understanding may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any part of trade or commerce and where such goods or services are for the use, consumption [86] or resale in this state."

[39] The state defendants did not respond to this claim.

[40] We reject Justice Harper's contention to the contrary. HN26[] Claims are inadequately briefed when they are merely mentioned and not [87] briefed beyond a bare assertion. See, e.g., Hurley v. Heart Physicians, P.C., 298 Conn. 371, 378 n.6, 3 A.3d 892 (2010). Claims are also inadequately briefed when they are raised for the first time in a reply brief; e.g., id.; or consist of "conclusory assertions . . . with no mention of relevant authority and minimal or no citations from the record . . . ." Connecticut

[*445] We next consider whether ECI has standing to bring its antitrust claim. In Cheryl Terry Enterprises, Ltd. v. Hartford, 270 Conn. 619, 622-23, 854 A.2d 1066 (2004) (Cheryl Terry Enterprises), the nonunion plaintiff school bus company claimed an antitrust violation after the defendant, the city of Hartford, rejected its lowest bid on a contract [88] subject to competitive bidding and awarded the contract to a union bidder who had submitted a higher bid. We concluded that HN27[] "the legislature expressly has conferred standing on a broad range of individuals under the [Connecticut [218] Antitrust] [A]ct, including unsuccessful bidders in a municipal bidding process." Id., 632. In the present case, ECI, like the plaintiff in Cheryl Terry Enterprises, also had its low bids rejected on contracts subject to competitive bidding. We therefore conclude, as we did in that case, that ECI, as an unsuccessful bidder, has the statutory right to bring an antitrust claim against the city.

The nonstate defendants argue that the holding in Cheryl Terry Enterprises does not apply because that case involved allegations regarding a purported anti-competitive conspiracy, not the anticompetitive effects of a PLA, and that the PLA issue falls within the construction industry exception to antitrust legislation created under the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (2006). See Building & Construction Trades Council of the Metropolitan District v. Associated Builders & Contractors of Massachusetts/Rhode Island, Inc., 507 U.S. 218, 230, 113 S. Ct. 1190, 122 L. Ed. 2d 565 (1993) [89] (explaining that 29 U.S.C. § 158 [f] "explicitly permits employers in the construction industry—but [*446] no other employers—to enter into prehire [PLAs]"). The nonstate defendants also argue that a validly bargained for PLA is not subject to antitrust scrutiny pursuant to General Statutes § 35-31 (b), which provides qualified immunity for anticompetitive conduct specifically required or directed by state or federal statutes, and that, in order to avoid this exception, the plaintiffs had to plead and prove that the PLA was not the result of a valid collective bargaining process, which they failed to do. We disagree.

The holding in Cheryl Terry Enterprises applies to "unsuccessful bidders in a municipal bidding process" and is not limited in the manner suggested by the nonstate defendants. Cheryl Terry Enterprises, Ltd. v. Hartford, supra, 270 Conn. 632. Moreover, to the extent the nonstate defendants contend that the PLA issue falls within the construction industry exception, the plaintiffs do not challenge the legality of the PLA or the process by which it was negotiated but, rather, the fact that it was included in the mandatory bid specifications with which all prospective bidders, union [90] and nonunion alike, were required to comply. Finally, with respect to the applicability of § 35-31 (b), because the city and the state were acting in a proprietary rather than a regulatory capacity; see part IV A of this opinion; they are not subject, under the present facts, to qualified immunity under that statute. Accordingly, we conclude that the trial court improperly determined that ECI lacked standing to prosecute its antitrust claim.

IV

ALTERNATIVE GROUNDS FOR AFFIRMANCE

A

Federal Preemption

The nonstate defendants contend that the trial court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' complaint for lack of standing can be affirmed on the alternative ground that their [*447] claims are preempted by federal labor law. They argue that the PLA is a prehire collective bargaining agreement within the primary jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) and that the state has no jurisdiction to resolve the plaintiffs' claims under the principles articulated in San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 79 S. Ct. 773, 3 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1959), and Lodge 76, International Assn. of Machinists & Aerospace Workers, AFL-CIO v. Wisconsin Employment Relations Commission, 427 U.S. 132, 96 S. Ct. 2548, 49 L. Ed. 2d 396 [219] (1976) [91] (Machinists). The plaintiffs respond that their claims are not preempted by federal labor law and that the nonstate defendants not only misconstrue the claims but misapply well developed federal and state precedent. We agree with the plaintiffs.

Coalition Against Millstone v. Connecticut Siting Council, supra, 286 Conn. 87. In the present case, ECI makes arguments based on persuasive authority to which the nonstate defendants have responded. See Hasychak v. Zoning Board of Appeals, 296 Conn. 434, 439, 994 A.2d 1270 (2010) (issue decided because all parties addressed it in their briefs and at oral argument). Accordingly, we disagree with Justice Harper that ECI's antitrust claim in the present case was inadequately briefed.

The following additional facts are relevant to our resolution of this issue. During the proceedings in the District Court on the defendants' motions to dismiss, certain of the nonstate defendants argued, inter alia, that the plaintiffs' claims were preempted by federal labor law, namely, § 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 185, and the preemption doctrines articulated in Garmon and Machinists. The District Court concluded, however, that § 301 did not preempt the plaintiff's claims[41] and that it was not necessary [*448] to rule on whether the Garmon or Machinists doctrines applied because "neither of those types of preemption require[s] that the preempted claim be heard in federal court. Rather, those types of preemption are requirements that federal law govern but . . . state judges are fully able and often do apply federal law . . . . And it seems to me, therefore, that the arguments made about whether some of these claims [92] are or are not preempted by federal law are claims that or arguments that must be made in state court following remand." On remand, the trial court stated in its memorandum of decision that it would "not reach and decide the alternative grounds advanced in support of the defendants' motions to dismiss" in light of its conclusion that the plaintiffs lacked standing to prosecute the action on other grounds.

We begin with a brief explanation of the principles set forth in Garmon and Machinists. "Although the [National Labor Relations Act] itself contains no express pre-emption provision, [the United States Supreme Court has] held that HN28[] Congress implicitly mandated two types of pre-emption as necessary to implement federal labor policy. The first, known as Garmon pre-emption . . . is intended to preclude state interference with the [NLRB's] interpretation and active enforcement of the integrated scheme of regulation established by the [National Labor Relations Act]. . . . To this end, Garmon pre-emption forbids [s]tates to regulate activity that the [National Labor Relations Act] protects, prohibits, or arguably protects or prohibits. [94] . . . The second, known as Machinists pre-emption, forbids both the [NLRB] and [s]tates to regulate conduct [*449] that Congress intended be unregulated because left to be controlled by the free play of economic forces. . . . Machinists pre-emption is based on the premise [220] that Congress struck a balance of protection, prohibition, and laissez-faire in respect to union organization, collective bargaining, and labor disputes." (Citations omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America v. Brown, 554 U.S. 60, 65, 128 S. Ct. 2408, 171 L. Ed. 2d 264 (2008).

The nonstate defendants' first six arguments rely on their interpretation and application of Garmon. They contend that the state has no jurisdiction (1) to resolve the plaintiffs' claims that the PLA is "illegal," (2) to regulate or preclude utilization of a PLA on a publicly funded project, (3) to apply state law to regulate an employee's right to join or not to join a union, (4) to regulate the use or application of construction prehire contracts, (5) to apply state law to regulate the use or application of construction subcontracting clauses, and (6) to apply state law to regulate union security [95] provisions. All of the foregoing arguments share the common premise that the imposition of a mandatory PLA bid specification is within the category of activities that the National Labor Relations Act protects, prohibits, or arguably protects or prohibits. See Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America v. Brown, supra, 554 U.S. 65. The nonstate defendants also argue that the plaintiffs' claims are barred under Machinists.

The plaintiffs respond that they are not asking the court to interpret the PLA requirement or to apply it in any manner that affects labor relations between employers and their employees but are merely asking the court to take [41] The court explained: "Although claims under § 301 . . . in fact, are claims that are completely preempted and must be heard in a federal forum, there are no such claims in this case, as I understand it. . . .

"Section 301 [provides that] . . . 'state law is preempted insofar as resolution of the state law claim requires the interpretation of a collective bargaining agreement.' . . . Section 301 preemption does not apply for at least two reasons.

"First, I do not believe that interpretation of a collective bargaining agreement or other labor agreement is required in this case. Referral to that agreement, reference to it, reading it, understanding what it says is required. It is not required that the judge hearing this case interpret . . . a labor agreement.

"Moreover, § 301 preemption [93] occurs in a case where parties to a collective bargaining agreement disagree about their rights or obligations under that agreement, and that is simply not what we have in this case. We don't have a union or union member suing an employer or vice versa. Rather, we have a disappointed bidder suing a number of parties and claiming that the obligation in the bid documents to use union labor is unlawful. That simply is not the type of claim that § 301 reaches."

full cognizance of the disparate effects of the PLA, to understand its provisions, and to deem its mandatory application to all contractors, subcontractors and field labor working on the projects a violation of the competitive bidding laws and state con-stitutional [*450] provisions. The plaintiffs thus argue that neither Garmon nor Machinists operates to preclude their claims and that the state has jurisdiction under the United States Supreme Court's holding in Building & Construction Trades Council of the Metropolitan District v. Associated Builders & Contractors of Massachusetts/Rhode Island, Inc., supra, 507 U.S. 233 [96] (Boston Harbor), that a similar PLA bid specification was not preempted by the National Labor Relations Act. We agree with the plaintiffs.

In Boston Harbor, an association of nonunion contractors sought to enjoin the enforcement of a mandatory bid specification that required all successful bidders and subcontractors to agree to abide by a PLA negotiated by the Massachusetts Water Resources Authority (MWRA) and the local trade unions. Id., 221-22. The association had challenged the bid specification on multiple grounds, including preemption under the National Labor Relations Act. Id., 223. After summarizing the preemption doctrines articulated in Garmon and Machinists, the United States Supreme Court concluded: "When we say that the [National Labor Relations Act] pre-empts state law, we mean that [it] prevents a [s]tate from regulating within a protected zone, whether it be a zone protected and reserved for market freedom, see Machinists, or for NLRB jurisdiction, see Garmon. A [s]tate does not regulate, however, simply by acting within one of these protected areas. When a [s]tate owns and manages property, for example, it must interact with private participants in the marketplace. In [97] so doing, the [s]tate is not subject to pre-emption by the [National Labor Relations Act], because pre-emption doctrines apply only to state regulation.

[221] "Our decisions in this area support the distinction between government as regulator and government as proprietor. We have held consistently that HN29[] the [National [*451] Labor Relations Act] was intended to supplant state labor regulation, not all legitimate state activity that affects labor." (Emphasis in original.) Id., 226-27. In light of this precedent, the court held that the PLA bid specification did not constitute government regulation, and, therefore, it was not subject to preemption under Garmon or Machinists. Id., 232. The court further explained: "[The PLA bid specification] constitutes proprietary conduct on the part of the [c]ommonwealth of Massachusetts, which legally has enforced a valid [PLA]. As Chief Judge [Stephen] Breyer aptly noted in his dissent in the [First Circuit] Court of Appeals, 'when the MWRA, acting in the role of purchaser of construction services, acts just like a private contractor would act, and conditions its purchasing [on] the very sort of labor agreement that Congress explicitly authorized and expected frequently [98] to find, it does not "regulate" the workings of the market forces that Congress expected to find; it exemplifies them.'. . .

"Because . . . [the PLA bid specification] is not preempted by the [National Labor Relations Act], it follows that a preliminary injunction against enforcement of this bid specification was improper."[42] (Citation omitted.) Id., 232-33.

Although the issue in Boston Harbor was limited to whether federal preemption applied to the enforcement of an otherwise lawful PLA; see id., 220; the same logic applies to the plaintiffs' state law claims in the present case. Accordingly, we conclude that the plaintiffs' claims are not preempted by federal labor law under [*452] Garmon or Machinists [99] because the city was acting in a proprietary capacity as a purchaser of construction services, rather than as a regulator, when it entered into the agreement with the local unions and imposed the mandatory PLA bid specification on successful bidders for the two school construction projects.[43] The District Court made the [42] The First Circuit Court of Appeals had held that the mandatory PLA bid specification was invalid due to federal preemption under the National Labor Relations Act. See Associated Builders & Contractors of Massachusetts/Rhode Island, Inc. v. Massachusetts Water Resources Authority, 935 F.2d 345, 355 (1st Cir. 1991), rev'd sub nom. Building & Construction Trades Council of the Metropolitan District v. Associated Builders & Contractors of Massachusetts/Rhode Island, Inc., supra, 507 U.S. 218.

[43] We are not persuaded by the contrary view in any of the supplemental authorities urged by the nonstate defendants. See Tri-M Group, LLC v. Sharp, 638 F.3d 406, 418-26 (3d Cir. 2011); Johnson v. Rancho Santiago Community College District, 623 F.3d 1011, 1023-29 (9th Cir. 2010), cert. denied sub nom. Bertalan v. Rancho Santiago Community College District, __ U.S. __, 131 S. Ct. 2096, 179 L. Ed. 2d 891 (2011); *Building Industry Electrical Contractors Assn. v. New York, Docket No. 10 Civ. 8002 (RPP), 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86759, *17-35 (S.D.N.Y. August 5, 2011) [100] .

same observation when it noted that, "in this situation, the [city] is acting like a private purchaser of construction services and is permitted . . . to state a preference for union or, if it were to choose to do so, nonunion labor, just as any other buyer of construction services in the market could. I believe that view is supported by the [United States] Supreme Court's decision in . . . Boston Harbor."

Moreover, this is not the only court that has reached such a conclusion. In George Harms Construction Co. v. New Jersey Turnpike Authority, 137 N.J. 8, 644 A.2d [222] 76 (1994), the New Jersey Supreme Court, in considering whether New Jersey law prohibited PLAs, observed: "[U]nder Boston Harbor, federal labor law does not prohibit a state entering the construction market from using the same construction-industry exception regarding [PLAs] that private purchasers of construction labor use. However, a state's laws may prohibit a [PLA] specification in public contracts without running afoul of the [National Labor Relations Act]. Garmon preemption does not apply because a state-law prohibition of [PLAs] on public projects is merely one way in which a state may choose to act as a market participant in the construction industry. In other words, a state may choose [*453] to enter or not to enter a [PLA] just like any other purchaser of construction services. Machinists preemption also does not apply because a state-law prohibition of [PLAs] on public projects does not constitute impermissible regulation [101] of an area that the [National Labor Relations Act] contemplated would be left to the free play of economic forces. Such a prohibition amounts to nothing more than the public equivalent of a corporation's [bylaw] regarding the purchase of construction services. In short, when a state uses [PLAs] on public projects, it is not acting as a regulator of private actors; rather, it is merely defining its role as a proprietor/purchaser of labor in the construction industry. Thus, because the [National Labor Relations Act] does not preempt the field, [it] must [be] determine[d] whether New Jersey law prohibits [PLAs]." Id., 26-27.

The nonstate defendants argue that the plaintiffs in the present case asked the trial court to apply state law to preclude a public entity's right to utilize a PLA on a publicly funded construction project but that the United States Supreme Court has noted that denying a public entity the option to utilize a PLA, such as one available to a private owner or developer, places restrictions on Congress' intended free play of economic forces that the court identified in Machinists. The nonstate defendants thus argue that such a regulatory effort arguably falls within the [102] Machinists doctrine and that the lower court lacks jurisdiction to hold the PLA "'illegal,'" as the plaintiffs have urged. The nonstate defendants, however, misconstrue the plaintiffs' claim. The plaintiffs are not claiming that a public entity should be precluded from utilizing a PLA on a publicly funded construction project but that the mandatory application of a PLA requirement to all contractors, subcontractors and field labor working on the school construction projects in this case and on other public school construction projects in Connecticut is a violation of the competitive [*454] bidding laws and state antitrust law. Accordingly, the plaintiffs' claim does not fall within the purview of Machinists, as the nonstate defendants contend, and we conclude that federal law does not preempt their state law claims. For this reason, we reject the nonstate defendants' alternative ground for affirmance of the trial court's judgment.

Sovereign Immunity

The state defendants claim that the trial court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' complaint for lack of standing can be affirmed in part on the alternative ground that the plaintiffs' claims against them[44] are barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity. [103] The plaintiffs respond that the state defendants' sovereign immunity claim cannot be [223] considered because of their failure to file a timely preliminary statement of issues pursuant to Practice Book § 63-4 (a) (1) or a cross appeal pursuant to Practice Book § 61-8. The plaintiffs further argue that, even if this defect is overlooked, sovereign immunity does not protect the state defendants because they clearly intruded on the plaintiffs' constitutionally protected interests and acted in excess of their statutory authority. We conclude that the state defendants' sovereign immunity claim is not barred by the untimely filing of their preliminary statement and that their claim succeeds on its merits.

[44] Counts one, four, five, six, nine and ten of the ten count second amended complaint apply to the state defendants as well as certain of the nonstate defendants.

The following additional facts are relevant to our resolution of this claim. As previously noted, the trial court stated in its memorandum of decision that it would "not reach and decide the alternative grounds advanced in support of the defendants' motions to dismiss because . . . the plaintiffs lack[ed] sufficient [*455] interest in the outcome [104] of [the] controversy to justify deciding the issues thereby presented on the basis of their advocacy." Thereafter, the state defendants did not file a preliminary statement of issues within the required twenty days of the plaintiffs' filing of their preliminary statement of issues but waited more than seven months before filing a document entitled, "Defendants' Amended Preliminary Statement of the Issues," in which they identified as the sole issue whether the plaintiffs' claims were barred by the doctrine of sovereign immunity. They also did not file a cross appeal.

We first consider the plaintiffs' claim that the untimeliness of the state defendants' preliminary statement of issues and their failure to file a cross appeal are fatal procedural flaws. HN30[] Practice Book § 63-4 (a) (1) provides in relevant part: "If any appellee wishes to (A) present for review alternate grounds upon which the judgment may be affirmed . . . that appellee shall file a preliminary statement of issues within twenty days from the filing of the appellant's preliminary statement of the issues.

"Whenever the failure [224] to identify an issue in a preliminary statement of issues prejudices an opposing party, the court [105] may refuse to consider such issue."

Practice Book § 61-8 provides: HN31[] "Any appellee or appellees aggrieved by the judgment or decision from which the appellant has appealed may jointly or severally file a cross appeal within ten days from the filing of the appeal. Except where otherwise provided, the filing and form of cross appeals, extensions of time for filing them, and all subsequent proceedings shall be the same as though the cross appeal were an original appeal. No entry or record fee need be paid." We conclude that neither rule of practice precludes this court's consideration of the state defendants' sovereign immunity claim.

[*456] With respect to the untimely filing of the preliminary statement of issues, we concluded in Mickey v. Mickey, 292 Conn. 597, 603 n.9, 974 A.2d 641 (2009), in which the procedural issues raised by the appellee as alternative grounds for affirmance had not been identified in the required preliminary statement, that, although the record did not indicate that the appellee had filed a preliminary statement, we nonetheless would review the issues because the appellant had not been prejudiced by the lack of such a statement. In the present case, the state defendants [106] filed the required preliminary statement but the filing was merely untimely. Moreover, the plaintiffs have not argued that the untimely filing was prejudicial, and we see no reason why they would be prejudiced by our review of the state defendants' claim. See Practice Book § 63-4 (a) (1) ("[w]henever the failure to identify an issue in a preliminary statement of issues prejudices an opposing party, the court may refuse to consider such issue"). Accordingly, we conclude that the untimely filing of the state defendants' preliminary statement of issues does not bar review of their sovereign immunity claim.

With respect to the state defendants' failure to file a cross appeal, there would have been no reason for them to do so because they were not aggrieved by the trial court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' action. We thus proceed to consider the merits of the sovereign immunity claim.

We begin with the governing legal principles. HN32[] "Sovereign immunity relates to a court's subject matter jurisdiction over a case . . . and therefore presents a question of law over which we exercise de novo review. . . . The principle that the state cannot be sued without its consent, or sovereign immunity, is [107] well established under our case law. . . . It has deep roots in this state and our legal system in general, finding its origin in ancient common law. . . . Not only have we recognized [*457] the state's immunity as an entity, but [w]e have also recognized that because the state can act only through its officers and agents, a suit against a state officer concerning a matter in which the officer represents the state is, in effect, against the state. . . . Exceptions to this doctrine are few and narrowly construed under our jurisprudence." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Law, 284 Conn. 701, 711, 937 A.2d 675 (2007). The presumption of sovereign immunity is not absolute and may be overcome "(1) when the legislature, either expressly or by force of a necessary implication, statutorily waives the state's sovereign immunity . . . (2) when an action seeks declaratory or injunctive relief on the basis of a substantial claim that the state or one of its officers has violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights . . . and (3) when an action seeks declaratory or injunctive relief on the basis of a substantial allegation of wrongful conduct to promote an illegal purpose in [108] excess of the officer's statutory authority." (Citations omitted.) Id., 720. "In making this determination, this court has recognized the well established principle that HN33[] statutes in derogation of sovereign immunity should be strictly construed. . . . [When] there is any doubt about their meaning or intent they are given the effect which makes the least rather than the most change in sovereign immunity." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id., 712.

In light of our conclusion in part III B of this opinion that the individual plaintiffs lack standing, and because the plaintiffs do not challenge the state defendants' sovereign immunity claim on the ground of legislative waiver, the only remaining issue is whether the state defendants fall within the sovereign immunity exception that they acted in excess of their statutory authority on the basis of the allegations in counts one and six of the plaintiffs' complaint. In this regard, the state defendants argue that they have not waived sovereign [*458] immunity because § 10-287 imposes a mandate on municipalities, not on the state defendants, to select the lowest responsible qualified bidder. Given the state's lack of participation in the bid selection [109] process, the state defendants contend that there is no statutory duty that they exceeded with respect to the school construction projects. They argue that their conduct, as alleged in the complaint, is far too attenuated, remote and unrelated to the underlying issues to strip them of their sovereign immunity. They further point out that, on its face, the complaint alleges only that the state defendants "allow[ed]" the PLA to be implemented [225] and applied to the school construction projects and, consequently, that the complaint falls short of alleging that they acted in excess of their statutory authority.

The plaintiffs respond that the state defendants were not insignificant participants in the bidding process because § 10-287[45] requires the department to oversee [*459] and administer reimbursement funding for 95 percent of the [45] General Statutes § 10-287 provides in relevant part: HN34[] "(b) (1) All orders and contracts for school building construction receiving state assistance under this chapter, except as provided in subdivision (2) of this subsection, shall be awarded to the lowest responsible qualified bidder only after a public invitation to bid . . . .

"(2) All orders and contracts for architectural or construction management services shall be awarded from a pool of not more than the four most responsible qualified proposers after a public selection process. Such process shall, at a minimum, involve requests for qualifications, followed by requests for proposals, including fees, from the proposers [111] meeting the qualifications criteria of the request for qualifications process. . . . Following the qualification process, the awarding authority shall evaluate the proposals to determine the four most responsible qualified proposers using those criteria previously listed in the requests for qualifications and requests for proposals for selecting architectural or construction management services specific to the project or school district. Such evaluation criteria shall include due consideration of the proposer's pricing for the project, experience with work of similar size and scope as required for the order or contract, organizational and team structure for the order or contract, past performance data, including, but not limited to, adherence to project schedules and project budgets and the number of change orders for projects, the approach to the work required for the contract and documented contract oversight capabilities, and may include criteria specific to the project. Final selection by the awarding authority is limited to the pool of the four most responsible qualified proposers and shall include consideration of all criteria included within the request for proposals. As used [112] in this subdivision, 'most responsible qualified proposer' means the proposer who is qualified by the awarding authority when considering price and the factors necessary for faithful performance of the work based on the criteria and scope of work included in the request for proposals.

"(c) If the commissioner determines that a building project has not met the approved conditions of the original application, the State Board of Education may withhold subsequent state grant payments for said project until appropriate action, as determined by the commissioner, is taken to cause the building project to be in compliance with the approved conditions or may require repayment of all state grant payments for said project when such appropriate action is not undertaken within a reasonable time.

"(d) Each town or regional school district shall submit a final grant application to the Department of Education within one year from the date of completion and acceptance of the building project by the town or regional school district. If a town or regional school district fails to submit a final grant application within said period of time, the commissioner may withhold ten per cent of the state reimbursement [113] for such project."

city's school construction costs. The plaintiffs note that the department must approve project plans and specifications as well as the bidding procedures and that, if the department had determined that mandatory PLAs were impermissible, PLAs would have been eliminated from all taxpayer funded municipal school construction projects. Instead, the plaintiffs argue that the [110] department issued a "letter opinion" in 1997 via the state office of the attorney general providing that PLAs on state funded, municipal school construction projects do not violate § 10-287 and that the department has adopted that policy. The plaintiffs thus contend that, because the state defendants have determined that PLAs are permissible, they have in effect refused to [226] enforce the statutory prescription requiring that awards shall go to the lowest, responsible, qualified bidder. We agree with the state defendants.

[*460] "For a claim under the third exception [to sovereign immunity], the plaintiffs must do more than allege that the defendants' conduct was in excess of their statutory authority; they also must allege or otherwise establish facts that reasonably support those allegations. . . . In the absence of a proper factual basis in the complaint to support the applicability of these exceptions, the granting of a motion to dismiss on sovereign immunity grounds is proper." (Citation omitted; internal quotation marks omitted.) DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Law, supra, 284 Conn. 721.

We conclude that the plaintiffs have failed to allege facts that reasonably support their claims against the state defendants. The principal allegations against the state defendants in the second amended complaint are that "the . . . [department] is providing 90 [percent] of the funding for the entire [p]roject, including the [e]lectrical [b]id [p]ackage, [114] through money paid by Connecticut taxpayers and allocated by the [s]tate [l]egislature" pursuant to §§ 10-287 (b) and 4b-91 (c), which require that contracts shall be awarded to the lowest responsible qualified bidder prequalified under § 4a-100, "[a]t all times relevant hereto, the [department], acting by its [c]ommissioner or his agents, has been aware of [the] [c]ity's . . . actions in imposing [the] mandatory PLA, and has continued to fund the [p]roject nonetheless," and "[b]y implementing [the] PLA, or allowing its implementation, for a public school construction project funded almost entirely by the taxpayers of the [s]tate of Connecticut and also the taxpayers of the [c]ity of Hartford, the [c]ity, the [department] and the [c]ommissioner are undermining the very object and integrity of the public competitive bidding process, and are exhibiting patent favoritism to the trade unions and to union contractors, all to the unfair and severe disadvantage of [nonunion] contractors, such as ECI and its individual plaintiff . . . [nonunion] employees [*461] in this particular instance." Other paragraphs allege that the city imposed the PLA requirement, was the "awarding authority" and acted [115] beyond its delegated authority in not awarding the contracts at issue to the lowest, responsible, qualified bidder. These allegations are insufficient to support a claim that the state defendants acted in excess of their statutory authority.

The judgment is reversed insofar as the trial court dismissed the claims of the named plaintiff, Electrical Contractors, Inc., against the defendants city of Hartford, Morganti Group, Inc., Downes Construction Company, LLC, and Custom Electric, Inc., and the case is remanded with direction to deny the motions to dismiss as to those claims and for further proceedings according to law; the judgment is affirmed insofar as the trial court dismissed the claims of the named plaintiff, Electrical Contractors, Inc., against the named defendant, the department of education, and the defendant Mark K. McQuillan, the commissioner of education, and insofar as the trial court dismissed the claims of the plaintiffs Jose L. Gonzalez, Jose G. Maldonado, Dan Czyzewski, Bradley Wheaton, Craig Busca and Sean Smith.

In this opinion ROGERS, C. J., and NORCOTT, PALMER, McLACHLAN and EVELEIGH, Js., concurred.

The plaintiffs also refer to the state defendants' authority pursuant to General Statutes § 49-41, which requires that contractors provide to the state or municipality performance bonds for contracts to construct, modify or repair public buildings and public works.

HARPER, J., concurring in part [116] and dissenting in part. In determining that the named plaintiff, [227] Electrical Contractors, Inc. (ECI),[1] has standing under Connecticut's competitive bidding statutes, the majority opinion departs from the narrowly circumscribed doctrine of standing established by our past cases dealing with these statutes. Our subject matter jurisdiction in this area is inherently limited, and the majority's expansion of that jurisdiction disregards both our own precedent, [*462] particularly this court's clear and controlling holding in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, 251 Conn. 169, 181, 740 A.2d 813 (1999), and the lawmaking authority of the legislature. I further disagree that ECI has adequately briefed its claim under the Connecticut Antitrust Act. General Statutes § 35-24 et seq. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from these holdings.

I

I agree with the majority that, under settled case law, the question of whether ECI has standing to allege a violation of the competitive bidding statutes turns on whether its claim meets the following standard: ECI "had to establish a colorable [117] claim that: (1) [it] either (a) had submitted a bid or (b) would have submitted a bid but for the alleged illegalities in the bidding process and the precluded bid was functionally equivalent to the project specifications; and (2) the alleged illegalities amounted to fraud, corruption, favoritism or acts undermining the objective and integrity of the competitive bidding process." (Emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 181.

As our case law demonstrates, to fulfill this test's second prong, a plaintiff must make a colorable claim that the bidding process—from the development of project specifications and bidding rules to the application of these to bidders—was tainted by procedural impropriety. The court held that standing was appropriate in Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, 189 Conn. 539, 545, 456 A.2d 1199 (1983), for example, because the defendant allegedly had accepted an irregular bid based on an oral rule addendum communicated only to one bidder, precluding other bidders from competing on equal terms. Conversely, in *Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, 191 Conn. 497, 499, 505, 467 [463] A.2d 674 (1983), this court concluded [118] that the plaintiff lacked standing to challenge the rejection of its lowest bid for failure to include a handwritten signature on the bid document because the signature requirement—however arbitrary or detrimental to the plaintiff—was uniformly applied and there was no showing of fraud or favoritism. This court reiterated the decisive significance of procedural irregularity in Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, 220 Conn. 689, 696, 600 A.2d 1019 (1991), when it determined that an evidentiary hearing was required to determine whether the plaintiff's claim implicated such irregularities. There, the plaintiff had alleged that the state favored one vendor over others by using information it received from that vendor to draft requests for proposals that could be fulfilled only by that vendor and by providing information relevant to the requests exclusively to that vendor. Id., 691. The court concluded that this result—a single source bid specification—was not inherently illegal but that it would be invalid if it were intended to benefit the specific vendor rather than the public. We held that the plaintiff was entitled to an evidentiary hearing to determine [228] whether it had standing under this [119] standard. Id., 695-96. In Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 169, the court concluded that unsuccessful bidders lacked standing to challenge the legality of a project labor agreement. The court concluded, inter alia, that the issue of standing turned not on whether some bidders were effectively excluded but on whether the bidding process was applied consistently and in good faith. Id., 189.

Here, ECI's long list of grievances; see footnote 23 of the majority opinion; fails to allege any of the features of procedural impropriety we previously have considered significant. There is no claim of informational asymmetry such that some bidders knew more than others, no claim that the defendants, the city of Hartford, [*464] the state department of education and its commissioner, and four other entities,[2] engaged in secret communications with any bidders, no suggestion that the defendants applied rules differently to some bidders than to others, no claim that officials acted in bad faith. Instead, ECI premises its complaint on the fact that all bidders, "union" and "nonunion" alike, were subjected equally to the same bidding terms and requirements and that [120] the defendants did not exempt ECI from that process. Rather than procedural irregularity, which ECI effectively requests rather than protests, ECI's central complaint appears to be based on the ultimate economic harm it allegedly will sustain because the project labor agreement requirements put it at a competitive disadvantage, effectively precluding it from being a successful bidder on public contracts. To tether this complaint to the purposes of the competitive bidding statutes, ECI further alleges that by requiring bidders to perform all project work with union labor under the terms of a project labor agreement, nonunion contractors, whose business models are based on maintaining a labor supply outside of the union system, are disadvantaged in their ability to successfully bid and thereafter perform. As a result, ECI argues, the project labor agreement decreases competition for the project and increases the project's costs to the public.

As the trial court properly recognized, this claim is essentially identical to one this court rejected in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 169, [121] a case in which ECI also was a plaintiff as a subcontractor to the named plaintiff. In that case, we explained: "The crux of the association's claim is that its general contractor members were precluded from participation in the bid process because the project labor agreement requirement imposed costs [*465] upon nonunion general contractors that made it economically unfeasible for them to bid. As a result, the association argues, general contractors and the association have standing to challenge the project labor agreement as a specification that . . . arbitrarily and anticompetitively limits access to the bidding process. The association contends that limiting the number of potential bidders violates not only the integrity of competitive bidding but also injures the general public by driving up the cost of government funded projects." Id., 187.

Our reasoning in that case for concluding that such a claim did not provide a basis for standing bears repeating, as it applies with equal force to the present case: "Even assuming that the project labor [229] agreement requirement might increase the project's cost, we know of no requirement in the competitive bidding statutes that propels cost considerations [122] to the top of the list of appropriate considerations for public contract specifications. If cost alone were the determinative factor of appropriate bid criteria, disappointed bidders or nonbidders would have virtually unlimited opportunities to litigate project specifications on the ground of alternate designs, materials, safety requirements and so on. Such litigation would involve courts in comparative cost assessments that would severely impair the discretion of governmental bodies entrusted with the responsibility for governmental construction projects. It is neither unusual nor unfair for project specifications to give some potential bidders an economic advantage over others because of factors such as the bidder's expertise, specialization and reliability.

"The claim made by the [named plaintiff] . . . is much more sweeping than the one that we recognized in Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 220 Conn. 690-91. The objection to the specification in Unisys Corp. was not that [equipment from the defendant International [*466] Business Machines Corporation] would be more expensive, but that vendors of functionally equivalent hardware or software had been excluded from the bidding process. [123] Id., 691, 695. Our focus was not on the possibility that a particular specification might limit the number of eligible bidders, but on whether the specification necessarily had an adverse impact on the integrity of the bidding process. See id., 696.

"As the trial court observed, the record . . . demonstrates a nondiscriminatory decision by the city to use a project labor agreement, in the public interest, to avoid delays in the project and to recruit and maintain the necessary workforce. The court reasonably determined that the city's legitimate business decision fell within the bounds of the discretion afforded to the city by our competitive bidding statutes.[3]

[3] In the present case, there is evidence in the record supporting the legitimacy of this decision. The record reflects that project labor agreements had yielded successful results in other projects in the state. Moreover, regardless of whether conditions are such that this particular project labor agreement will yield the same result, it cannot be said that the objective of the defendant city of Hartford in requiring this project labor agreement is antithetical to the purpose of the competitive bidding statutes.

"In conclusion, [124] we reiterate our adherence to the boundaries of the standing principles established in our existing competitive bidding case law. . . . The determinative factor [under that case law] . . . was not whether some bidders had been precluded from the bidding process but whether the requirements in that process had been applied consistently and in good faith. . . . That, essentially, is what has occurred in the present case as well." (Citations omitted; emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187-89.

The reasoning and conclusions articulated in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors dictate the result here, and I am unconvinced by the majority's [*467] attempts to distinguish the present case from it and to diminish its precedential effect. The majority emphasizes that the court in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors did not reach the merits of the plaintiffs' claim, but that fact is irrelevant; the court in that case properly did not reach the merits because it lacked jurisdiction. The court articulated at [230] length the reasons why it lacked subject matter jurisdiction to consider the merits given the limited basis for standing [125] in this area, and these reasons equally should preclude reaching the merits of the claim in the present case. Like the plaintiffs in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors, ECI has failed to make any colorable factual showing of procedural impropriety. Although ECI has proffered arguably relevant evidence regarding the ultimate financial consequences of the project labor agreement, as the plaintiffs in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187 n.12, apparently did not, evidence of a problematic outcome is alone inadequate for purposes of showing procedural impropriety under our settled case law and under the reasoning of that case.

The subsequent enactment of prequalification requirements under General Statutes § 4a-100, moreover, does nothing to disturb the court's reasoning in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors. That statute has absolutely no bearing on what may be included in the specifications of a public project, such as a project labor agreement,[4] and it creates no new [*468] basis [231] for standing in relation to the competitive bidding laws.

[4] The majority's approach to cost appears to conflate two distinct levels of cost consideration: first, the specifications of a project—a building's location, its size, the specific construction materials, the time to completion, permissible levels of noise or pollution, etc.—dictate in broad terms what a project will cost. After those specifications are set, the competitive bidding process allows a public entity to find the contractor who will satisfactorily perform the prespecified project at the lowest price. Section 4a-100 plays a role in determining who may participate in this second level bidding process, but it is wholly unrelated to the initial development of project specifications at the first level. ECI here seeks to challenge not the process of submitting bids but the legitimacy of a mandated specification of the project itself, namely, that contractors abide by a project labor agreement. ECI expressly refused to comply with this specification, and consequently it was by definition not the lowest [127] bidder on the project specified by the defendants. ECI's claim in the present case essentially asks us to nullify that specification in order to render its low bid compliant on the ground that the specification increases the project's cost. Not only is this claim unrelated to § 4a-100, but the court in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors already has spoken directly to this issue: "[W]e know of no requirement in the competitive bidding statutes that propels cost considerations to the top of the list of appropriate considerations for public contract specifications. If cost alone were the determinative factor of appropriate bid criteria, disappointed bidders or nonbidders would have virtually unlimited opportunities to litigate project specifications on the ground of alternate designs, materials, safety requirements and so on." (Emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 187-88.

The potentially absurd results invited by the majority's undifferentiated emphasis on cost may be illustrated by considering a hypothetical challenge under the competitive bidding statutes to a public project based on material, rather than labor, costs. [128] Suppose a public entity solicits bids to construct a building with a slate roof, rather than an asphalt shingled roof. The decision to specify the roofing materials is made on the basis of desired longevity, aesthetic preference, or arbitrary whim. Slate is much more difficult to work with than asphalt, and only a subset of contractors possess the skill and access to materials needed to work with slate efficiently. Other contractors, who out of habit, aesthetic preference, or chance do not typically work with slate, are therefore, as ECI here complains, placed at a significant competitive disadvantage because of the specified material input. Under the logic of the majority opinion, if a "non-slate" contractor were to submit a low bid, conditional on being allowed to construct the roof from asphalt, and the bid were rejected, the disappointed noncompliant bidder would have standing to bring an action based on a claimed violation of competitive bidding laws by asserting that requiring slate roofs would decrease competition and increase the costs to the public. This is plainly nonsensical and inconsistent with the limited grounds of standing permitted under existing Connecticut legislation. [129] There might be reason to doubt the wisdom of insisting on a slate roof, Indeed, to the extent this statute relates to standing at all, it would seem to limit the field [126] of prospective bidders who could satisfy the first prong of the standing test to those who are prequalified for the project, not to expand the scope of the second prong of that test.

[*469] I further disagree with the majority's characterization of the comprehensive discussion of this issue in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors, which constituted one of the two grounds on which the court in that case concluded that it lacked subject matter jurisdiction, as "nothing more than dicta." The court declared at the outset of its analysis that "the plaintiffs did not establish that the general contractor members of the association had met either part of this test." (Emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 186. The two prongs of our test in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors are both threshold jurisdictional requirements that must be met for a plaintiff to have standing to pursue a hearing on [130] the merits, and the trial court in the present case plainly held that neither was satisfied.[5] Sensible jurisprudence and weighty authority strongly support the proposition, consistent with this court's past practice,[6] that "when two independent reasons are given to support a judgment, the ruling on neither is obiter [dictum], but each is the judgment of the court and of equal validity with the other."[7] (Internal quotation [*470] [232] marks omitted.) California v. United States, 438 U.S. 645, 689 n.10, 98 S. Ct. 2985, 57 L. Ed. 2d 1018 (1978).

particularly if the decision is the product of arbitrary whim, and there may be cause for questioning the mandated use of arguably more expensive union labor. But under the present constitutional division of power, in the absence of a colorable claim of procedural corruption, these are judgments to be made by the legislature, not by this court.

[5] For this reason, I am not swayed by the majority's citation to Statewide Grievance Committee v. Rozbicki, 211 Conn. 232, 558 A.2d 986 (1989). In the present case, both prongs of the test in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors speak equally to subject matter jurisdiction, whereas Rozbicki refers to a discussion of the merits following a finding that jurisdiction was lacking.

Preciose,

Nonetheless, even if this discussion were dicta, the reasoning expressed therein would retain its persuasive force. The claim dealt with in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 178, [134] [*471] "raise[d] no new issues of principle with respect to the requirements of standing, either in general or in the particular context of competitive bidding." Rather, the court simply applied established principles developed in previous cases.[8] As I discuss in greater detail in the following discussion, these prior cases carved out an exceptional basis for standing as a vehicle for challenging fraudulent or corrupt official actions, but they also placed strict limits on that standing. The majority exceeds these limits, contravening not only our own precedent but legislative authority as well. The majority's concern with advancing the cost saving goals of competitive bidding laws may be well founded, but it is for the legislature—not the courts—to determine who may enforce those statutes and how. The following outline of the constitutional framework of standing in general and the historical development of our unusual standing jurisprudence with respect to competitive bidding illustrates how the majority's conclusion runs afoul of these significant principles.

The question of standing deals not only with a party's right to seek relief, but also with the fundamental authority of the court to consider an issue: "[i]f a party is found to lack standing, the court is without [233] subject matter jurisdiction to determine the cause." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) *Gold v. Rowland, 296 Conn. 186, 207-208, [472] 994 A.2d 106 (2010). This limit [136] on judicial authority is, as the United States Supreme Court has recognized, "a constitutional principle that prevents courts of law from undertaking tasks assigned to the political branches." Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 349, 116 S. Ct. 2174, 135 L. Ed. 2d 606 (1996). We similarly have noted that "subject matter jurisdiction is, with certain constitutional exceptions . . . a matter of statute, not judicial rule making." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Batte-Holmgren v. Commissioner of Public Health, 281 Conn. 277, 286, 914 A.2d 996 (2007); see Conn. Const., amend. XVIII ("[t]he powers of government shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them confided to a separate magistracy").

In keeping with these principles, we have ordinarily recognized two grounds upon which a plaintiff may properly have standing to challenge government action: classical, or common-law, aggrievement and statutory aggrievement—standing conferred by statute. As the majority recognizes, ECI plainly does not have standing on either of these grounds. With respect to competitive bidding statutes, however, this court has taken the unusual step of establishing a quasi-statutory basis for standing [137] that invokes the public oriented goals of competitive bidding laws but that is not specifically grounded in the statutory text. For many years prior to creating this new source of standing, this court had recognized that the competitive bidding statutes "are for the purpose of inviting competition, to guard against favoritism, improvidence, extravagance, fraud and corruption in the awarding of municipal contracts, and to secure the best work or supplies at the lowest price practicable, and are enacted for the benefit of property holders and taxpayers, and not for the benefit or enrichment of bidders, and should be so construed and administered as to accomplish such purpose fairly and reasonably with sole reference to the public interest." [*473] (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Austin v. Housing Authority, 143 Conn. 338, 345, 122 A.2d 399 (1956). Under this traditional rubric, this court determined that disappointed bidders did not inherently have statutory standing; Joseph Rugo, Inc. v. Henson, 148 Conn. 430, 435, 171 A.2d 409 (1961); and in doing so the court noted that "[c]ourts will only intervene to prevent the rejection of a bid when the obvious purpose of the rejection is to defeat [138] the object and integrity of competitive bidding." Id., 434.

129 N.J. 451, 461, 609 A.2d 1280 (1992) ("[r]ather than treating that discussion of the merits as dicta, we consider it an alternative holding").

[8] Even while dismissing the reasoning of Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors as mere dicta, the majority invokes that case [135] to justify its holding in the present case: "One need only examine the reasons why the court in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors concluded that the [named plaintiff] did not have standing to understand why ECI in the present case does." (Emphasis in original.) While the majority's assertion nicely demonstrates that it really is possible to have one's cake and eat it too, the argument suffers from a fundamental logical flaw: simply because one set of reasons leads to a particular result, it does not follow that the absence of this reasoning compels a different result. Indeed, it is only by ignoring all past precedent that the majority is able to suggest that the specific reasoning articulated in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors represents the only basis on which standing is properly denied.

In Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, supra, 189 Conn. 543-45, this court held for the first time that even though public bidding laws create no cause of action for disappointed bidders, such a bidder had standing to pursue a claim that a town had violated these laws by accepting a conditional combined discount bid based on an oral addendum known only to one bidder, precluding other bidders from competing on equal terms. In so holding, we reasoned that "[t]here is a growing trend for courts to permit one who has been aggrieved by a refusal to award a public contract pursuant to lowest responsible bidder provisions to also vindicate the public interest by challenging such arbitrary or capricious action by governmental officials."[9] Id., 545. [234] The court later emphasized the limits of [*474] this holding, explaining that: "In Spiniello Construction Co. v. Manchester, [supra, 539], we recognized that our prior decisions had the effect of preventing judicial review of potentially meritorious claims concerning the implementation and execution of competitive bidding statutes. We also acknowledged the fact that the group most benefited [139] by the statute—the public—had no effective means of protecting their interests. . . . Thus, we held that where fraud, corruption or acts undermining the objective and integrity of the bidding process existed, an unsuccessful bidder did have standing under the public bidding statute. We limited the scope of our holding in order to strike the proper balance between fulfilling the purposes of the competitive bidding statutes and preventing frequent litigation that might result in extensive delay in the commencement and completion of government projects to the detriment of the public." (Citations omitted.) Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, supra, 191 Conn. 504-505.

I am uncertain of the source of authority underlying the court's decision in Spiniello Construction Co.[10] Nonetheless, there and in subsequent cases we properly have cleaved to the long-standing principle that "[c]ourts will only intervene to prevent the rejection of a bid when the obvious purpose of the rejection is to defeat [141] the object and integrity of competitive bidding." (Emphasis added.) Joseph Rugo, Inc. v. Henson, supra, 148 Conn. 434. Thus, in denying standing in Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, supra, 191 Conn. 497, the court explained the factors that led to a different [*475] result than in Spiniello Construction Co.: "There, the municipality had imparted information to one bidder that it had not provided other bidders. . . . Thus, parity of information no longer existed among the bidders as envisioned by the statute. In this case . . . [t]he construction company which received the contract award was not given any special advantage over the plaintiff in submitting its bid, nor was it privy to any secret information. . . . The [commissioner of administrative services (commissioner)] did not apply its requirement inconsistently or in a discriminatory fashion. Nor was there any proof that the commissioner was acting in bad faith." (Citation omitted.) Id., 505-506. The question of whether standing was appropriate, the court concluded, [235] turned not on the inherent logic or illogic of the underlying bidding terms but on the presence of inconsistency or discrimination in the process of crafting and applying [142] those terms.

In Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 220 Conn. 696, the court reiterated the significance of procedural irregularities, noting that "[requests for proposals] are not necessarily illegal merely because the specifications of the [requests] can be met by only one vendor. . . . [M]ore must appear in order to render the specifications and the [9] This court's decision in Spiniello Construction Co. appears to have been influenced by the adoption of an "injury in fact" basis for standing in the federal courts following the enactment of the federal Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 500 et seq., which in turn was applied to claims challenging federal bidding statutes. Our decision cited several federal court decisions in support of our conclusion. See, e.g., Scanwell Laboratories, Inc. v. Shaffer, 424 F.2d 859, 865, 137 U.S. App. D.C. 371 (D.C. Cir. 1970) (explaining in case addressing [140] public bidding statute, "[t]he law of standing was greatly modified by the passage of the Administrative Procedure Act"); id., 872 ("the Administrative Procedure Act applies to all situations in which a party who is in fact aggrieved seeks review, regardless of a lack of legal right or specific statutory language"). This court has long recognized, however, that "[t]he Connecticut counterpart to [the relevant provision of the Administrative Procedure Act] . . . is much more limited in scope." Ardmare Construction Co. v. Freedman, supra, 191 Conn. 503. The narrower language of our own Uniform Administrative Procedure Act; General Statutes § 4-166 et seq.; plainly does not confer on courts the authority to adopt an "injury in fact" standing analysis, and we have not adopted a similarly expansive standard for standing to bring claims under any other statutory scheme.

[10] This court has held that as a matter of formal authority, where "subject matter jurisdiction is created by statute . . . we have no power to enlarge or circumscribe it." Ambroise v. William Raveis Real Estate, Inc., 226 Conn. 757, 763, 628 A.2d 1303 (1993); id. (time window for statutorily created right of appeal not subject to judicial modification).

contract based thereon illegal . . . . [A]n objectionable and invalidating element is introduced when specifications are drawn to the advantage of one manufacturer not for any reason in the public interest but, rather, to insure the award of the contract to that particular manufacturer." (Internal quotation marks omitted.) Id. As this court later underscored in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 188, "[o]ur focus [in Unisys Corp.] was not on the [143] possibility that a particular specification might limit the number of eligible bidders, but on whether the specification necessarily had an adverse impact on the integrity of the bidding process." The [*476] court in Unisys Corp. v. Dept. of Labor, supra, 695-96, drew no ultimate conclusion as to standing, holding only that these allegations raising specific claims of information disparity involving one particular competitor were sufficient to warrant an evidentiary hearing.[11]

As I previously have noted, in Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 169, this court reaffirmed these limits on jurisdiction. The court announced: "In conclusion, we reiterate our adherence to the boundaries of the standing principles established in our existing competitive bidding case law. . . . The determinative factor, we held [in Ardmare Construction Co.], was not whether some bidders had been precluded from the bidding process but whether the requirements in that process had been applied consistently and in good faith. . . . That, essentially, is what has occurred in the present case as well." (Citations omitted.) Id., 188-89.

I find troubling the majority's abandonment of these "boundaries of the standing principles established in our existing competitive bidding case law"; id., 188; that plainly underlie the reasoning of Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors and its predecessors. ECI complains not about procedural [145] corruption but, rather, about discriminatory effect. As we explicitly held in [*477] Unisys Corp., however, even the most extreme form of discriminatory effect—a purchase order designed to be fulfilled only by a single possible bidder—does not alone create a basis for standing. ECI has failed to allege anything more than an unequal effect of an evenhanded process, and to permit [236] standing on that basis would be an exercise of power we do not properly possess. I am mindful that cost control undoubtedly is an important goal of the competitive bidding statutes. But it is for the legislature to determine which costs are subject to challenge under the statutes and by whom.

II

ECI's claim to standing under Connecticut's antitrust statutes does not suffer from the significant statutory and jurisprudential barriers discussed in part I of this concurring and dissenting opinion. In sharp distinction to the plain absence of a private cause of action under the competitive bidding statutes, "the legislature expressly has conferred standing on a broad range of individuals under the [Connecticut Antitrust Act (act)], including unsuccessful bidders in a municipal bidding process."[12] Cheryl Terry Enterprises, Ltd. v. Hartford, 270 Conn. 619, 632, 854 A.2d 1066 (2004). [146] Moreover, General Statutes § 35-28 explicitly forbids every "contract, combination, or conspiracy . . . [that] are for the purpose, or have the effect, of" violating the act. (Emphasis added.) The act thus clearly confers standing on disappointed bidders to pursue a theory of liability based on harmful effects.

Nonetheless, I would conclude that ECI's claim is inadequately briefed and that we should withhold judgment on this complex issue until it is properly presented [*478] to us. The act implicates both state and federal legislative schemes; see Vacco v. Microsoft Corp., 260 Conn. 59, 72-73, 793 A.2d 1048 (2002) ("[t]he legislature amended the [act] in 1992 to make explicit its intent that the judiciary shall interpret the [act] in accordance with the federal courts'

[11] The majority, in footnote 17 of its opinion, notes that evidentiary hearings are atypical in motions to dismiss and expresses some doubt regarding whether a hearing was appropriate here. While I agree with the majority's general statement of law, this court has stated with respect to competitive bidding statutes: "Although the plaintiffs were not required to prove the merits of their claim, they did have the lesser burden of establishing a colorable claim. . . . Under the test for standing set forth in Unisys Corp., Ardmare Construction Co. and Spiniello Construction Co., the trial court was required to conduct an evidentiary hearing to decide whether the plaintiffs had established a colorable claim that the project [144] labor agreement requirement had undermined the integrity or objectives of the competitive bidding process." (Citation omitted; emphasis added.) Connecticut Associated Builders & Contractors v. Hartford, supra, 251 Conn. 182.

[12] General Statutes § 35-35, for example, provides in relevant part that "any person . . . injured in its business or property by any violation of the provisions of this chapter shall recover treble damages . . . ." (Emphasis added.)

interpretation of federal antitrust law"); and it contains important exceptions pertaining to, among other things, organized labor. See General Statutes § 35-31. The trial court's memorandum of decision [147] did not articulate that court's reasons for denying standing on this claim, and ECI's appellate brief does little more than identify the relevant statutes and point to three unilateral acts by the defendant city of Hartford: imposing the project labor agreement on all bidders for the project, imposing the project labor agreement on nonunion workers and refusing to award the contract to ECI. ECI also identifies this court's holding in Cheryl Terry Enterprises, Ltd. v. Hartford, supra, 270 Conn. 623, in which we accorded standing to a disappointed low bidder who claimed that "it was not awarded the contract due to a conspiratorial agreement between a [labor] union and the defendant [city], with the purpose of obtaining a union contract." ECI, however, does not point to any such conspiratorial agreement either in its complaint at the trial court or in its brief on this issue.[13] "It is well-settled that an individual or corporation cannot alone contract, combine, or conspire [237] to violate the antitrust laws. Thus, 'a violation of [§] 35-28 . . . requires a plurality of actors.' *Shea v. First Federal Savings & Loan Association of [479] New Haven, 184 Conn. 285, 306, [439 A.2d 997] (1981) . . . ." [148] (Citations omitted.) McKeown Distributors, Inc. v. Gyp-Crete Corp., 618 F. Sup. 632, 645 (D. Conn. 1985). Although a number of contracts and agreements are likely relevant to this litigation, it is unclear which, if any, we should consider as the basis for ECI's claim.

While I would leave open the question of whether a colorable claim of an antitrust violation could be made out from the allegations in ECI's complaint, nonetheless it is improvident to reach any such conclusion on the basis of the underdeveloped record and the lack of adequate attention to this issue [149] by the parties.

Accordingly, I respectfully dissent from these holdings.

[13] In its complaint, ECI does allege that "[u]nlike its union contractor competitors, ECI never participated in the collective bargaining agreements and negotiations that resulted in . . . the [project labor agreement] . . . ." It is unclear, however, what significance this allegation has for purposes of the antitrust claim. As the majority notes, ECI "[does] not challenge the legality of the [project labor agreement] or the process by which it was negotiated, but, rather, the fact that it was included in the mandatory bid specifications with which all prospective bidders, union and nonunion alike, were required to comply."

[*1064] ORDER ON DEFENDANTS' F.R.Civ.P. 12 MOTIONS

(Docs. 10, 11, 12.)

INTRODUCTION

Defendants PNC Bank, N.A. ("PNC"), and Rushmore Loan Management Services ("Rushmore") seek to dismiss as legally barred plaintiff Ernie Altmann ("Mr. Altmann") and Creative Builders, Inc.'s ("CBI's") common law, statutory, punitive damages and attorney fees claims arising out of Mr. Altmann's loan for and foreclosure activity on his Stanislaus County residence ("property"). Mr. Altman and CBI (collectively "plaintiffs") fail to oppose dismissal of their claims. This Court considered PNC and Rushmore's (collectively "defendants'") F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss and F.R.Civ.P. 12(f) motion to strike on the record and VACATES the February 1, 2012 hearing, pursuant to Local Rule 230(c), (g). [2] For the reasons discussed below, this Court DISMISSES this action against defendants.

Summary

According to the complaint, plaintiffs pursue claims to address "Defendant's negligent, fraudulent and unlawful conduct concerning residential mortgage loan transaction with the Plaintiff." CBI "is on title" as the property owner "in exchange for loans and expenses paid by CBI on behalf of Altmann." PNC is named as a defendant as a successor in interest to defendant National City Mortgage Company ("National City"), the "original lender" of Mr. Altmann's "mortgage loan." Rushmore services Mr. Altmann's loan and "has demanded payments." The complaint alleges [*1065] 15 claims arising under common law and federal and California statutes as well as seeking punitive damages and attorney fees. Defendants challenge the complaint's claims as insufficiently pled and barred by limitations periods and other applicable law.

Loan Origination And Funding

In early 2007, National City "solicited" Mr. Altmann to finance the property with a construction loan so Mr. Altmann "could [3] build his residential home" on the property. National City stated that the construction loan "was to later convert to a 30-year term with a fixed interest rate known as a 'take out loan.'" Mr. Altmann "was not given a copy of any of the loan documents prior to closing as required."

National City never funded the entire construction loan and never converted the loan to a "take out loan." National City fell short by $40,000 to fund the construction loan and funded construction loan draws late and "less than the amount it was supposed to fund" to require Mr. Altmann to complete construction with funds borrowed from CBI.

National City failed to carry construction insurance on the loan. A $50,000 claim arose during construction, and National City stated it would cover the loss and reimburse Mr. Altmann but failed to do so to require Mr. Altmann to again borrow from CBI.

National City offered Mr. Altmann a short-term loan to cover his expenses while National City prepared to convert the loan. Mr. Altmann made timely payments on the short-term loan, but National City returned payments to Mr. Altmann without explanation and caused a default on the loan.

Short Sale Of Property

National City offered [4] Mr. Altmann a $595,000 short sale of the property and to waive its second loan on the property. A third-party buyer offered $595,000 for the property, and Mr. Altmann accepted. National City processed the short sale extremely slowly, and the buyer informed Mr. Altmann that he might cancel the sale due to delays.

When the short sale was set to close in September 2010, National City employee Lynn Rowland ("Mr. Rowland") requested a new property appraisal. The new property appraisal was $635,000, lower than the original $700,000 property appraisal. Mr. Rowland agreed to allow the buyer to reduce the sales price to $510,000 "because PNC accepted up to 85% of the appraised price."

[1] The factual recitation is derived generally from plaintiffs' Complaint for Damages ("complaint"), the target of defendants' challenges.

At the end of September 2010, Mr. Rowland was unavailable to prevent timely closing of the short sale. On September 27, 2010, the short sale transaction was stayed due to a bankruptcy on an adjacent property and a bankruptcy debtor's easement which affected Mr. Altmann's property.

On October 1, 2010, Rushmore purchased Mr. Altmann's loan from PNC, despite the bankruptcy stay and such loan purchase "violated the bankruptcy stay and is therefore void."

In October 2010, Mr. Rowland assured Mr. Altmann that Mr. Rowland [5] would handle the short sale for Rushmore, which would accept the $510,000 sale price. Mr. Rowland stated that if Rushmore did not approve the sale price, PNC would repurchase the loan to allow short sale completion.

Two weeks later, Mr. Rowland informed Mr. Altmann that PNC had "changed its mind" and would not repurchase the loan from Rushmore. In November 2010, Rushmore employee Steve Sanchez took over the short sale from Mr. Rowland and ordered a third property appraisal, which came back at $590,000. Rushmore refused [*1066] to honor the pre-existing short sale approval and demanded an increased price of $590,000 from $510,000 to cause the buyer to cancel the short sale.

Mr. Altmann submitted a loan modification application to Rushmore, which intends to sell the property at a foreclosure trustee sale despite the absence of notice to CBI of the trustee sale to violate due process rights.

Plaintiffs' Claims

Plaintiffs filed their complaint on October 27, 2011 to allege 15 claims which will be addressed below and seeks to recover general, special and punitive damages and attorney fees.

DISCUSSION

F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) Motion To Dismiss Standards

Defendants seek to dismiss the complaint's common law [6] and statutory claims as legally barred and insufficiently pled. Defendants further seek to strike the complaint's punitive damages prayer and references to subject defendants to punitive damages as well as attorney fees claims. [2]

"When a federal court reviews the sufficiency of a complaint, before the reception of any evidence either by affidavit or admissions, its task is necessarily a limited one. The issue is not whether a plaintiff will ultimately prevail but whether the claimant is entitled to offer evidence to support the claims." Scheuer v. Rhodes, 416 U.S. 232, 236, 94 S. Ct. 1683, 40 L. Ed. 2d 90 (1974); Gilligan v. Jamco Development Corp., 108 F.3d 246, 249 (9th Cir. 1997). [7] A F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) dismissal is proper where there is either a "lack of a cognizable legal theory" or "the absence of sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory." Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't, 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1990); Graehling v. Village of Lombard, Ill., 58 F.3d 295, 297 (7th Cir. 1995). A F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion "tests the legal sufficiency of a claim." Navarro v. Block, 250 F.3d 729, 732 (9th Cir. 2001).

In addressing dismissal, a court must: (1) construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff; (2) accept all well-pleaded factual allegations as true; and (3) determine whether plaintiff can prove any set of facts to support a claim that would merit relief. Cahill v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 80 F.3d 336, 337-338 (9th Cir. 1996).

[2] Defendants seek F.R.Civ.P. 12(f) relief as to the complaint's punitive damages and attorney fees claims. However, defendants' motion in entirety will be analyzed under F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) standards given Whittlestone, Inc. v. Handi-Craft Co., 618 F.3d 970, 971 (9th Cir. 2010) ("We therefore hold that Rule 12(f) does not authorize district courts to strike claims for damages on the ground that such claims are precluded as a matter of law.") As such, this Court will address defendants' challenges and plaintiffs' claims under F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) standards.

Nonetheless, a court is not required "to accept as true allegations that are merely conclusory, unwarranted deductions of fact, or unreasonable inferences." In re Gilead Sciences Securities Litig., 536 F.3d 1049, 1055 (9th Cir. 2008) (citation omitted). A court "need not assume the truth of legal conclusions cast in the form of factual allegations," U.S. ex rel. Chunie v. Ringrose, 788 F.2d 638, 643, n. 2 (9th Cir.1986), [8] and must not "assume that the [plaintiff] can prove facts that it has not alleged or that the defendants have violated . . . laws in ways that have not been alleged." Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. California State Council of Carpenters, 459 U.S. 519, 526, 103 S.Ct. 897, 74 L. Ed. 2d 723 (1983). A court need not permit an attempt to amend if "it is clear that the complaint could not be saved by an amendment." Livid Holdings Ltd. v. Salomon [*1067] Smith Barney, Inc., 416 F.3d 940, 946 (9th Cir. 2005).

A "plaintiff's obligation to provide the 'grounds' of his 'entitlement to relief' requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544,127 S. Ct. 1955, 1964-65, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007) (internal citations omitted). Moreover, a court "will dismiss any claim that, even when construed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, fails to plead sufficiently all required elements of a cause of action." Student Loan Marketing Ass'n v. Hanes, 181 F.R.D. 629, 634 (S.D. Cal. 1998). In practice, a complaint "must contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain [9] recovery under some viable legal theory." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 562, 127 S.Ct. at 1969 (quoting Car Carriers, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 745 F.2d 1101, 1106 (7th Cir. 1984)).

> . . . a complaint must contain sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." . . . A claim has facial plausibility when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged. . . . The plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully. (Citations omitted.)

After discussing Iqbal, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals summarized: "In sum, for a complaint to survive [dismissal], the non-conclusory 'factual content,' and reasonable inferences from that content, must be plausibly suggestive of a claim entitling the plaintiff to relief." Moss v. U.S. Secret Service, 572 F.3d 962, 969 (9th Cir. 2009) (quoting Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. at 1949).

The U.S. Supreme Court applies a "two-prong [10] approach" to address dismissal:

> First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. . . . Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. . . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will . . . be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . . But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged — but it has not "show[n]"-"that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2).
> In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a [11] court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.

A plaintiff suing multiple defendants "must allege the basis of his claim against each defendant to satisfy Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2), which requires a short and plain statement of the claim to put defendants on sufficient notice of the [*1068] allegations against them." Gauvin v. Trombatore, 682 F.Supp. 1067, 1071 (N.D. Cal. 1988). "Specific identification of the parties to the activities alleged by the plaintiffs is required in this action to enable the defendant to plead intelligently." Van Dyke Ford, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 399 F.Supp. 277, 284 (D. Wis. 1975).

Moreover, "a complaint may be dismissed under Rule 12(b)(6) when its own allegations indicate the existence of an affirmative defense." Quiller v. Barclays American/Credit, Inc., 727 F.2d 1067, 1069 (11th Cir. 1984). For instance, a limitations defense may be raised by a F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Jablon v. Dean Witter & Co., 614 F.2d 677, 682 (9th Cir. 1980); see Avco Corp. v. Precision Air Parts, Inc., 676 F.2d 494, 495 (11th Cir. 1982), cert. denied, [12] 459 U.S. 1037, 103 S. Ct. 450, 74 L. Ed. 2d 604 (1982). A F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss may raise the limitations defense when the statute's running is apparent on the complaint's face. Jablon, 614 F.2d at 682. If the limitations defense does not appear on the complaint's face and the trial court accepts matters outside the pleadings' scope, the defense may be raised by a motion to dismiss accompanied by affidavits. Jablon, 614 F.2d at 682; Rauch v. Day and Night Mfg. Corp., 576 F.2d 697 (6th Cir. 1978).

With these standards in mind, this Court turns to defendants' challenges to the complaint's claims.

Fraud

The complaint's (first) fraud and deceit — misrepresentation and promise with no intention to perform claim alleges that "defendants did not accurately maintain records of construction payouts and have charged for monies not received by Plaintiff, and did not fully fund the construction loan or convert it to a take-out loan." The claim further alleges that "Defendants" misrepresented material facts and that National City made a promise with intention to induce Mr. Altmann to execute the promissory note.

The complaint's (tenth) constructive fraud claim alleges that "Defendants" deceived Mr. Altmann [13] into a mortgage transaction, have committed constructive fraud, extended credit to Mr. Altmann without regard to his ability to pay, and failed to maintain records of loan payouts.

The complaint's (fifteen) cause of action alleges that National City "made misrepresentations and false promises . . . to entice Altmann to execute the construction loan documents and become indebted to Defendant."

Limitations Defense

Defendants contend that the complaint's fraud claims as to loan origination are barred by the three-year limitations period of California Code of Civil Procedure section 338(d) for an "action for relief on the ground of fraud." Defendants point to the loan's April 2007 origination to require related fraud claims to be filed no later than April 2010, 18 months prior to the complaint's October 27, 2011 filing. Defendants further point to the absence of facts to support tolling the three-year limitations.

Defendants raise a valid limitations defense. Fraud-based claims arising from loan origination are time-barred.

Fraud Elements

Defendants further attack the fraud claims as lacking sufficient particularity to satisfy F.R.Civ.P. 9(b).

The elements of a California fraud claim are: (1) [14] misrepresentation (false representation, concealment or nondisclosure); (2) knowledge of the falsity (or "scienter"); (3) intent to defraud, i.e., to induce reliance; (4) justifiable reliance; and (5) resulting damage. Lazar v. Superior [*1069] Court, 12 Cal.4th 631, 638, 49 Cal.Rptr.2d 377, 909 P.2d 981 (1996). The same elements comprise a cause of action for negligent misrepresentation, except there is no requirement of intent to induce reliance. Caldo v. Owens-Illinois, Inc., 125 Cal.App.4th 513, 519, 23 Cal.Rtpr.3d 1 (2004).

"[T]o establish a cause of action for fraud a plaintiff must plead and prove in full, factually and specifically, all of the elements of the cause of action." Conrad v. Bank of America, 45 Cal.App.4th 133, 156, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 336 (1996). There must be a showing "that the defendant thereby intended to induce the plaintiff to act to his detriment in reliance upon the false representation" and "that the plaintiff actually and justifiably relied upon the defendant's misrepresentation in acting to his detriment." Conrad, 45 Cal.App.4th at 157, 53 Cal.Rptr.2d 336. "The absence of any one of these required elements will preclude recovery." Wilhelm v. Pray, Price, Williams & Russell, 186 Cal.App.3d 1324, 1332, 231 Cal.Rptr. 355 (1986).

Particularity [15] Pleading Standard

F.R.Civ.P. 9(b) requires a party to "state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud." [3] In the Ninth Circuit, "claims for fraud and negligent misrepresentation must meet Rule 9(b)'s particularity requirements." Neilson v. Union Bank of California, N.A., 290 F.Supp.2d 1101, 1141 (C.D. Cal. 2003). A court may dismiss a claim grounded in fraud when its allegations fail to satisfy F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s heightened pleading requirements. Vess, 317 F.3d at 1107. [4] A motion to dismiss a claim "grounded in fraud" under F.R.Civ.P. 9(b) for failure to plead with particularity is the "functional equivalent" of a F.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim. Vess, 317 F.3d at 1107. As a counter-balance, F.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2) requires from a pleading "a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief."

F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s heightened pleading standard "is not an invitation to disregard Rule 8's requirement of simplicity, directness, and clarity" and "has among its purposes the avoidance of unnecessary discovery." McHenry v. Renne, 84 F.3d 1172, 1178 (9th Cir. 1996). F.R.Civ.P 9(b) requires "specific" allegations of fraud "to give defendants notice of the particular misconduct which is alleged to constitute the fraud charged so that they can defend against the charge and not just deny that they have done anything wrong." Semegen v. Weidner, 780 F.2d 727, 731 (9th Cir. 1985). "A pleading is sufficient under Rule 9(b) if it identifies the circumstances constituting [17] fraud so that the defendant can prepare an adequate answer from the allegations." Neubronner v. Milken, 6 F.3d 666, 671-672 (9th Cir. 1993) (internal quotations omitted; citing Gottreich v. San Francisco Investment Corp., 552 F.2d 866, 866 (9th Cir. 1997)). The Ninth Circuit has explained:

> [*1070] Rule 9(b) requires particularized allegations of the circumstances constituting fraud. The time, place and content of an alleged misrepresentation may identify the statement or the omission complained of, but these circumstances do not "constitute" fraud. The statement in question must be false to be fraudulent. Accordingly, our cases have consistently required that circumstances indicating falseness be set forth. . . . [W]e [have] observed that plaintiff must include statements regarding the time, place, and nature of the alleged fraudulent activities, and that "mere conclusory allegations of fraud are insufficient." . . . The plaintiff must set forth what is false or misleading about a statement, and why it is false. In other words, the plaintiff must set forth an explanation as to why the statement or omission complained of was false or misleading. . . .
> In certain cases, to be sure, the requisite [18] particularity might be supplied with great simplicity.

[3] F.R.Civ.P. 9(b)'s particularity requirement applies to state law causes of action: "[W]hile a federal court will examine state law to determine whether the elements of fraud have been pled sufficiently to state a cause of action, the Rule 9(b) requirement that the circumstances of the fraud must be stated with particularity [16] is a federally imposed rule." Vess v. Ciba-Geigy Corp. USA, 317 F.3d 1097, 1103 (9th Cir. 2003) (quoting Hayduk v. Lanna, 775 F.2d 441, 443 (1st Cir. 1995)(italics in original)).

[4] "In some cases, the plaintiff may allege a unified course of fraudulent conduct and rely entirely on that course of conduct as the basis of a claim. In that event, the claim is said to be 'grounded in fraud' or to 'sound in fraud,' and the pleading of that claim as a whole must satisfy the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b)." Vess, 317 F.3d at 1103-1104.

Pickett, 137 F.3d 616, 627 (9th Cir. 1997)* (fraud allegations must be accompanied by "the who, what, when, where, and how" of the misconduct charged); see Neubronner, 6 F.3d at 672 ("The complaint must specify facts as the times, dates, places, benefits received and other details of the alleged fraudulent activity.")

In a fraud action against a corporation, a plaintiff must "allege the names of the persons who made the allegedly fraudulent representations, their authority to speak, to whom they spoke, what they said or wrote, and when it was said or written." Tarmann v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 2 Cal.App.4th 153, 157, 2 Cal.Rptr.2d 861 (1991).

F.R.Civ.P. 9(b) "does not allow a complaint to merely lump multiple defendants together but 'require[s] plaintiffs to differentiate their allegations when suing more than one defendant . . . and inform each defendant separately [19] of the allegations surrounding his alleged participation in the fraud.'" Swartz v. KPMG LLP, 476 F.3d 756, 764-765 (9th Cir. 2007) (quoting Haskin v. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., 995 F.Supp. 1437, 1439 (M.D. Fla.1998)). Kayport Package Express, Inc., 885 F.2d 531, 541 (9th Cir.1989)*. "To state a claim of fraudulent conduct, which carries substantial reputational costs, plaintiffs must provide each and every defendant with enough information to enable them 'to know what misrepresentations are attributable to them and what fraudulent conduct they are charged with.'" Pegasus Holdings v. Veterinary Centers of America, Inc., 38 F.Supp.2d 1158, 1163 (C.D. Cal. 1998) (quoting In re Worlds of Wonder Sec. Litig., 694 F.Supp. 1427, 1433 (N.D. Cal.1988)).

Defendants point to the complaint's absence of facts of defendants' alleged representations or omissions made to Mr. Altmann. Defendants note the limited allegations of failure to maintain records and to fund fully the loan and unspecified representations during loan [20] origination.

The complaint's conclusory allegations fail to meet Rule 9(b)'s strict standard. The complaint lacks precise allegations as to what defendants, through specifically identified and authorized agents or representatives, allegedly promised or represented. The complaint lacks facts to support fraud elements let [*1071] alone the who, what, when, when and how of alleged misconduct. Defendants correctly challenge the complaint's failure "to satisfy elements, much less the heightened federal pleading standard." The complaint relies on mere notions of misrepresentations and omissions as to Mr. Altmann's loan matters without providing supporting facts or necessary details. Given the multiple defendants and their differing roles, such allegations are insufficient to warrant dismissal of the complaint's claims sounding in fraud.

Moreover, fraud claims addressing alleged failure to fund fully the loan sound in breach of contract rather than fraud. See Mills v. Polar Molecular Corp., 12 F.3d 1170, 1176 (2nd Cir. 1993) (failure to carry out a promise "does not constitute fraud unless, when the promise was made, the defendant secretly intended not to perform or knew that he could not perform"). [21] Purported contract breaches fail to support fraud claims.

Rosenthal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act

The complaint's second claim seeks relief under the Rosenthal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act ("RFDCPA"), Cal. Civ. Code, §§ 1788, et seq. The claim alleges RFDCPA violations in that "Defendants . . . threatened to take actions not permitted by law," including "collection on a debt not owed to Defendants, making false reports to credit reporting agencies, foreclosing upon a void security interest, foreclosing upon a Note of which they were not in procession [sic] nor otherwise entitled to payment, falsely stating the amount of a debt, increasing the amount of a debt by including amounts that are not permitted by law or contract, and using unfair and unconscionable means in an attempt to collect a debt."

The RFDCPA's purpose is "to prohibit debt collectors from engaging in unfair or deceptive practices in the collection of consumer debts and to require debtors to act fairly in entering into and honoring such debts." Cal. Civ. Code, §

1788.1(b). The RFDCPA defines "debt collector" as "any person who, in the ordinary course of business, regularly, on behalf of himself or herself or others, [22] engages in debt collection." Cal. Civ. Code, § 1788.2(c). "[F]oreclosure does not constitute debt collection under the RFDCPA." Izenberg v. ETS Services, LLC, 589 F.Supp.2d 1193, 1199 (C.D. Cal. 2008). The "law is clear that foreclosing on a property pursuant to a deed of trust is not a debt collection within the meaning of the RFDCPA or the FDCA [Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1692, et seq.]." Gamboa v. Trustee Corps, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19613, 2009 WL 656285, * 4 (N.D. Cal. 2009). As this Court has explained previously, "[l]ogic suggests that non-judicial foreclosure is not a debt collector's act under California Civil Code section 1788.2(c)." Swanson v. ECM Mortgage Corp., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 107912, 2009 WL 3627925 (E.D. Cal. 2009).

Defendants fault the complaint's lack of facts to characterize defendants as debtor collectors under the RFDCPA. Defendants note that the complaint exempts them from the RFDCPA in that the complaint identifies defendants as a lender and loan servicer. Defendants further argue that the RFDCPA claim is barred by the one-year limitations period of California Civil Code section 1788.30(f) (civil action must be brought "within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation").

Defendants [23] are correct that the complaint fails to substantiate defendants as debt collectors to subject them to an RFDCPA claim. The complaint references only loan origination, an attempted short sale, and potential non-judicial foreclosure, none of which is debt collector activity under the RFDCPA. Morever, [*1072] purported debt collection occurred more than a year prior to the October 27, 2011 filing of the complaint. The RFDCPA claims fail and are subject to dismissal.

Negligence

The complaint's (third) negligence claim alleges that "Defendants breached their duty of care to Plaintiff when they failed to maintain the original Mortgage Notes[,] failed to properly create original documents, . . . failed to make the required disclosures . . ., took payments to which they were not entitled, charged fees they were not entitled to charge and made otherwise authorized negative reporting to Plaintiff's creditworthiness." The claim further accuses National City of directing Mr. Altmann into loans for which he was not qualified.

Limitations Defense

Defendants argue that claims relating to "purported misconduct during origination of the loan" are barred by the two-year limitations period of [24] California Code of Civil Procedure section 339(1) (two-year limitations period for an action upon an obligation or liability not founded upon an instrument of writing). Defendants contend that negligence allegations sounding in fraud are barred by the three-year limitations period of California Code of Civil Procedure section 338(d). Defendants point to the April 2007 origination of Mr. Altmann's loan to set an April 2010 deadline to pursue negligence/fraud sounding claims to render such claims untimely with the October 27, 2011 complaint filing.

Defendants raise valid points. Negligence claims arising more than two years prior to the complaint's October 27, 2011 filing are barred, especially given the lack of facts to support tolling.

Duty Of Care

Defendants further challenge the absence of their duty of care to support a negligence claim.

"The elements of a cause of action for negligence are (1) a legal duty to use reasonable care, (2) breach of that duty, and (3) proximate [or legal] cause between the breach and (4) the plaintiff's injury." Mendoza v. City of Los Angeles, 66 Cal.App.4th 1333, 1339, 78 Cal.Rptr.2d 525 (1998) (citation omitted). "The existence of a duty of care owed by a defendant to a [25] plaintiff is a prerequisite to establishing a claim for negligence." Nymark v. Heart

Fed. Savings & Loan Assn., 231 Cal.App.3d 1089, 1095, 283 Cal.Rptr. 53 (1991). "[A]bsent a duty, the defendant's care, or lack of care, is irrelevant." Software Design & Application, Ltd. v. Hoefer & Arnett, Inc., 49 Cal.App.4th 472, 481, 56 Cal.Rptr.2d 756 (1996). "The existence of a legal duty to use reasonable care in a particular factual situation is a question of law for the court to decide." Vasquez v. Residential Investments, Inc., 118 Cal.App.4th 269, 278, 12 Cal.Rptr.3d 846 (2004) (citation omitted).

"The 'legal duty' of care may be of two general types: (a) the duty of a person to use ordinary care in activities from which harm might reasonably be anticipated [, or] (b) [a]n affirmative duty where the person occupies a particular relationship to others. . . . In the first situation, he is not liable unless he is actively careless; in the second, he may be liable for failure to act affirmatively to prevent harm." McGettigan v. Bay Area Rapid Transit Dist., 57 Cal.App.4th 1011, 1016-1017, 67 Cal.Rptr.2d 516 (1997).

There is no actionable duty between a lender and borrower in that loan transactions [26] are arms-length. A lender "owes no duty of care to the [borrowers] in approving their loan. Liability to a borrower for negligence arises only when the lender 'actively participates' in the financed enterprise 'beyond the domain of the usual money lender.'" Wagner v. Benson, [*1073] 101 Cal.App.3d 27, 35, 161 Cal.Rptr. 516 (1980) (citing several cases). "[A]s a general rule, a financial institution owes no duty of care to a borrower when the institution's involvement in the loan transaction does not exceed the scope of its conventional role as a mere lender of money." Nymark, 231 Cal.App.3d at 1096, 283 Cal.Rptr. 53; see Myers v. Guarantee Sav. & Loan Assn., 79 Cal. App. 3d 307, 312, 144 Cal. Rptr. 616 (1978) (no lender liability when lender did not engage "in any activity outside the scope of the normal activities of a lender of construction monies").

"Public policy does not impose upon the Bank absolute liability for the hardships which may befall the [borrower] it finances." Wagner, 101 Cal.App.3d at 34, 161 Cal.Rptr. 516. The success of a borrower's investment "is not a benefit of the loan agreement which the Bank is under a duty to protect." Wagner, 101 Cal.App.3d at 34, 161 Cal.Rptr. 516 [27] (lender lacked duty to disclose "any information it may have had"). "It is simply not tortious for a commercial lender to lend money, take collateral, or to foreclose on collateral when a debt is not paid." Sierra-Bay Fed. Land Bank Assn. v. Superior Court, 227 Cal.App.3d 318, 334, 277 Cal.Rptr. 753 (1991).

The complaint insufficiently attempts to allege defendants' cognizable a duty of care let alone its breach. Plaintiffs lack a negligence claim based on a lender/borrower relationship, particularly in the absence of a duty to forego foreclosure or to provide loan modification, refinancing or similar relief. "No such duty exists" for a lender "to determine the borrower's ability to repay the loan. . . . The lender's efforts to determine the creditworthiness and ability to repay by a borrower are for the lender's protection, not the borrower's." Renteria v. United States, 452 F. Supp. 2d 910, 922-923 (D. Ariz. 2006) (borrowers "had to rely on their own judgment and risk assessment to determine whether or not to accept the loan"). "A commercial lender is not to be regarded as the guarantor of a borrower's success and is not liable for the hardships which may befall a borrower." Sierra-Bay Fed. Land Bank Assn. v. Superior Court, 227 Cal.App.3d 318, 334, 277 Cal.Rptr. 753 (1991). [28] Moreover, defendants had "no interest in the loan" in their role as loan servicers. See Cleveland v. Deutsche Bank Nat. Trust Co., 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7165, 2009 WL 250017, at *3 (S.D. Cal. 2009).

Defendants owed no duty of care to plaintiffs arising from Mr. Altmann's default, property foreclosure, and attempts to avoid foreclosure. The complaint lacks facts of special circumstances to impose duties on defendants in that the complaint depicts an arms-length transaction, nothing more. The complaint fails to substantiate a special lending relationship or an actionable breach of duty to substantiate a negligence claim. The negligence claim fails.

Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act

The complaint's fourth claim alleges that "Defendants" violated the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act ("RESPA"), 12 U.S.C. §§ 2601, et seq., "at the time of closing on the sale of the Property by failing to correctly and accurately comply with the disclosure requirements therein and respond timely to Plaintiff's Qualified Written Request."

Defendants fault the complaint's failure to allege a particular RESPA statute which was violated and facts to demonstrate RESPA applicability.

Under RESPA, a QWR is a "written request from the borrower [29] (or an agent of the borrower) for information relating to the servicing of such loan." 12 U.S.C. § 2605(e)(1)(A). Among other things, a QWR must include a "statement of the reasons for the belief of the borrower, to the extent applicable, that the account is in [*1074] error or provides sufficient detail to the servicer regarding other information sought by the borrower." 12 U.S.C. § 2605(e)(1)(B)(ii).

Defendants point to the absence of allegations to support that plaintiffs sent a legitimate QWR and to identify grounds that Mr. Altmann's loan or account was defective or in error. Defendants are correct. The complaint merely alleges that a QWR was mailed at various times and that "Defendants have yet to properly respond." The complaint fails to plead or identify a viable or legitimate QWR.

Defendants further point to 12 U.S.C. § 2614's one-year limitations for violations of 12 U.S.C. § 2607. [5] "The statute of limitations for private plaintiffs suing under RESPA is one year from the 'date of the occurrence of the violation.'" Edwards v. First American Corp., 517 F.Supp.2d 1199, 1204 (C.D. Cal. 2007) (quoting 12 U.S.C. § 2614). The "primary ill" which RESPA seeks to remedy is "the potential for [30] 'unnecessarily high settlement charges' caused by kickbacks, fee-splitting, and other practices that suppress price competition for settlement services. This ill occurs, if at all, when the plaintiff pays for the service, typically at the closing." Snow v. First American Title Ins. Co., 332 F.3d 356, 359-360 (5th Cir. 2003) (quoting 12 U.S.C. §2601(a)). Mr. Altmann closed his loan in April 2007, well more than a year prior to the complaint's October 27, 2011 filing to bar RESPA claims in connection with loan origination.

Defendants further note the absence of a private right of action under RESPA for disclosure violations.

RESPA's purpose is to "curb abusive settlement practices in the real estate industry. Such amorphous goals, however, do not translate into a legislative intent to create a private right of action." Bloom v. Martin, 865 F.Supp. 1377, 1385 (N.D. Cal. 1994), aff'd, 77 F.3d 318 (1996). "The structure of RESPA's various statutory provisions indicates [31] that Congress did not intend to create a private right of action for disclosure violations under 12 U.S.C. § 2603 . . . Congress did not intend to provide a private remedy . . ." Bloom, 865 F.Supp. at 1384.

The absence of a private right of action dooms a purported RESPA claim based on disclosure violations.

The RESPA claim fails as a matter of law.

Breach Of Fiduciary Duty

The complaint's (fifth) breach of fiduciary duty claim alleges: "Defendants did not accurately maintain records of constructions payouts and have charged for monies not received by Plaintiff, and did not fully fund the construction loan or convert it to a take-out loan." The claim further alleges that "Defendants . . . have made several representations to Plaintiff with regard to material acts" and which were false.

"[T]o plead a cause of action for breach of fiduciary duty, there must be shown the existence of a fiduciary relationship, its breach, and damage proximately caused by that breach. The absence of any one of these elements is fatal to the cause of action." Pierce v. Lyman, 1 Cal.App.4th 1093, 1101, 3 Cal.Rptr.2d 236 (1991).

A fiduciary relationship arises "between parties to a transaction wherein one of the [32] parties is . . . duty bound to act with the utmost good faith for the benefit of the other party." Herbert v. Lankershim, [*1075] 9 Cal.2d 409,

[5] 12 U.S.C. § 2607(a) prohibits referral payments for real estate settlement services, and 12 U.S.C. § 2607(b) prohibits receipt of "any portion, split or percentage" of a settlement service fee, except for performed services.

483, 71 P.2d 220 (1937). A fiduciary relationship "ordinarily arises where a confidence is reposed by one person in the integrity of another, and in such a relation the party in whom the confidence is reposed, if he voluntarily accepts or assumes to accept the confidence, can take no advantage from his acts relating to the interest of the other party without the latter's knowledge or consent." Herbert, 9 Cal.2d at 483, 71 P.2d 220.

Nonetheless "no fiduciary relationship is established merely because 'the parties reposed trust and confidence in each other.'" Girard v. Delta Towers Joint Venture, 20 Cal.App.4th 1741, 1749, 26 Cal.Rptr.2d 102 (1993) (quoting Worldvision Enterprises, Inc. v. American Broadcasting Companies, Inc., 142 Cal.App.3d 589, 595, 191 Cal.Rptr. 148 (1983)). To be charged with a fiduciary obligation, a person must knowingly undertake to act on behalf and for the benefit of another, or must enter into a relationship which imposes that undertaking as a matter of law. City of Hope Nat. Medical Center v. Genentech, Inc., 43 Cal.4th 375, 385, 75 Cal. Rptr. 3d 333, 181 P.3d 142 (2008).

"California [33] courts have not extended the 'special relationship' doctrine to include ordinary commercial contractual relationships" Martin v. U-Haul Co. Of Fresno, 204 Cal.App.3d 396, 412, 251 Cal.Rptr. 17 (1988) (citations omitted). "The relationship between a lending institution and its borrower-client is not fiduciary in nature." Nymark, 231 Cal.App.3d at 1093, n. 1, 283 Cal.Rptr. 53 (citing Price v. Wells Fargo Bank, 213 Cal.App.3d 465, 476-478, 261 Cal.Rptr. 735 (1989)). A commercial lender is entitled to pursue its own economic interests in a loan transaction. Nymark, 231 Cal.App.3d at 1093, n. 1, 283 Cal.Rptr. 53(citing Kruse v. Bank of America, 202 Cal.App.3d 38, 67, 248 Cal.Rptr. 217 (1988)).

Absent "special circumstances" a loan transaction is "at arms-length and there is no fiduciary relationship between the borrower and lender." Oaks Management Corp. v. Superior Court, 145 Cal.App.4th 453, 466, 51 Cal.Rptr.3d 561 (2006) ("the bank is in no sense a true fiduciary"); see Downey v. Humphreys, 102 Cal. App. 2d 323, 332, 227 P.2d 484 (1951) ("A debt is not a trust and there is not a fiduciary relation between debtor and creditor as such."). "[A]s a general rule, a financial institution [34] owes no duty of care to a borrower when the institution's involvement in the loan transaction does not exceed the scope of its conventional role as a mere lender of money." Nymark, 231 Cal.App.3d at 1096, 283 Cal.Rptr. 53.

The complaint alleges no facts to support a fiduciary relationship. The complaint offers the conclusory allegation that "Defendants . . . owed a fiduciary duty to the Plaintiff to act primarily for his benefit, to act with proper skill and diligence and not to make a personal profit from the agency at the expense of the principal, the Plaintiff." The complaint's mere reference to "fiduciary duties" is insufficient to impose a fiduciary relationship on defendants. The breach of fiduciary duty claim fails in the absence of supporting facts.

Unfair Competition Law

The complaint's (sixth) claim purports to allege violations of California's Unfair Competition Law ("UCL"), Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, §§ 17200, et seq. The claim alleges that "Defendants'" acts "constitute unlawful, unfair, and/or fraudulent business practices" as defined by the UCL.

Defendants challenge the complaint's failure to allege that plaintiffs suffered an injury cognizable under the UCL.

California Business and Professions Code section 17204 [35] limits standing to bring a UCL claim to specified public officials [*1076] and a private person "who has suffered injury in fact and has lost money or property as a result of the unfair competition." "This provision requires [plaintiff] to show that she has lost 'money or property' sufficient to constitute an 'injury in fact' under Article III of the Constitution, see Birdsong v. Apple, Inc., 590 F.3d 955, 959-60 (9th Cir.2009), and also requires a 'causal connection' between [defendant's] alleged UCL violation and her injury in fact, Hall v. Time Inc., 158 Cal.App.4th 847, 70 Cal.Rptr.3d 466, 471-72 (2008)." Rubio v. Capital One Bank, 613 F.3d 1195, 1204-1205 (9th Cir. 2010).

Business and Professions Code section 17203 addresses UCL relief and provides in pertinent part:

> Any person who engages, has engaged, or proposes to engage in unfair competition may be enjoined in any court of competent jurisdiction. The court may make such orders or judgments . . . as may be necessary to restore to any person in interest any money or property, real or personal, which may have been acquired by means of such unfair competition. (Bold added.)

"In a suit under the UCL, a public prosecutor may collect civil [36] penalties, but a private plaintiff's remedies are 'generally limited to injunctive relief and restitution.'" Kasky v. Nike, Inc., 27 Cal.4th 939, 950, 119 Cal.Rptr.2d 296, 45 P.3d 243 (2002) (quoting Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999)).

Defendants correctly note the complaint's absence of facts of plaintiffs' money or property allegedly lost due to a UCL violation or "as a result of unfair competition." The complaint lacks facts to support plaintiffs' standing to seek UCL relief to warrant dismissal of the UCL claim.

Defendants further fault the complaint's lack of facts to substantiate that defendants committed a UCL violation.

"Unfair competition is defined to include 'unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising.'" Blank v. Kirwan, 39 Cal.3d 311, 329, 216 Cal.Rptr. 718, 703 P.2d 58 (1985) (quoting Cal. Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200). The UCL establishes three varieties of unfair competition - "acts or practices which are unlawful, or unfair, or fraudulent." Shvarts v. Budget Group, Inc., 81 Cal.App.4th 1153, 1157, 97 Cal.Rptr.2d 722 (2000). An "unlawful business activity" includes [37] anything that can properly be called a business practice and that at the same time is forbidden by law. Blank, 39 Cal.3d at 329, 216 Cal.Rptr. 718 (citing People v. McKale, 25 Cal.3d 626, 631-632, 159 Cal.Rptr. 811, 602 P.2d 731 (1979)). "A business practice is 'unlawful' if it is 'forbidden by law.'" Walker v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 98 Cal.App.4th 1158, 1169, 121 Cal.Rptr.2d 79 (2002) (quoting Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.4th 377, 383, 6 Cal.Rptr.2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992)).

The UCL prohibits "unlawful" practices "forbidden by law, be it civil or criminal, federal, state, or municipal, statutory, regulatory, or court-made." Saunders v. Superior Court, 27 Cal. App. 4th 832, 838, 33 Cal. Rptr. 2d 438 (1999). The UCL "thus creates an independent action when a business practice violates some other law." Walker, 98 Cal.App.4th at 1169, 121 Cal.Rptr.2d 79. According to the California Supreme Court, the UCL "borrows" violations of other laws and treats them as unlawful practices independently actionable under the UCL. Farmers Ins. Exchange v. Superior Court, 2 Cal.4th 377, 383, 6 Cal.Rptr.2d 487, 826 P.2d 730 (1992).

[*1077] A fellow district court has explained the borrowing of a violation of law other [38] than the UCL:

> To state a claim for an "unlawful" business practice under the UCL, a plaintiff must assert the violation of any other law. Cel-Tech Commc'ns, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal.4th 163, 180, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (1999) (stating, "By proscribing 'any unlawful' business practice, section 17200 'borrows' violations of other law and treats them as unlawful practices that the unfair competition law makes independently actionable.") (citation omitted). Where a plaintiff cannot state a claim under the "borrowed" law, she cannot state a UCL claim either. See, e.g., Smith v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co., 93 Cal.App.4th 700, 718, 113 Cal.Rptr.2d 399 (2001). Here, Plaintiff has predicated her "unlawful" business practices claim on her TILA claim. However, as discussed above, Plaintiff's attempt to state a claim under TILA has failed. Accordingly, Plaintiff has stated no "unlawful" UCL claim.

Rubio v. Capital One Bank, 572 F.Supp.2d 1157, 1168 (C.D. Cal. 2008).

"Unfair" under the UCL "means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to [39] or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." Cel-Tech Communications, 20 Cal.4th 163 at187, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 548, 973 P.2d 527. The "unfairness" prong of the UCL "does not give the courts a general license to review the fairness of contracts." Samura v. Kaiser Found. Health Plan, 17 Cal.App.4th 1284, 1299, 22 Cal. Rptr. 2d 20 & n. 6 (1993).

The "fraudulent" prong under the UCL requires a plaintiff to "show deception to some members of the public, or harm to the public interest," Watson Laboratories, Inc. v. Rhone-Poulenc Rorer, Inc., 178 F.Supp.2d 1099, 1121 (C.D. Ca. 2001), or to allege that "members of the public are likely to be deceived," *Medical Instrument Development Laboratories v. Alcon Laboratories, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 41411, 2005 WL 1926673, at 5 (N.D. Cal. 2005).

"A plaintiff alleging unfair business practices under these statutes [UCL] must state with reasonable particularity the facts supporting the statutory elements of the violation." Khoury v. Maly's of California, Inc., 14 Cal.App.4th 612, 619, 17 Cal.Rptr.2d 708 (1993).

The complaint fails to establish that defendants engaged in unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business practices under the UCL. In the absence [40] of violation of a borrowed law, a UCL claim fails in that it cannot rest on purported deficiencies in the loan transaction, foreclosure proceedings or related matters. The complaint lacks viable statutory or common law claims and lacks reasonable particularity of facts to support a UCL claim. Reliance on other invalid claims alleged in the complaint fails to support a viable UCL claim. Furthermore, the complaint lacks particularity of fraudulent circumstances, such as a misrepresentation, for a UCL claim, especially given failure of fraud-sounding claims, as discussed above. The complaint lacks facts to describe how consumers were deceived and to hint at a wrong subject to the UCL to warrant the UCL claim's dismissal.

Breach Of Contract

The complaint's (seventh) breach of contract claim alleges that "Defendants breached their agreement with Plaintiff":

1. "[T]o exercise reasonable efforts and due diligence as promised thus failing to provide Plaintiff with an [*1078] affordable loan and withholding construction draws and not fully funding the construction loan or paying draws timely"; and

2. "[B]y committing wrongful acts including . . . failing to convert the loan and obtain payment and interest [41] rates as promised in the 'take out loan", failing to provide loan documents."

The claim alleges that "Defendants" breached their duties by failing "to short sale the property at the price of $510,000, and later failed to repurchase the loan from Rushmore in order to complete the short sale transaction." The claim further alleges that Rushmore, a loan successor, is bound by PNC's agreement to approve the $510,000 short sale.

"The standard elements of a claim for breach of contract are: '(1) the contract, (2) plaintiff's performance or excuse for nonperformance, (3) defendant's breach, and (4) damage to plaintiff therefrom.'" Wall Street Network, Ltd. v. New York Times Co., 164 Cal.App.4th 1171, 1178, 80 Cal.Rptr.3d 6 (2008). "To form a contract, an 'offer must be sufficiently definite . . . that the performance promised is reasonably certain.'" Alexander v. Codemasters Group Limited, 104 Cal.App.4th 129, 141, 127 Cal. Rptr. 2d 145. 104 Cal. App. 4th 129, 127 Cal.Rptr.2d 145 (2002).

"As to the contract, where a written instrument is the foundation of a cause of action, it may be pleaded in haec verba by attaching a copy as an exhibit and incorporating it by proper reference." Byrne v. Harvey, 211 Cal.App.2d 92, 103, 27 Cal.Rptr. 110 (1962); [42] Holly Sugar Corp. v. Johnson, 18 Cal.2d 218, 225, 115 P.2d 8 (1941). "Where a party relies in his complaint upon a contract in writing, and it affirmatively appears that all the terms of the contract are not set forth in hæc verba, nor stated in their legal effect, but that a portion which may be material has been omitted, the complaint is insufficient." Gilmore v. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co., 55 Cal. 123, 124 (1880).

Defendants fault the complaint's failure to allege a contract among the parties. Defendants point to the absence of CBI's agreement with either defendant or an agreement between Mr. Altmann and Rushmore. Defendants further fault the absence of alleged "specific terms of the purported contracts, or otherwise attach the contracts to the Complaint." As to the short sale, defendant note the complaint's failure to identify plaintiffs' consideration and terms breached by defendants. Defendants explain that an agreement to short sale required a writing to comply with the statute of frauds.

"In the absence of consideration, a gratuitous oral promise to postpone a sale of property pursuant to the terms of a trust deed ordinarily would be unenforceable under section 1698 [the statute [43] of frauds]." Raedeke v. Gibraltar Sav. & Loan Assn., 10 Cal. 3d 665, 673, 111 Cal. Rptr. 693, 517 P.2d 1157 (1974) (citing Karlsen v. American Sav. & Loan Assn., 15 Cal.App.3d 112, 121, 92 Cal.Rptr. 851 (1971)); see Nguyen v. Calhoun, 105 Cal.App.4th 428, 445, 129 Cal.Rptr.2d 436 (2003) ("In this case, then, we conclude that the foreclosure sale may not be set aside based on the lender's alleged breach of an oral agreement to postpone the trustee's sale.")

"A contract in writing may not be altered by an executory oral agreement. (Civil Code, section 1698.) An agreement to postpone a valid sale of property beyond the date when said property may be sold under and according to the terms of the trust deed obviously is an agreement to alter the terms of the instrument . . . To hold otherwise would reduce a trust deed in any case to an unsubstantial if not worthless security." Karlsen, 15 Cal.App.3d 112, 121, 92 Cal.Rptr. 851 (1971) [*1079] (citation omitted.) "An agreement by which a lender agreed to forbear from exercising the right of foreclosure under a deed of trust securing an interest in real property comes within the statute of frauds." Secrest v. Security Nat. Mortg. Loan Trust 2002-2, 167 Cal. App. 4th 544, 547, 84 Cal. Rptr. 3d 275 (2008).

Defendants [44] are correct that terms of purported breached agreements are not sufficiently pled. To the extent plaintiffs rely on a written contract, plaintiffs must attach the written contract or plead its terms verbatim. They have failed to do so. Moreover, a purported short sale agreement requires a writing to satisfy the statute of frauds. Again, the complaint fails to pled the terms of such agreement. Such deficiencies warrant dismissal of the breach of contract claim.

Fraudulent Property Transfer

The complaint's (eighth) fraudulent property transfer claim alleges that "PNC sold or otherwise transferred the Property to Rushmore during the original short sale transaction" when "the Property was encumbered by a bankruptcy filing that affected the Property and stayed any transaction in regard to the Property." The claim continues: "PNC's transfer of the Property to Rushmore was void and illegal under federal bankruptcy statutes due to the bankruptcy stay, and such transfer was fraudulent."

Defendants fault the claim in that they are not debtors subject to a bankruptcy to prohibit a property transfer. Defendants explain that PNC assigned Mr. Altmann's loan and did not transfer any property to demonstrate [45] a property transfer from a bankruptcy estate.

Defendants are correct. The complaint merely notes a fraudulent transfer without reference to a particular state or federal statute. Defendants held no title to the property. The fraudulent property transfer claim fails as a matter of law.

Due Process Violation

The complaint's (ninth) due process violation claim alleges that "Defendants . . . initiated non-judicial foreclosure proceedings against Altmann's home" to result in "further failure to provide plaintiffs Altmann and CBI with due process in regard to the foreclosure sale."

Defendants note that exercise of California's non-judicial foreclosure procedure does not invoke procedural due process requirements.

The complaint does not reference 42 U.S.C. § 1983, the vehicle to pursue a constitutional challenge such as the purported due process violation claim. The "ultimate issue" to determine whether a person is subject to a section 1983 action is whether "the alleged infringement of federal rights [is] 'fairly attributable to the State?'" Rendell-Baker

v. Kohn, 457 U.S. 830, 838, 102 S.Ct. 2764, 73 L. Ed. 2d 418 (1982) (quoting Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., 457 U.S. 922, 937, 102 S.Ct. 2744, 2754, 73 L.Ed.2d 482 (1982)). [46] The United States Supreme Court has adopted a two-part test to address whether infringement is attributable to the state:

> Our cases have accordingly insisted that the conduct allegedly causing the deprivation of a federal right be fairly attributable to the State: These cases reflect a two-part approach to this question of "fair attribution." First, the deprivation must be caused by the exercise of some right or privilege created by the State or by a rule of conduct imposed by the state or by a person for whom the State is responsible. . . Second, the party charged with the deprivation must be a person who may fairly be said to be a state actor. This may be because he is a state official, because he has acted together [*1080] with or has obtained significant aid from state officials, or because his conduct is otherwise chargeable to the State. Without a limit such as this, private parties could face constitutional litigation whenever they seek to rely on some state rule governing their interactions with the community surrounding them.

Lugar v. Edmondson Oil Co., Inc., 457 U.S. 922, 937, 102 S.Ct. 2744, 73 L. Ed. 2d 482 (1982).

A private remedy such as non-judicial foreclosure does not involve state action to invoke [47] a section 1983 claim. Apao v. Bank of New York, 324 F.3d 1091, 1095 (9th Cir. 2003); Charmicor v. Deaner, 572 F.2d 694, 696 (9th Cir. 1978) (source of the non-judicial foreclosure " right is not conclusive as to state action"). "California's nonjudicial foreclosure procedure does not constitute state action and is therefore immune from the procedural due process requirements of the federal Constitution." Garfinkle v. Superior Court, 21 Cal.3d 268, 281, 146 Cal.Rptr. 208, 578 P.2d 925 (1978).

Non-judicial foreclosure proceedings do not constitute state action to bar the complaint's due process violation claim.

In addition, the complaint fails to substantiate that defendants are state actors. "When addressing whether a private party acted under color of law, we therefore start with the presumption that private conduct does not constitute governmental action." Sutton v. Providence St. Joseph Medical Center, 192 F.3d 826, 835 (9th Cir. 1999); see Harvey v. Harvey, 949 F.2d 1127, 1130 (11th Cir.1992) ("Only in rare circumstances can a private party be viewed as a 'state actor' for section 1983 purposes."); Price v. Hawaii, 939 F.2d 702, 707-08 (9th Cir.1991) ("[P]rivate parties are not generally acting [48] under color of state law.") "§ 1983 excludes from its reach merely private conduct, no matter how discriminatory or wrong." American Mfrs. Mut. Ins. Co. v. Sullivan, 526 U.S. 40, 119 S.Ct. 977, 985, 143 L. Ed. 2d 130 (1999) (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

As private actors, defendants are subject to no section 1983 claim to further warrant dismissal of the complaint's due process violation claim.

Unconscionability

The complaint's (eleventh) unconscionable contract claim urges this Court to find "prodecural unconscionability of this mortgage contract and deem such contract void" in that Mr. Altmann "could not understand and choose the terms of the loan effectively without the meaningful disclosure of the Lenders thus meeting the unequal bargaining power."

Section 1670.5(a) provides:

> If the court as a matter of law finds the contract or any clause of the contract to have been unconscionable at the time it was made the court may refuse to enforce the contract, or it may enforce the remainder of the contract without the unconscionable clause, or it may so limit the application of any unconscionable clause as to avoid any unconscionable result.

"Civil Code section 1670.5 does not create an affirmative [49] cause of action but merely codifies the defense of unconscionability." Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc. v. Superior Court, 211 Cal.App.3d 758, 766, 259 Cal.Rptr. 789 (1989).

Unconscionability has "procedural" and "substantive" elements. A & M Produce Co. v. FMC Corp., 135 Cal.App.3d 473, 486, 186 Cal.Rptr. 114 (1982). The procedural element focuses on: (1) "oppression," which "arises from an inequality of bargaining power which results in no real negotiation and 'an absence of meaningful [*1081] choice'"; and (2) "surprise" which "involves the extent to which the supposedly agreed-upon terms of the bargain are hidden in a prolix printed form drafted by the party seeking to enforce the disputed terms." A & M Produce, 135 Cal.App.3d at 486, 186 Cal.Rptr. 114 (citations omitted). The substantive element turns on "allocation of risks between the parties, and therefore that a contractual term is substantively suspect if it reallocates the risks of the bargain in an objectively unreasonable or unexpected manner" to constitute a "one-sided" result without "justification" for it. A & M Produce, 135 Cal.App.3d at 487, 186 Cal.Rptr. 114 (citations omitted).

The complaint alleges no facts that defendants engaged [50] in oppression, surprise, or overly-harsh conduct to suggest the availability of the unconscionability defense. The complaint reveals no more than an arms length loan transaction and Mr. Altmann's attempts to avoid foreclosure. Defendants are not subject to an unconscionability claim or defense to warrant dismissal of the claim.

California Statutory Unfair Lending Practices

California has enacted anti-predatory lending statutes. See Cal. Fin. Code, §§ 4970-4979.8. The complaint's twelfth claim purports to allege violations of several subparts of California Financial Code section 4973(c).

An initial question is whether Mr. Altmann's loan is a "covered loan" under subsection (b) of California Financial Code section 4970 ("section 4970"). Section 4970(b) provides:

> "Covered loan" means a consumer loan in which the original principal balance of the loan does not exceed the most current conforming loan limit for a single-family first mortgage loan established by the Federal National Mortgage Association in the case of a mortgage or deed of trust, and where one of the following conditions are met:
> (1) For a mortgage or deed of trust, the annual percentage rate at consummation of the transaction [51] will exceed by more than eight percentage points the yield on Treasury securities having comparable periods of maturity on the 15th day of the month immediately preceding the month in which the application for the extension of credit is received by the creditor.
> (2) The total points and fees payable by the consumer at or before closing for a mortgage or deed of trust will exceed 6 percent of the total loan amount.

The complaint fails to allege facts that Mr. Altmann's loan meets section 4970(b) conditions. See Nool v. HomeQ Servicing, 653 F.Supp.2d 1047, 1054 (E.D. Cal. 2009) (dismissing a section 4970 claim for failure to allege "covered loan" conditions). In absence of necessary facts to establish a covered loan, the complaint's twelfth claim fails. See Fortaleza v. PNC Financial Services Group, Inc., 642 F.Supp.2d 1012, 1020 (N.D. Cal. 2009) (dismissing a claim under California Financial Code, §§ 4973, et seq., in that plaintiff "failed to identify either the specific statutory provision pursuant to which plaintiff brings suit, or the specific conduct undertaken by either [defendant] in alleged violation of an applicable statutory provision").

Furthermore, the complaint's twelfth claim [52] is untimely in that California Code of Civil Procedure section 340 provides a one-year limitations period for statutes such as California Financial Code sections 4970-4979.8. See DeLeon v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 729 F.Supp.2d 1119, 1128-1129 (N.D. Cal. 2010). Plaintiffs' claims arise out of Mr. Altmann's loan origination and accrued at the loan's April 2007 consummation to render the complaint's [*1082] October 27, 2011 filing untimely for claims under California Financial Code sections 4970-4979.8.

Usury

The complaint's (thirteenth) usury laws violation claim alleges that loan documents generated by defendants "contained an illegal and usurious rate of interest that violated California's Usury laws."

Defendants fault the complaint's failure to allege usury elements.

"The essential elements of usury are: (1) The transaction must be a loan or forbearance; (2) the interest to be paid must exceed the statutory maximum; (3) the loan and interest must be absolutely repayable by the borrower; and (4) the lender must have a willful intent to enter into a usurious transaction." Ghirardo v. Antonioli, 8 Cal.4th 791, 798, 35 Cal.Rptr.2d 418, 883 P.2d 960 (1994). "There is a rebuttable presumption that a transaction [53] is not usurious." Ghirardo, 8 Cal.4th at 798-99, 35 Cal.Rptr.2d 418 (1994).

The complaint is devoid of facts to suggest that Mr. Altmann's loan is usurious. The complaint lacks facts as to the loan's interest rate, its exceeding the statutory maximum, and the lender's willful intent.

Moreover, a usury claim is susceptible to the three-year limitations period of California Code of Civil Procedure section 338(a), which address an "action upon liability created by statute." California's usury proscription is found in California Constitution, article XV, section 1, which states "No person, association, copartnership or corporation shall by charging any fee, bonus, commission, discount or other compensation receive from a borrower more than the interest authorized by this section upon any loan or forbearance of any money, goods or things in action."

The limitations defense provides further grounds to dismiss the usury claim.

Truth In Lending Act

The complaint's fourteenth claim purports to allege violations under the Truth in Lending Act ("TILA"), 15 U.S.C. §§ 1601, et seq., and its implementing Regulation Z, 12 C.F.R. §§ 226, et seq. The claim alleges that "material documents provided to Altmann [54] . . . failed in one or more material respects to disclose to Altmann in a form and manner required by applicable statute and regulation."

Defendants challenge the complaint's TILA claims as time barred.

Damages Limitations Period

A TILA damages claim is subject to 15 U.S.C. § 1640(e), which provides that an action for a TILA violation must proceed "within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation." "TILA requires that any claim based on an alleged failure to make material disclosures be brought within one year from the date of the occurrence of the violation." Hallas v. Ameriquest Mortg. Co., 406 F.Supp.2d 1176, 1183 (D. Or. 2005). The limitations period runs from the date of a transaction's consummation which is the time that a consumer becomes contractually obligated on a credit transaction. Monaco v. Bear Stearns Residential Mortgage Corp., 554 F.Supp.2d 1034, 1039 (C.D. Cal. 2008). The Ninth Circuit noted in Meyer v. Ameriquest Mortgage Co., 342 F.3d 899, 902 (9th Cir. 2003):

> The failure to make the required disclosures occurred, if at all, at the time the loan documents were signed. The [plaintiffs] were in full possession of all information relevant to the discovery [55] of a TiLA violation and a § 1640(a) damages claim on the day the loan papers were signed.

[*1083] The complaint's face illustrates that TILA damages claims are time barred in that Mr. Altmann consummated his loan in April 2007 and filed his complaint on October 27, 2011, more than four years after their loan transaction. TILA damages claims are doomed.

Rescission Limitations Period

To the extent that the FAC pursues a TILA rescission claim, it too is time barred.

TILA's "buyer's remorse" provision allows borrowers three business days to rescind, without penalty, a consumer loan that uses their principal dwelling as security. Semar v. Platte Valley Federal Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 791 F.2d 699, 701 (9th Cir. 1986);15 U.S.C. § 1635(a). TILA rescission may be extended up to three years if the lender fails to comply with TILA disclosure requirements. Semar, 791 F.2d at 701-702; 15 U.S.C. § 1635(f).

15 U.S.C. § 1635(f) addresses the outer most limit to seek rescission:

> An obligor's right of rescission shall expire three years after the date of consummation of the transaction or upon the sale of the property, whichever occurs first, notwithstanding the fact that the information and forms required under this [56] section or any other disclosures required under this part have not been delivered to the obligor . . . (Bold added.)

The U.S. Supreme Court has described as "manifest" Congress' intent to prohibit rescission after the three-year period has run:

> Section 1635(f), however, takes us beyond any question whether it limits more than the time for bringing a suit, by governing the life of the underlying right as well. The subsection says nothing in terms of bringing an action but instead provides that the "right of rescission [under the Act] shall expire" at the end of the time period. It talks not of a suit's commencement but of a right's duration, which it addresses in terms so straightforward as to render any limitation on the time for seeking a remedy superfluous. There is no reason, then, even to resort to the canons of construction that we use to resolve doubtful cases, such as the rule that the creation of a right in the same statute that provides a limitation is some evidence that the right was meant to be limited, not just the remedy. See Midstate Horticultural Co., supra, at 360, 64 S.Ct., at 130; Burnett, supra, at 427, n. 2, 85 S.Ct., at 1054 n. 2; Davis v. Mills, 194 U.S. 451, 454, 24 S.Ct. 692, 693-694, 48 L.Ed. 1067 (1904).

Beach v. Ocwen Fed. Bank, 523 U.S. 410, 417, 419, 118 S.Ct. 1408, 140 L. Ed. 2d 566 (1998); [57] Miguel v. Country Funding Corp., 309 F.3d 1161, 1164 (9th Cir. 2002) ("§ 1635(f) is a statute of repose, depriving the courts of subject matter jurisdiction when a § 1635 claim is brought outside the three-year limitation period").

With Mr. Altmann's loan consummated in April 2007, a TILA rescission remedy expired prior to the October 27, 2011 filing of Mr. Altmann's complaint. TILA rescission is time barred.

Equitable Tolling

The complaint's TILA claim alleges that "the doctrine of equitable tolling applies to Altmann's claims for civil damages and rescission." Defendants challenge application of equitable tolling to save TILA claims from expired limitations periods.

"Equitable tolling may be applied if, despite all due diligence, a plaintiff is unable to obtain vital information bearing on the existence of his claim." Santa Maria v. Pacific Bell, 202 F.3d 1170, 1178 (9th [*1084] Cir. 2000). The Ninth Circuit has explained:

> Unlike equitable estoppel, equitable tolling does not depend on any wrongful conduct by the defendant to prevent the plaintiff from suing. Instead it focuses on whether there was excusable delay by the plaintiff. If a reasonable plaintiff would not have known of the existence [58] of a possible claim within the limitations period, then equitable tolling will serve to extend the statute of limitations for filing until the plaintiff can gather what information he needs. . . . However, equitable tolling does not postpone the statute of limitations until the existence of a claim is a virtual certainty.

Santa Maria, 202 F.3d at 1178 (citation omitted).

Courts are reluctant to invoke equitable tolling:

> A statute of limitations is subject to the doctrine of equitable tolling; therefore, relief from strict construction of a statute of limitations is readily available in extreme cases and gives the court latitude in a case-by-case analysis. . . . The equitable tolling doctrine has been applied by the Supreme Court in certain circumstances, but it has been applied sparingly; for example, the Supreme Court has allowed equitable tolling when the statute of limitations was not complied with because of defective pleadings, when a claimant was tricked by an adversary into letting a deadline expire . . . Courts have been generally unforgiving, however, when a late filing is due to claimant's failure "to exercise due diligence in preserving his legal rights." . . .

Scholar v. Pac. Bell, 963 F.2d 264, 267-268 (9th Cir. 1992) [59] (bold added; citations omitted).

To rely on delayed discovery of a claim, "[a] plaintiff whose complaint shows on its face that his claim would be barred without the benefit of the discovery rule must specifically plead facts to show (1) the time and manner of discovery and (2) the inability to have made earlier discovery despite reasonable diligence." Fox v. Ethicon Endo-Surgery, Inc., 35 Cal.4th 797, 808, 27 Cal.Rptr.3d 661, 110 P.3d 914 (2005) (quoting McKelvey v. Boeing North American, Inc., 74 Cal.App.4th 151, 160, 86 Cal.Rptr.2d 645 (1999)). "[T]o adequately allege facts supporting a theory of delayed discovery, the plaintiff must plead that, despite diligent investigation of the circumstances of the injury, he or she could not have reasonably discovered facts supporting the cause of action within the applicable statute of limitations period." Fox, 35 Cal.4th at 809, 27 Cal.Rptr.2d 661.

The doctrine of delayed discovery requires a plaintiff to plead facts showing an excuse for late discovery of the facts underlying his cause of action. Prudential Home Mortgage Co. v. Superior Court, 66 Cal.App.4th 1236, 1247, 78 Cal.Rptr.2d 566 (1998). The plaintiff must show that it was not at fault for failing [60] to discover or had no actual or presumptive knowledge of facts sufficient to put it on inquiry. Prudential Home, 66 Cal.App.4th at 1247, 78 Cal.Rptr.2d 566. As to sufficiency of delayed discovery allegations, a plaintiff bears the burden to "show diligence" and "conclusory allegations" will not withstand dismissal. Fox, 35 Cal.4th 797, 808, 27 Cal.Rptr.2d 661.

The complaint lacks necessary allegations for equitable tolling. The complaint references vague TILA discrepancies and makes sweeping references to failure to provide documents and hidden facts. The complaint lacks allegations that defendants prevented plaintiffs to compare what documents they received to the TILA disclosure requirements. See Hubbard v. Fidelity Federal Bank, 91 F.3d 75, 79 (9th Cir. 1996) (no evidence suggested [*1085] that lender concealed its alleged breach). Nothing suggests that plaintiffs lacked information relevant to discovery of a TILA violation when Mr. Altmann's loan was consummated. The complaint offers nothing to demonstrate that despite plaintiffs' due diligence, they were unable to obtain information of a TILA violation. The complaint is silent as to plaintiffs' purported due diligence. Moreover, the limitations [61] period for TILA rescission is a statute of repose not subject to equitable tolling. TILA claims are time barred and subject to dismissal.

Punitive Damages

The complaint includes a prayer for punitive damages and references to attempt to subject defendants to punitive damages.

Defendants contend that the complaint lacks adequate allegations to subject them to punitive damages.

California Civil Code section 3294 ("section 3294") provides that in an action "for breach of an obligation not arising from contract," a plaintiff may seek punitive damages "where it is proven by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice." Cal. Civ. Code, § 3294(a). Section 3294(c)(1)-(3) defines:

> 1. "Malice" as "conduct which is intended by the defendant to cause injury to the plaintiff or despicable conduct which is carried on by the defendant with a willful and conscious disregard of the rights and safety of others";

2. "Oppression" as "despicable conduct that subjects a person to cruel and unjust hardship in conscious disregard of that person's rights"; and

3. "Fraud" as "an intentional misrepresentation, deceit, or concealment of a material fact known to the [62] defendant with the intention on the part of the defendant of thereby depriving a person of property or legal rights or otherwise causing injury."

"Although the court will apply the substantive law embodied in section 3294, 'determinations regarding the adequacy of pleadings are governed by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.'" Jackson v. East Bay Hosp., 980 F.Supp. 1341, 1353 (N.D. Cal. 1997).

Punitive damages are "available to a party who can plead and prove the facts and circumstances set forth in Civil Code section 3294." Hilliard v. A. H. Robins Co., 148 Cal. App. 3d 374, 392, 196 Cal. Rptr. 117 (1983). "To support punitive damages, the complaint . . . must allege ultimate facts of the defendant's oppression, fraud, or malice." Cyrus v. Haveson, 65 Cal.App.3d 306, 316-317, 135 Cal.Rptr. 246 (1976). Pleading the language in section 3294 "is not objectionable when sufficient facts are alleged to support the allegation." Perkins v. Superior Court, 117 Cal.App.3d 1, 6-7, 172 Cal.Rptr. 427 (1981).

In G.D. Searle & Co. v. Superior Court, 49 Cal.App.3d 22, 29, 122 Cal.Rptr. 218 (1975), the California Court of Appeal explained punitive damages pleading:

> When the plaintiff alleges an intentional [63] wrong, a prayer for exemplary damage may be supported by pleading that the wrong was committed willfully or with a design to injure. . . . When nondeliberate injury is charged, allegations that the defendant's conduct was wrongful, willful, wanton, reckless or unlawful do not support a claim for exemplary damages; such allegations do not charge malice. . . . When a defendant must produce evidence in defense of an exemplary damage claim; fairness demands that he receive adequate notice of the kind of conduct charged against him. (Citations omitted.)

[*1086] "Allegations that the acts . . . were 'arbitrary, capricious, fraudulent, wrongful and unlawful,' like other adjectival descriptions of such proceedings, constitute mere conclusions of law . . ." Faulkner v. California Toll Bridge Authority, 40 Cal.2d 317, 329, 253 P.2d 659 (1953); see Lehto v. Underground Construction Co., 69 Cal.App.3d 933, 944, 138 Cal.Rptr. 419 (1997) (facts and circumstances of fraud should be set out clearly, concisely, and with sufficient particularity to support punitive damages); Smith v. Superior Court, 10 Cal.App.4th 1033, 1042, 13 Cal.Rptr.2d 133 (1992) (punitive damages claim is insufficient in that it is "devoid [64] of any factual assertions supporting a conclusion petitioners acted with oppression, fraud or malice."); Brousseau v. Jarrett, 73 Cal.App.3d 864, 872, 141 Cal.Rptr. 200 (1977) ("conclusory characterization of defendant's conduct as intentional, willful and fraudulent is a patently insufficient statement of 'oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied,' within the meaning of section 3294").

Punitive damages are never awarded as a matter of right, are disfavored by the law, and should be granted with the greatest of caution and only in the clearest of cases. Henderson v. Security Pacific National Bank, 72 Cal.App.3d 764, 771, 140 Cal.Rptr. 388 (1977).

Defendants are correct that the complaint lacks facts that defendants acted with requisite malice, oppression or fraud to support punitive damages claims. The complaint merely make stray references to "malice, fraud, and/or oppression" and "malicious" actions with no facts to support such conclusions. The complaint lacks sufficient allegations of defendants' wrongdoing to impose punitive damages on defendants. Moreover, dismissal of plaintiffs' claims warrants dismissal of punitive damages claims.

Attorney Fees

Defendants contend that [65] the complaint lacks necessary allegations to justify an award of attorney fees to plaintiffs. Defendants explain that in absence of a statute or contractual provision for attorney fees recovery, attorney fees are not recoverable as damages in an ordinary civil action.

Attorney fees are recoverable if authorized by statute or contract. See Cal. Code Civ. Proc., § 1021. In a federal action, state law is relevant to assess "whether the contractual attorney's fee obligation was valid and enforceable." Matter of Sheridan, 105 F.3d 1164, 1167 (7th Cir. 1997). "State law controls both the award of and the reasonableness of fees awarded where state law supplies the rule of decision." Mathis v. Exxon Corp., 302 F.3d 448, 461 (5th Cir. 2002). California Code of Civil Procedure section 1033.5(a)(1) permits recovery of attorney fees "when authorized by . . . Contract." Under California Code of Civil Procedure section 1021, the "measure and mode" of attorney fees "is left to . . . agreement," unless attorney fees "are specifically provided for by statute."

California Code of Civil Procedure section 1021 "is a codification of the general rule, also known as the American Rule, that attorney fees, are [66] not taxable as costs against the losing party. Young v. Redman, 55 Cal.App.3d 827, 834-835, 128 Cal.Rptr. 86 (1976). "The rule here has long been that attorney's fees are not ordinarily recoverable in the absence of a statute or enforceable contract providing therefor." Fleischmann Corp. v. Maier Brewing, 386 U.S. 714, 717-718, 87 S.Ct. 1404, 18 L. Ed. 2d 475 (1967). "[U]nless there are pleading and proof of an express contractual provision therefor, attorneys' fees cannot be awarded a successful litigant." [*1087] Robinson & Wilson, Inc. v. Stone, 35 Cal.App.3d 396, 413, 110 Cal.Rptr. 675 (1973).

The complaint alleges neither breach of a written agreement with an attorney fees provision nor a statute entitling plaintiffs to an award of attorney fees. In the absence of a statutory or contractual basis for attorney fees, the complaint lacks sufficient allegations for an attorney fees award to plaintiffs.

Attempt At Amendment And Malice

As discussed above, the complaint's global claims are barred legally, and plaintiffs are unable to cure the complaint's claims by allegation of other facts and thus are not granted an attempt to amend. Moreover, this Court surmises that plaintiffs brought this action in absence of [67] good faith and seek to exploit the court system to delay or to vex defendants. The test for maliciousness is a subjective one and requires the court to "determine the . . . good faith of the applicant." Kinney v. Plymouth Rock Squab Co., 236 U.S. 43, 46, 35 S. Ct. 236, 59 L. Ed. 457 (1915); see Wright v. Newsome, 795 F.2d 964, 968, n. 1 (11th Cir. 1986); cf. Glick v. Gutbrod, 782 F.2d 754, 757 (7th Cir. 1986) (court has inherent power to dismiss case demonstrating "clear pattern of abuse of judicial process"). A lack of good faith or malice also can be inferred from a complaint containing untrue material allegations of fact or false statements made with intent to deceive the court. See Horsey v. Asher, 741 F.2d 209, 212 (8th Cir. 1984). An attempt to vex or delay provides further grounds to dismiss this action.

CONCLUSION AND ORDER

For the reasons discussed above, this Court:

1. DISMISSES with prejudice this action against defendants;

2. DIRECTS the clerk to enter judgment in favor of defendants PNC Bank, N.A., and Rushmore Loan Management Services and against plaintiffs Ernie Altmann and Creative Builders, Inc. in that there is no just reason to delay to enter such judgment given that the plaintiffs' claims against [68] these defendants and their alleged liability are clear and distinct from claims against and liability of other defendants. See F.R.Civ.P. 54(b); and

3. ORDERS plaintiffs, no later than January 26, 2012, to file papers to show cause why this Court should not dismiss this action against any remaining defendants, including Cal-Western Reconveyance Corporation and The Bowers Group.

This Court ADMONISHES plaintiffs that this Court will dismiss this action against any remaining defendants if the plaintiffs fail to comply with this order and fail to file timely papers to show cause why this Court should not dismiss this action against any remaining defendants.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

[*1208] REPORT AND RECOMMENDATION

This matter has been referred to the undersigned for a report and recommendation on the motion for attorney fees filed by defendants St. John Medical Center, William Howard Allred, M.D., and William Burnett, M.D. [1] (these defendants are hereinafter referred to in the singular as "St. John"). [Dkt. 458, 460, 486]. The following represents the [2] undersigned's Report and Recommendation. [2]

Background

Plaintiff, George S. Cohlmia, Jr. is a licensed physician in the State of Oklahoma. He has specialized in cardiovascular, thoracic, vascular and endovascular surgery in Tulsa since 1984. Dr. Cohlmia is the sole owner and shareholder of Cardiovascular Surgical Specialists, Inc. (hereinafter referred to in the singular as "Dr. Cohlmia"). [Dkt. # 90 at 2, 7]. Dr. Cohlmia received his board certification in surgery in 1986, and his board certification in thoracic surgery in 1987. Dr. Cohlmia has performed thousands of surgeries in Tulsa. A significant percentage of Dr. Cohlmia's patients are uninsured or under-insured Native Americans. [Dkt. # 90 at 7, 8 and Dkt. # 376 at 5]. Native Americans have traditionally accounted for greater than fifty percent (50%) of Dr. Cohlmia's patient base. [Dkt. # 376 at 21].

On August 3, 2009, the District Court entered judgment in this case in favor of St. John and against Dr. Cohlmia. [Dkt. # 448]. On August 31, 2009, St. John timely filed its [4] application for attorney fees as prevailing party. [Dkt. # 458]. In support of its application, St. John relies on the Statement of Undisputed Facts and attached supporting materials from its Brief in Support of Motion for Summary Judgment filed on April 7, 2009. [3] [Dkt. ## 364, 458]. The following is a brief summary of relevant facts from St. John's brief.

Until July 2003, Dr. Cohlmia had active medical staff privileges at all five major hospitals in Tulsa. [4] Prior to 2003, Dr. Cohlmia performed most of his surgeries at Hillcrest Medical Center ("Hillcrest"). [*1209] [Dkt. # 376 at 5]. In the spring of 2001, Dr. Cohlmia began to explore the possibility of developing a physician-owned speciality heart hospital. Dr. Cohlmia hired a consulting firm and obtained an option on real estate. Dr. Cohlmia and his consultant first considered an affiliation with Hillcrest, but determined it was infeasible. [Dkt. [5] # 376 at 9]. Dr. Cohlmia's business plan was presented to various cardiovascular surgeons in Tulsa, including the cardiology groups who practice at St. John and Hillcrest. [Dkt. # 376 at 9-10]. In February 2002, Saint Francis Hospital announced plans to open a speciality heart hospital, as a joint venture with local cardiologists and surgeons. [Dkt. # 376 at 10]. In December 2002, Dr. Cohlmia terminated his arrangement with his consultant, and by June 2002 his project was essentially dead. In April or May 2003, Dr. Cohlmia presented his business plan to cardiologists in Muskogee, Oklahoma; Fort Smith, Arkansas; and physicians in Wichita, Kansas. He did not secure an investor through these efforts. [Dkt. # 376 at 12]. In June 2003, Dr. Cohlmia's real estate option expired. [Dkt. # 376 at 13]. In December 2003, President Bush signed into law a statute prohibiting physicians from referring Medicare patients to new speciality hospitals in which the physician had an ownership interest. The statute imposed a moratorium on development of speciality hospitals not already under development. [Dkt. # 376 at 13].

[1] Dr. Allred is the Vice President of Medical Affairs for St. John and is a surgeon specializing in colon and rectal surgery. Dr. Burnett is a former President of St. John's Medical Staff and is board certified in internal medicine. Dr. Allred and Dr. Burnett participated in St. John's decision to terminate Dr. Cohlmia's medical staff privileges, the incident giving rise to this lawsuit. [Dkt. # 376 at 4]. St. John Medical Center paid Dr. Allred's and Dr. Burnett's attorney fees and expenses arising out of this lawsuit.

[2] On October 31, 2010, during a telephone conference the undersigned advised counsel that his report was prepared and that he intended to recommend an award of attorney fees incurred as a result of plaintiff's claims under Section I and probably under Section II of the Sherman Act, and deny attorney fees incurred on St. John's affirmative defense of immunity under the Health Care Quality Improvement Act, on plaintiff's state law claims for Tortious Interference with Contract, and the Oklahoma Antitrust Act. [Dkt. # 529, Ex. A.]. Counsel was instructed to file supplemental briefs to address apportionment between these claims and [3] defenses. Subsequently, the undersigned re-examined the pleadings, exhibits, arguments of counsel, and relevant federal law, and based on that review, has reconsidered some aspects of the recommendation.

[3] On August 27, 2009, Judge Frizzell announced from the bench his decision on St. John's Motion for Summary Judgment and specifically found that there were no genuine issues of material fact which would preclude summary adjudication given the standard in 42 U.S.C. § 11112(a). [Dkt. # 451 at 120].

In the summer of 2002, Hillcrest hired Dr. Arshad Yousuf as a staff cardiovascular surgeon to expand its cardiovascular department. From the outset, the relationship between Dr. Cohlmia and Dr. Yousuf was acrimonious. [Dkt. # 376 at 14]. In January 2003, Hillcrest retained an expert to conduct a departmental review of its cardiology unit. [5] At the conclusion of the review, a report was issued that was critical of certain aspects of the unit, including patient selection. The report prompted Hillcrest to institute a moratorium on certain high risk cardiovascular surgical procedures. The moratorium applied to all physicians within the department. Once the moratorium was instituted, Dr. Cohlmia shifted a significant percentage of his practice to St. John. [Dkt. # 376 at 15].

On June 6, 2003, Dr. Cohlmia operated on two lung cancer patients at St. John. [Dkt. # 376 at 17]. Both patients were Native Americans. During the surgery on the first patient, Dr. Cohlmia removed one lung and several ribs, and he collapsed the patient's chest cavity. During the surgery on the second patient, [7] Dr. Cohlmia attempted to remove a tumor in a lung that had invaded the chest wall. The following day, the patients' charts were brought to the attention of Dr. Allred by a nurse at St. John. Dr. Allred reviewed the two patients' charts and monitored their condition for several days. Dr. Allred consulted a number of physician specialists and concluded that Dr. Cohlmia had not followed adequate presurgical protocols for these lung cancer patients. [6] One of the patients died seven days following an attempted corrective surgery, and the other patient [*1210] was disfigured as a result of the surgery. [7] [Dkt. # 376 at 17]. A meeting to review Dr. Cohlmia's procedures in these two cases was held by St. John's Executive Officers on July 7, 2003. The following day, the officers reached a consensus and summarily suspended Dr. Cohlmia's privileges. [Dkt. # 376 at 17]. Dr. Allred notified Dr. Cohlmia in writing of the summary suspension. [8] Dr. Cohlmia's suspension was reported to the National Practitioner Data Bank as an adverse action. Dr. Cohlmia appealed the summary suspension. In August, a three day hearing was conducted on the suspension in accordance with St. John's bylaws. Retired Federal District [8] Judge Thomas R. Brett served as the hearing officer. Dr. Cohlmia was represented by counsel. [Dkt. # 376 at 17]. [9] On September 4, 2003, Judge Brett upheld

[5] Prior to 2004, Hillcrest was in financial distress. [Dkt. # 376 at 8].

[6] Dr. Allred talked with several St. John physicians regarding the two subject surgeries performed by Dr. Cohlmia. He spoke to a thoracic surgeon who disagreed with Dr. Cohlmia's decision to operate. The thoracic surgeon said he would not have operated on a patient with cancer in the lung that had spread to the mediastinum and had positive lymph notes. Dr. Allred spoke to Dr. Jay Lohrey, an oncologist, who treated one of the patients post-surgically. Dr. Lohrey felt that Dr. Cohlmia committed error and that his patient had been unnecessarily harmed. A pulmonologist who had reviewed the charts opined that Dr. Cohlmia's pre-surgical work-up was insufficient. [Dkt. # 364 at 3].

[7] At the hearing on St. John's motion for summary judgement, a "pre-surgical workup" was explained as diagnostic testing and consulting with other specialists to identify the type of cancerous tumor, the stage of the tumor, and [9] the best method of treatment. [Dkt. # 451 at 12-14]

[8] According to St. John's bylaws, Dr. Allred had the authority to summarily suspend any member of the medical staff whenever necessary to "protect the life of any patient(s) or reduce the substantial likelihood of immediate injury or damage to the health or safety of any patient." [Dkt. # 364 at 2]. The letter included the following information: (1) a detailed description of the two cases and the reasons they felt the surgeries were inappropriate; (2) a statement that, based on the advice of members of the medical staff, Dr. Cohlmia's conduct posed an imminent threat of harm to patients; (3) a statement that Dr. Cohlmia had the right to request a hearing to address the summary suspension within 30 days and an identification of the person to whom he should direct the request; and (4) a statement that a hearing would be conducted by a hearing officer appointed by one of the Medical Staff Entities. [Dkt. # 364 at 4].

[9] Dr. Cohlmia and St. John were represented by their respective attorneys. Fourteen physicians testified and were cross examined (including Dr. Cohlmia), exhibits were admitted, arguments were made by counsel for both parties [10] and the proceeding was recorded. [Dkt. # 451 at 56].

the suspension. St. John's Executive Committee and Board of Directors reviewed and approved Judge Brett's decision. [Dkt. # 376 at 17].

Upon learning of Dr. Cohlmia's suspension at St. John, Hillcrest required Dr. Cohlmia to conduct and document a comprehensive preoperative patient evaluation and review at its facility. Hillcrest continued to review Dr. Cohlmia's presurgical procedures. Based on the findings in these reviews, in October 2004, Hillcrest sought summary suspension of Dr. Cohlmia's privileges. Dr. Cohlmia objected to Hillcrest's actions and voluntarily suspended his practice until the issue could be resolved. Hillcrest ultimately voted not to renew Dr. Cohlmia's staff privileges. Following Hillcrest's review process, Dr. Cohlmia's medical staff privileges were terminated. [Dkt. # 376 at 19-20].

In early 2004, Dr. Cohlmia did not apply for recredentialing at Saint Francis Hospital, and in early 2005, Dr. Cohlmia withdrew his application for recredentialing at SouthCrest Hospital. [Dkt. # 376 at 19]. In February 2005, Dr. Cohlmia entered into a joint venture to develop a cardiovascular center in Tahlequah, Oklahoma at the Tahlequah City Hospital. Dr. Cohlmia conducts surgeries in Tahlequah and performs certain non-surgical procedures at an office he maintains [11] in Tulsa. [Dkt. # 376 at 20-21].

Procedural History

On July 7, 2005, Dr. Cohlmia filed a 61-page Complaint, containing nine counts, naming more than twenty defendants, asserting claims for violation of Section I and II of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and Section IV of the Clayton Antitrust Act, [*1211] 42 U.S.C. § 1981, Oklahoma Antitrust Reform Act, Tortious Interference with Contract and Prospective Advantage, Defamation, and Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress. The Complaint sought injunctive relief, monetary damages and attorney fees. At the hearing, the undersigned was advised that Dr. Cohlmia sought $29 million in actual damages, and $90 million in treble and punitive damages. Throughout the course of these proceedings several of the claims and all of the defendants, except St. John, were dismissed for various reasons. [10]

St. John was charged in Count I with Combination and Conspiracy in Restraint of Trade in violation of Section I of the Sherman Act and Section IV of the Clayton Act, in Count III with Conspiracy to Eliminate Market Share in violation of the Oklahoma Antitrust Act, in Count IV with Tortious Interference with Contract and Prospective Advantage, in Count V with Defamation, in Count VI with Denial of Equal Rights in violation of 42 U.S.C. § 1981, and in Count VII with Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress. [11] [Dkt. # 2]. On September 2, 2005, Dr. Cohlmia filed a First Amended Complaint adding a claim against St. John for Conspiracy to Monopolize the Market in the violation of Section II of the Sherman Act. [Dkt. # 43]. [12] On September 29, 2005, St. John filed [13] its first Motion to Dismiss. [Dkt. # 63].

On August 2, 2006, District Judge James Payne entered a 30-page written order addressing St. John's motion to dismiss. As to the Section I violation, plaintiff alleged that St. John abused the peer review process in order to prevent Dr. Cohlmia's development of a speciality heart hospital and to impede his existing medical practice. St. John requested dismissal arguing that the ouster of one physician and the resulting injury to Dr. Cohlmia's practice

[10] At the initial attorney fees hearings, Dr. Cohlmia's counsel claimed settlement with co-defendants in this case was evidence that the claims against St. John were reasonable. The undersigned disagrees. Settlement of a case with a co-defendant has no bearing on the merits of St. John's claim for fees. The facts relevant to St. John are not necessarily the same [12] facts relevant to other defendants. Unlike the defendants who settled, judgment on the merits was entered in favor of St. John and against plaintiffs. Moreover, cases, even those with no merit, settle for many reasons, including a desire to minimize legal fees and expenses. The motivations of St. John's co-defendants and the reasons any of the them entered into a settlement with plaintiff have no bearing on this proceeding.

[11] On August 1, 2005, St. John's lead attorney, Michael Lewis, filed St. John's first pleading in the case, but he neglected to file an entry of appearance. [Dkt. # 10].

[12] On September 28, 2005, William Spitler and Lesley Richer entered appearances on behalf of St. John. [Dkt. # 59].

does not equate to harm to competition, but merely harm to that competitor. Judge Payne agreed with St. John but denied dismissal at "this early stage of litigation because Dr. Cohlmia had alleged facts sufficient to survive dismissal." [13] [Dkt. # 83 at 12].

As to the Section II violation and the corresponding Oklahoma Antitrust Act claim, Dr. Cohlmia alleged that by terminating his medical staff privileges, St. John "posed a dangerous likelihood of success" of obtaining monopoly power over the cardiovascular market. Judge Payne found that Dr. Cohlmia failed to support this conclusory allegation with any facts, and [*1212] granted dismissal of this claim without prejudice. [Dkt. # 83 at 14].

Judge Payne dismissed with prejudice Dr. Cohlmia's claim for defamation as to any statement made outside the statute of limitation, and dismissed without prejudice all other purported defamation for failing to give St. John notice of the timing of the communication, the parties involved, and the statements deemed actionable. [Dkt. # 83 at 21].

As his civil rights claim, Dr. Cohlmia alleged that St. John's summary suspension was motivated in part by an unlawful desire to deprive Native American patients of cardiothoracic surgical services at St. John, by eliminating Dr. Cohlmia [15] as their preferred physician. Dr. Cohlmia alleged that St. John's actions were motivated by its concern that Dr. Cohlmia's uninsured Native American patients were costing the facility money. Dr. Cohlmia claimed Native Americans were unlawfully discriminated against, were part of a protected class, and were represented by him, their de facto representative and advocate of their right to quality health care. [Dkt. # 83 at 21-2]. Judge Payne found "these allegations to be largely unsupported, if not nonsensical." [Dkt. # 83 at 22]. Judge Payne dismissed without prejudice plaintiffs' Section 1981 claim for failure to allege facts to support a prima facie case. [Dkt. # 83 at 22]. Judge Payne also granted dismissal of Dr. Cohlmia's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress, because Dr. Cohlmia failed to allege facts to support the essential elements of the claim. [Dkt. # 83 at 24]. However, Judge Payne granted Dr. Cohlmia leave to amend the Complaint, with a directive to limit the amendment to the deficiencies addressed in the Order. [Dkt. # 83 at 7]. Judge Payne also determined that the peer review process was not privileged under Oklahoma law, as argued by St. John, which [16] opened the door for Dr. Cohlmia to conduct full discovery of St. John's peer review documents, depose personnel at St. John, and determine whether there was any merit to plaintiffs' unsupported allegations. [Dkt. # 83 at 26-7].

On October 10, 2006, Dr. Cohlmia filed a 76-page Second Amended Complaint, joining thirteen additional defendants and alleging additional factual support for all previously pled claims. [Dkt. # 90]. [14] On November 9, 2006, St. John filed its second Motion to Dismiss. [15] [Dkt. # 103]. Judge Frizzell conducted a hearing on the second motion to dismiss on May 31, 2007. Judge Frizzell first admonished Dr. Cohlmia's counsel for dragging out the proceeding by exceeding the scope of Judge Payne's order, which was limited to addressing deficiencies. [16] Judge Frizzell denied dismissal of the antitrust claims, reserving them for a summary judgment determination, but he added a cautionary note:

[13] Judge Payne quoted the following authority: "antitrust laws are intended to protect competition, not competitors, and we will not depart from that purpose in order [14] to improve [a doctor's] income standings in the physician league or help him win the Super Bowl of remuneration." [Dkt. # 83 at 12, citing Summit Health, Ltd. V. Pinhas, 500 U.S. 322, 111 S. Ct. 1842, 114 L. Ed. 2d 366 (1991)].

[14] Although Judge Payne had dismissed with prejudice some of plaintiffs' claims, Dr. Cohlmia reasserted all claims pled in his First Amended Complaint.

[15] In April 2007, the case was transferred to District Judge Gregory Frizzell. [Dkt. # 119].

[16] Judge Frizzell stated, "I guess the thing that bothers me here if we continue this practice we're going to be sitting here a year from now still addressing the substantive allegations. And I think we need to address that and need to spend some time here this morning as to whether or not you went beyond what Judge Payne allowed you to do. . . .To keep re-pleading it is just begging for this, you know, cadre of lawyers over here to keep you tied up in motions to dismiss at the pleading stage and we're never going to advance the ball." [Dkt. # 125 at 11].

> And there's some serious hurdles that the plaintiffs have to cross here on monopoly. I mean we've got a number of hospitals in this city. So, you know, [*1213] you've got a big hill to climb, frankly, to survive summary judgment.

[Dkt. # 125 at 11]. Judge Frizzell dismissed plaintiff's claims [17] for illegal boycott and defamation, finding there were no facts pled against St. John in those counts. [Dkt. # 125 at 15,17].

As to plaintiff's re-assertion that St. John's termination of Dr. Cohlmia's medical staff privileges violated Section 1981 by denying Native Americans access to St. John's facility, Judge Frizzell questioned whether the required contract nexus between St. John and Native Americans [18] was pled. Dr. Cohlmia claimed the protected contract right was shown by St. John's refusal to treat Native Americans and requested that Judge Frizzell allow discovery on the issue. [Dkt. # 32]. Judge Frizzell accommodated plaintiff but narrowed discovery to evidence that St. John shut its door on Native Americans. [Dkt. # 125 at 29]. A year and a half later, at the conclusion of discovery, plaintiff dismissed the Section 1981 claim. [Dkt. # 334].

On July 16, 2007, St. John filed an Answer, asserting an affirmative defense of immunity under the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986 (HCQIA), 42 U.S.C. § 11111(a)(1). [17] [Dkt. # 130 at 20]. A scheduling order was entered on March 27, 2008, with discovery cutoff set for November 15, 2008. [18] [Dkt. # 154]. On June 23, 2008, defendants requested four days to conduct Dr. Cohlmia's deposition. [Dkt. # 175]. The motion was granted, dividing the deposition time among defendants. [Dkt. # 181]. By March 2008, defendants had produced over 30,000 documents. This production was increased to 150,000 documents by August 2008. However, Dr. Cohlmia complained that he had not yet received "the most critical information in the case" and that he contemplated [19] receiving thousands of additional documents from St. John. [Dkt. # 205 at 4, 7]. All defendants opposed any extension of the discovery deadline, but on August 20, 2008, Dr. Cohlmia requested, and later received, his first extension of the discovery deadline. [Dkt. # 205].

On August 22, 2008, the reports offered by three of Dr. Cohlmia's expert witnesses were stricken by Magistrate Judge Paul J. Cleary for failure to comply with Rule 26. Judge Cleary concluded that the reports contained mere conclusions without any reasons or basis for the opinions. [Dkt. # 210 at 5]. Judge Cleary rejected Dr. Cohlmia's request to allow up to 30 days before trial to cure the deficiencies. He explained, "A party cannot offer a mere litany of opinions, devoid of rationale, and contend that the report will be 'supplemented' later with the basis and reasons." [Dkt. # 210 at 11]. Judge Clearly rejected plaintiff's alternative request for twenty days to supplement saying the case had been on file for three years and [20] further extensions would increase the cost of litigation for all parties. [Dkt. # 210 at 12]. The order stated:

> The reports of Riddle, Watts and Winslade do not meet the requirements of Rule 26(a)(2). These experts offer opinions, but their reports wholly fail to state the basis and reasons for their conclusions. They fail to set forth the direct testimony they would offer at trial, and provide Defendants no basis for meaningful cross-examination. Even the opinions set forth are often "preliminary" or "expected opinions."

[Dkt. # 210 at 14]. Dr. Cohlmia's appeal of the order was denied by Judge Frizzell. [19] [Dkt. # 262].

[*1214] On November 7, 2008, St. John filed its first motion for summary judgment. [Dkt. # 279]. On September 21, 2008, Dr. Cohlmia filed a second motion to extend discovery. [Dkt. # 246]. On December 5, 2008, Judge Frizzell reversed a prior decision and once again accommodated plaintiff's request for additional discovery and allowed plaintiff an opportunity to supplement their expert reports. [Dkt. ## 301, 323]. Following the second discovery deadline, on February 12, 2009, Judge [21] Frizzell held a hearing on St. John's motion for summary judgment regarding plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with contract. To support this claim, plaintiff argued that St. John's peer review process was a sham and that St. John's decision to report the adverse action against him to the National Practitioners Base caused Dr. Cohlmia to lose medical staff privileges in Tulsa hospitals and caused the [17] On March 3, 2008, James Connor, Jr. and Jason Glass entered appearances on behalf of St. John. [Dkt. # 150, 151].

[18] On April 7, 2008, Lesley Richer withdrew as counsel for St. John. [Dkt. # 157].

[19] On September 5, 2008, Hilary Velandia entered an appearance on behalf of St. John. [Dkt. # 225].

Cherokee Nation, Blue Cross and Blue Shield, and other insurance carriers to question his surgical abilities. [Dkt. # 341 at 87]. To support his claim for tortious interference, Dr. Cohlmia relied heavily on a memo dated June 6, 2003, prepared by Dr. Allred. Plaintiff argued that the memo supported his position that the summary suspension of his privileges was principally motivated by a discriminatory attitude toward Native Americans. [Dkt. # 341 at 25-26]. Dr. Cohlmia also attached copies of his expert reports, but he did not file verifying affidavits.

At the hearing, Judge Frizzell observed that Dr. Cohlmia's briefs failed to comply with the requirements of Rule 56(f), and he declined Dr. Cohlmia's counsel's request for more time to supplement Dr. Cohlmia's pleadings yet again [22] so that they would comport with the rules. [Dkt. # 341 at 87]. As to the merits, Judge Frizzell found that plaintiff failed to show any damages as a result of St. John's peer review process. He also declined to accept plaintiff's novel argument that damages should be presumed upon a suspension of privileges. Instead, Judge Frizzell granted judgment to St. John on plaintiff's tortious interference claim. Id. Dr. Cohlmia filed a motion to reconsider and that motion was denied. [Dkt. # 401].

On April 3, 2009, St. John filed a motion for summary judgment seeking immunity on plaintiff's federal and state antitrust claims for restraint of trade and market monopoly. St. John argued that it was entitled to immunity from these claims under HCQIA, because its peer review process was in compliance with the four objective standards set forth therein. 42 U.S.C. § 11112(a). [20] [Dkt. # 363]. On April 7, 2009, St. John participated in a series of joint motions in limine. The first motion sought to exclude Dr. Cohlmia from testifying as to damages, because he failed to provide the nature and amount of damages, and because Dr. Cohlmia had mitigated any loss by his successful joint venture with Tahlequah [23] City Hospital. [Dkt. # 371 at 1-2]. The second motion sought to limit plaintiff's expert witnesses to the content of their expert reports and to exclude any opinion on the legal issue of whether defendants qualified for immunity under HCQIA. [Dkt. # 372]. The third motion sought to exclude Dr. Cohlmia's account of his patients' and colleagues' [*1215] opinion that defendants conspired to restrain competition and monopolize the market. [Dkt. # 373]. The fourth motion sought to exclude Dr. Cohlmia's testimony on matters outside his personal knowledge. [Dkt. # 374]. The fifth motion sought to exclude Dr. Cohlmia's written summaries of conversations he had with patients and colleagues. [Dkt. # 375]. The sixth motion sought to exclude evidence that St. John's peer review process resulted in the failure of Dr. Cohlmia's specialty heart hospital. [21] [Dkt. # 385].

On April 7, 2009, St. John joined in the other defendants' motion for summary judgment addressing the merits of plaintiff's federal and state antitrust claims. The opening paragraph in the brief states: "Now, after the production of thousands of pages of document, scores of depositions, and the reports and testimony of numerous expert witnesses (including antitrust economists), it is clear that plaintiffs have failed to establish material facts that entitle them to relief under the federal or Oklahoma antitrust laws." [22] [Dkt. # 376 at 1]. On July 31, 2009, Judge Frizzell conducted a hearing on St. John's motions for summary judgment. Both parties presented many of the same factual arguments they made in their motions to dismiss, filed in 2005.

[20] Under Section 11112(a), the review must have been taken (1) in the reasonable belief that the action was in the furtherance of quality health care, (2) after a reasonable effort to obtain the facts of the matter, (3) after adequate notice and hearing procedures are afforded to the physician involved or after such other procedures as are [24] fair to the physician under the circumstances, and (4) in the reasonable belief that the action was warranted by the facts known after such reasonable effort to obtain facts and after meeting the requirement of paragraph (3). See 42 U.S.C. § 11112(a)(4).

[21] Judge Frizzell did not address the merits of defendants' motions in limine prior to entering summary judgment in favor of St. John and against Dr. Cohlmia.

[22] The four years of pretrial proceedings [25] in this case resulted in forty depositions, 250,000 documents produced and over 250 pleadings filed. [Dkt. # 451 at 3]. St John produced, inter alia, all of Dr. Cohlmia's peer review and credentialing files; all documents, exhibits and transcripts of Dr. Cohlmia's peer review hearing; ten years of St. John's financial records [Dkt. # 209 at 1]; all peer review and credentialing files for all cardiovascular surgeons, interventional radiologists and cardiologists associated with St. John from January 1, 1998 through December 31, 2007; all credentialing and peer review documents and all patient and/or healthcare provider complaints related to Dr. Yousuf; as well as the identification of those with knowledge of the recruitment, interview, credentialing peer review, investigation and/or termination of Dr. Yousuf in his association with St. John. [Dkt. # 300 at 13].

On the immunity issue under HCQIA, St. John focused on: (1) the deposition testimony of physicians and surgeons and excerpts from transcripts of the peer review process show that Dr. Cohlmia's pre-surgical protocol departed from the proper standards of care; (2) St. John suspended Dr. Cohlmia to protect the safety of patients; [26] and (3) St. John's peer review process complied with the requirements of HCQIA. Plaintiffs focused on: (1) the June 26, 2003 memo from Dr. Allred; (2) a comparison of Dr. Cohlmia's Quality Assurance scores with other surgeons; (3) the case of Brown v. Presbyterian Healthcare Services; [23] (4) the timing of Dr. Cohlmia's interest in a speciality heart hospital and St. John's termination of his privileges; (5) plaintiffs' expert opinion that St. John's peer review process was "unwarranted, unfair, unreasonable, incomplete, misleading, inaccurate" and even involved false testimony; [24] (6) a St. John official notifying a Hillcrest official that Dr. Cohlmia's privileges at St. John were summarily suspended; (7) the availability of less severe options to address Dr. Cohlmia's pre-surgical protocol; and (8) Dr. Cohlmia's performance of 34 unchallenged surgeries following the two surgeries at issue. [Dkt. # 451 at 3-75].

On the merits of the antitrust claims, St. John argued: (1) plaintiff did not have standing, (2) the Section I claims failed for lack of a showing of concerted action and market power, and (3) the Section II [*1216] claims failed [27] for lack of showing that St. John posed a "dangerous probability" of achieving market power. Dr. Cohlmia argued that St. John's activity had the following anticompetitive effects: (1) the "diminution of quality" on a patient's choice of surgeons and denial of services to Native Americans, (2) the "retardation of innovation" as speciality heart hospitals are more productive and provide better care, and (3) St. John's sham peer review process. Dr. Cohlmia argued that he was excluded from the market because of: (1) an abusive peer review process which was tantamount to excluding Dr. Cohlmia from the profession as a whole, and (2) his ongoing efforts to secure bank financing and architectural plans for his speciality heart hospital. [Dkt. # 451 at 75-119].

At the conclusion of lengthy arguments, Judge Frizzell granted summary judgment to St. John, finding that it was entitled to immunity under HCQIA. He found that the material facts were not in dispute and that Dr. Cohlmia failed to rebut the presumption of immunity by a preponderance of evidence. Judge Frizzell addressed the significant factual differences supporting the holding in Brown and found it distinguishable and not controlling. [28] [25] [Dkt. # 451 at 120-21].

As to the second motion for summary judgment on the merits of Dr. Cohlima's state and federal antitrust claims, Judge Frizzell found that plaintiff presented "no evidence of antitrust injury." [Dkt. # 451 at 122]. Dr. Cohlmia's loss of privileges at St. John had no impact on market wide prices, or on the quality or quantity of surgical or cardiology services. [Dkt. # 451 at 122]. Judge Frizzell found plaintiff presented "no evidence" of an antitrust injury in fact, because the evidence established that Dr. Cohlmia remained in the marketplace. The time line of events failed to establish that Dr. Cohlmia's interest in developing a specialty [29] heart hospital was causally connected to the termination of privileges at St. John. Dr. Cohlmia is not and was not an appropriate enforcer of the Antitrust Acts, because plaintiffs presented "no connection between the alleged bad act and the alleged antitrust violation in the market." [Dkt. # 451 at 122].

As to alleged concerted action, Judge Frizzell found no violation of Section I of the Sherman Act because plaintiff failed to show a contract or conspiracy between separate entities, and the Act does not reach conduct which is wholly unilateral. [Dkt. # 451 at 123]. Judge Frizzell found that "no reasonable jury could find concerted action with a separate entity or entities here and that plaintiff had not produced the required standard of evidence to show concerted action or conspiracy." [Dkt. # 451 at 123]. Judge Frizzell also found, as to Section I of the Sherman Act, [24] [Dkt. # 451 at 59].

[25] Specifically, Judge Frizzell said, "The evidence of ulterior motive in Brown was direct." In Brown, it was clear that an economic competitor had instigated the review and made false misstatements to the National Practitioner Databank, that the doctor was negligent, that the competitor was the principal witness against the plaintiff, and that there was "overwhelming proof of conjuring up evidence against the doctor." In contrast, Judge Frizzell found the evidence of ulterior motive to be merely "inferential." [Dkt. # 451 at 121].

that plaintiff adduced "no evidence of actual anti-competitive effects" attributed to St. John's conduct, "whether in the form of a market wide increase in price, reduction in output or diminution in the quality of any services." [Dkt. # 451 at 124]. Judge Frizzell found that St. John had only 19.3 percent of the relevant [30] market share in 2006, and that a relatively small market share is indicative of a lack of market power. [26] As to Section 2 of the Sherman Act, [*1217] Judge Frizzell found there was "no evidence other than speculative evidence" that St. John had monopoly power to control prices and to exclude competition. [Dkt. # 451 at 125]. As to the Oklahoma Antitrust Act, Judge Frizzell applied the mandatory provision to construe it consistent with the federal antitrust act. As to the Essential Facilities Doctrine, which is different than the federal antitrust act, Judge Frizzell determined that the doctrine did not apply because of an insufficient number of facilities in the Tulsa market area at the relevant time. Judge Frizzell granted judgment to St. John on the merits of plaintiff's state and federal antitrust claims. [Dkt. # 451 at 125].

Discussion

HCQIA was enacted to encourage peer review in the medical profession. 42 U.S.C. § 11101(3). The statute protects participants in peer review activities from liability [31] for damages stemming from a review, so long as the review satisfies the standards set forth in Section 11112(a). Persons covered under HCQIA include professional review bodies, members and staff of such a body, any person under a contract or other formal agreement with such a body, and any person who participates with or assists such a body with the peer review process. 42 U.S.C. § 11111(a)(1). A "professional review body" is a health care entity, including its governing body or a committee of the medical staff of the entity which assists the governing body in conducting a professional review activity. 42 U.S.C. § 11151(11). Anyone providing information to the peer review body is also protected. 42 U.S.C. § 11111(a)(2). In the event of litigation, if immunity is established, HCQIA provides for an award of attorney fees to covered persons for their participation in the peer review process. The attorney fee provision specifically provides:

> In any suit brought against a defendant, to the extent that a defendant has met the standards set forth under section 11112(a) of this title and the defendant substantially prevails, the court shall, at the conclusion of the action, award to a substantially [32] prevailing party defending against any such claim the cost of the suit attributed to such claim, including a reasonable attorney's fee, if the claim, or the claimant's conduct during the litigation of the claim, was frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation, or in bad faith.

42 U.S.C. § 11113. To recover attorney fees under Section 11113, St. John must meet four requirements. First, St. John must show it is a "covered person" as defined in Section 11111. Second, St. John must show it complied with the standards in Section 11112(a) during the review process. Third, St. John must show that it substantially prevailed on plaintiffs' claims. Fourth, St. John must show that Dr. Cohlmia's claims, or conduct during the litigation, were frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation or in bad faith.

The undersigned first addresses an issue briefed by the parties: whether St. John's entitlement to attorney fees is predicated on the reasonableness of plaintiff's challenge to St. John's affirmative defense of immunity. Put simply, that is not a requirement under Section 11113. The plain language of the statute specifically addresses the reasonableness of plaintiff's claims, not the reasonableness [33] of plaintiff's challenge to a defendant's affirmative defense of immunity. [27] Even [*1218] were a court to look beyond the statute's plain language (which is not necessary), the result would be no different. As noted in Addis v. Holy Cross Health System Corp., 88 F.3d 482 (7th Cir. 1996), Congress passed HCQIA:

[26] For authority that St. John's market share was not sufficient to confer market power, Judge Frizzell cited and relied on Jefferson Parish Hospital District No. 2 v. Hyde, 464 U.S. 808, 104 S. Ct. 58, 78 L. Ed. 2d 76 (1983).

[27] HCQIA, which is designed to protect entities such as St. John from millions of dollars in damages arising out of a properly conducted peer review process, is also designed to protect such entities from needlessly [35] paying smaller amounts to defend itself against unreasonable, unfounded, or frivolous claims.

> to provide incentive and protection for physicians engaging in effective professional peer review. 42 U.S.C. § 11101(5). These incentives were designed to encourage doctors to engage in meaningful peer review in light of the Health Care Act's imposition of intensified reporting requirements. It was Congress' hope that doctors would comply with the reporting requirements installed by the Health Care Act and thereby decrease the number of occurrences of medical malpractice.
> Important elements of this package of incentives were the creation of statutory immunity for those persons and entities engaged in qualified professional peer review, 42 U.S.C. § 11111(a), 11112(a), and a fee-shifting provision designed to deter plaintiffs from filing meritless lawsuits against those persons and entities, 42 U.S.C. § 11113. Thus, 'doctors and hospitals who have acted in accordance with the reasonable [34] belief, due process, and other requirements of the bill are protected from damages sought by a disciplined doctor.'

Id. at 485 (emphasis added). In Addis, the Court held the text of Section 11113 explicitly provides that an award of fees may be appropriate to the extent a defendant prevailed on the plaintiff's claims, and its professional review process met the standards in Section 11112(a). Id. at 486. The Ninth Circuit explained, "[t]he policy behind this provision is clear: Congress wanted to encourage professional peer review by limiting the threat of unreasonable litigation expenses." Smith v. Ricks, 31 F.3d 1478, 1487 (9th Cir. 1994). Thus, St. John's entitlement to attorney fees is not predicated on whether plaintiffs' challenge to its immunity defense was without foundation. Rather, with respect to step 4, the question is whether Dr. Cohlmia's claims, or his litigation conduct in pursuing those claims, were frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation, or in bad faith.

In reviewing the four requirements, a court may analyze the pleadings, exhibits, procedural history, and orders entered in the case. Clearly, St. John is a "professional review body" as defined in Section 11151(11). Dr. Allred and Dr. Burnett, as staff physicians who participated in the review process, are "covered persons" as defined in Section 11111(a)(2). Judge Frizzell found that Dr. Cohlmia did not rebut the presumption of immunity, thereby concluding that St. John met the standards set forth in Section 11112(a). As shown above, St. John substantially prevailed on all counts pled against it in the Second Amended Complaint. Judge Frizzell's order on summary judgment assists in determining the remaining element, whether Dr. Cohlmia's claims or conduct during the litigation were frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation, or in bad faith. The undersigned does not find that Dr. Cohlmia's "conduct" was frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation or in bad faith. The issue remains whether the "claims" asserted by Dr. Cohlmia were frivolous, unreasonable, without foundation, or brought in bad [36] faith.

Judge Frizzell found that St. John was entitled to immunity, and he rejected Dr. Cohlmia's underlying premise that St. John's peer review process was a sham and served as a subterfuge for St. John to deprive him of state protected property rights, thus allowing St. John to commit torts, antitrust, and civil right violations. Moreover, Judge Frizzell found "no evidence" [*1219] to support any of Dr. Cohlmia's claims. The undersigned finds that the claims pled against St. John in the Second Amended Complaint were unreasonable when pled, and were clearly shown to be frivolous in the early stages of the litigation.

St. John conducted a thorough, open, and professional peer review in compliance with its bylaws. Over fourteen physicians testified, documents were exchanged, exhibits offered, the entire proceeding was recorded and transcribed, Dr. Cohlmia was represented by counsel, and the proceeding was held before a retired federal district judge, Thomas Brett. Judge Brett issued a detailed written opinion which was reviewed and approved by St John's Executive Committee and St. John's Board of Trustees. On the other hand, in commencing this action, Dr. Cohlmia made unreasonable accusations [37] that St. John's peer review process was a sham and conducted in bad faith. [28] Thereafter, Dr. Cohlmia tried to show that St. John used its peer review process to run him "out of town" and, purportedly, to "deprive Native Americans of quality health care." Dr. Cohlmia engaged in costly and fruitless discovery, sought unreasonable continuations of discovery deadlines, unreasonably requested leave to conform pleadings to the rules, and even sought an unreasonable last minute supplement hoping to add substance to otherwise conclusory reports from expert witnesses. Judge Frizzell found that plaintiff produced "no evidence" suggesting that St. John was involved in a conspiracy or concerted effort to restrain trade and "no evidence" that St. John had sufficient market share to have even a potential for market power. Judge Frizzell warned Dr. Cohlmia early on that St. John was one of many hospitals in Tulsa and that he had some serious hurdles to cross in establishing antitrust liability. Ignoring indicators that his case against St. John lacked substance, Dr. Cohlmia plowed ahead seeking additional discovery and disregarding the mounting costs of litigation.

Dr. Cohlmia's claim against St. John for defamation fell outside the statute of limitations. Early in the proceeding, Judge Payne characterized the allegations supporting Dr. Cohlmia's Section 1981 claim as "largely unsupported, if not nonsensical." At the pleading stage, Judge Payne dismissed with prejudice plaintiff's claim for intentional infliction of emotional distress. Judge Frizzell granted St. John summary judgment on plaintiff's claim for tortious interference with contract. Finally, Judge Frizzell not only found that St. John was entitled to immunity, which of itself would have ended this litigation, but he went on to find there was no evidence to support Dr. Cohlmia's antitrust allegations.

At the hearing before the undersigned, Dr. Cohlmia argued that his claims were not unreasonable or frivolous, because the peer review process was tainted with irregularities. Plaintiff argued that no cardiovasular surgeon was asked to review the two surgeries in question. However, in Brown, the case plaintiff relies on, the Tenth Circuit was critical of the fact that a competitor of Dr. Brown's [39] testified against her. The use of a cardiovascular surgeon in this case likely would have been a direct competitor of Dr. Cohlmia. In any event, Judge Frizzell found no such taint. Dr. Cohlmia relied on the June 26, 2003 memo prepared by Dr. Allred as proof that Dr. Cohlmia's summary suspension had "nothing to do with patient care" but was motivated [*1220] by a desire to eliminate the treatment of Native Americans at St. John's surgical facilities. Judge Frizzell rejected this argument. The undersigned also finds no merit to plaintiff's contention that the June 26 memo establishes that plaintiff's case was reasonably filed. The memorandum, which was obtained in discovery, by its very language, supports St. John's claim that it summarily suspended Dr. Cohlmia out of concern for patient care, because: (1) Dr. Cohlmia failed to follow proper pre-surgical protocol, and (2) Dr. Cohlmia had three times the mortality rate compared to other cardiovascular surgeons. In the memo, Dr. Allred expresses concern that Dr. Cohlmia was operating on patients:

> without any other consultation. He only gets consultations afterwards when it is appropriate or necessary for the patient. I reassured Dr. De Leon that [40] I am aware of this being a significant problem and that we will monitor closely. It is very difficult to remove someone from the staff once they have full privileges. He has been on the staff since 1985, being brought in by Dr. Loughridge, hailed as a 'superb addition to the CV staff.' Unfortunately this has not proved to be correct. I've talked to Dr. Raines about this and they are aware that his mortality rate is three times the mortality rate of the rest of the group. They average 2-3% with his being 9.8 range. This is indeed intolerable.

[Dkt. # 414, Ex.7].

Dr. Cohlmia claims his reliance on the facts of Brown shows his case was reasonable. However, as Judge Frizzell pointed out, the facts in Brown are distinguishable. Dr. Brown's case involved a direct financial competitor assisting in submitting a false report to the National Practitioner Data Bank stating that Dr. Brown had been found by the hospital to be negligent, incompetent, and guilty of malpractice. After Dr. Brown notified the Data Bank that the report was false, the hospital was notified and given an opportunity to amend the data bank report, which it declined to do. At no time had the review panel or the hospital Board [41] of Trustees found that Dr. Brown was negligent, incompetent, or guilty of malpractice. Also, Dr. Brown sufficiently established damages caused by the interference with her attempt to hire an associate to join her practice. Id. at 1327-8, 1330-1334. In this instance, St. John accurately reported the findings made by Judge Brett, as confirmed by the hospital administration, and Dr. Cohlmia transitioned to a successful relationship with a hospital in Tahlequah. Dr. Cohlmia failed to show any intentionally false statements and resulting damage.

Dr. Cohlmia also argued his claims were reasonable because St. John failed to consult with him prior to his summary suspension. However, St. John had no legal duty to consult with Dr. Cohlmia. His counsel reluctantly admitted this fact, but argued it would be a fairer practice for St. John to do so. Plaintiff further argued that its case was reasonable because Quality Assurance ("QA") reviewed the two cases which gave rise to Dr. Cohlmia's suspension. One case was assigned a four which means "practice unacceptable and potential harm to patient" and the other was given a three which is "variance from the usual standard of care and represents opportunity [42] to improve care." Dr. Cohlmia argued that there were several other physicians with poorer ratings whose medical privileges were not terminated. This argument has no merit. See, e.g., Smith v. Ricks, 31 F.3d 1478 (9th Cir. 1994). In Smith, Dr. Smith, a cardiologist, filed suit after the defendant hospital terminated his medical staff privileges because of poor judgment and inadequate treatment. Dr. Smith sought damages under the Sherman Antitrust Act, contending the hospital and physicians used the peer review process to [*1221] monopolize the market and to conspire against him to restrain trade. Dr. Smith's only challenge to the hospital's investigation was that he was not permitted to discover or introduce evidence regarding the conduct of other doctors. The court stated: "Dr. Smith essentially claims he was not the worst doctor at Good Samaritan. However, nothing in the statute, legislative history, or case law suggests the competency of other doctors is relevant in evaluating whether Good Samaritan conducted a reasonable investigation into Dr. Smith's conduct." Id. at 1486. The undersigned finds this reasoning to be sound and applicable here.

As to his claim that St. John and Hillcrest conspired [43] to terminate his privileges, Dr. Cohlmia argued that the claim was reasonable because of his outspoken criticism of Dr. Yousuf. [29] This argument fails as well. Dr. Cohlmia was provided a full due process hearing at St. John thus providing him a fair forum to assert this claim. No subterfuge is shown by the proceeding or by the hearing examiner, Judge Brett. Other arguments made by plaintiff at the hearing were equally without merit.

Plaintiff claimed that the shear volume of discovery and pleadings filed in the case are evidence his claims were reasonable. This argument is meaningless in light of the generous scope of discovery permitted in this case, with an end result that plaintiff presented "no evidence" to support his claims. Plaintiff argued that Judge Frizzell's statement complimenting counsel on their performance during the litigation is indicative that plaintiff's case was reasonable. [30] This argument also lacks merit. Zealous representation of a client can occur even if a claim is frivolous, [44] unreasonable, or lacks foundation.

For the foregoing reasons, the undersigned finds that Dr. Cohlmia's claims were unreasonable and without foundation at the onset of the case, as discovery developed, and ultimately through the granting of judgment on the merits four years later.

Reasonable Attorney Fees

In its motion for attorney fees filed on August 31, 2009, St. John requested fees and expenses in the amount of $973,601.25 under HCQIA on the basis that Dr. Cohlmia's challenge to St. John's HCQIA defense was without foundation and unreasonable. In the alternative, St. John sought attorney fees under HCQIA on the basis that Dr. Cohlmia's tortious interference and state and federal antitrust claims were without foundation and unreasonable. [Dkt. # 458 at 2, 9]. In its supplemental brief filed on December 17, 2010, St. John reserved the right to argue for an award of attorney fees on all claims brought by [45] Dr. Cohlmia and in asserting its affirmative defense of HCQIA immunity. [Dkt. # 518 at 2].

By affidavit, Michael Lewis attests that he and his law firm Doerner, Saunders, Daniel & Anderson served as lead counsel for St. John. [Dkt. # 458, Ex. 1, Att. 1]. Mr. Lewis states his law firm maintained daily chronological time sheets with summaries of the legal services it rendered. Doerner, Saunders, Daniel & Anderson seeks $765,824.00 in fees and expenses which it billed to St. John. Id. By affidavit, James Connor, Jr. attests that he and his [*1222] law firm Richards & Connor were hired by St. John in this case. [Dkt. # 458, Ex. 2, Att. 1]. Mr. Connor states that his [29] This argument fails at the attorney fee stage of the proceeding, because plaintiff is essentially attempting to relitigate the issue of immunity which was resolved by Judge Frizzell.

[30] Judge Frizzell made the following statement immediately prior to announcing his decision granting judgment to St. John: "First, I'd like to say that the advocacy on both sides here has been just extraordinarily good and I appreciate it very much from all of you." [Dkt. # 529, Ex. C].

law firm maintained daily chronological time sheets with summaries of legal services rendered. Richards & Connor seeks $207,777.50 in fees and expenses which it billed to St. John. The two law firms seek attorney fees for the combined work of 22 lawyers, 6 paralegals, and 4 summer clerks. Of the 22 lawyers representing St John, two served as trial lawyers and lead counsel, four served as healthcare lawyers, one served as an employment lawyer, eight served as general litigation lawyers, three served as complex litigation lawyers, one [46] as a trial lawyer, one as an appellate lawyer, one as a land use lawyer, and one as a lawyer specializing in Native American law. [Dkt. # 518, Ex. A]. Doerner, Saunders, Daniel & Anderson filed a 177-page billing statement and Richard & Connor filed an 87-page billing statement. The undersigned has reviewed, in detail, each of these statements.

Dr. Cohlmia opposes St. John's motion for attorney fees arguing that his claims were not frivolous or unreasonable. Alternatively, Dr. Cohlmia challenges the attorney fees and expenses on general grounds of excessive billing and duplication of effort.

Both parties assert that factors set forth in Burk v. City of Oklahoma City, 1979 OK 115, 598 P.2d 659, 661 (Okla. 1970) should be considered in determining the reasonableness of the amount of fees requested. Under Burk, a court is to consider the hourly rate times the number of hours reasonably spent to determine a lodestar of the fee determination, and a court may increase or decrease fees by considering certain enumerated factors. See also Morgan v. Galilean Health Enterprises, Inc., 1998 OK 130, 977 P.2d 357, 364 (Okla. 1998). Those factors include time and labor required; novelty and difficulty of the questions presented; [47] skill requisite to perform the legal service properly; the preclusion of other employment caused by accepting the case; the customary fee; whether the fee is fixed or contingent; time limitations; the amount involved and the results obtained; the undesirability of the case; the nature and length of the professional relationship; and awards in similar cases. Id. at 661-62.

Dr. Cohlmia's counsel advised that except for the hourly rate attributed to certain paralegal work, Dr. Cohlmia does not contest the hourly rate charged by the attorneys for St. John. [31] Rather, Dr. Cohlmia enumerated specific objections to the amount of time sought in St. John's fee request. The undersigned will first address those objections.

Dr. Cohlmia challenges the reasonableness of billing full hourly rates for travel time, a sum of $13,000.00. The undesigned agrees, but only because St. John failed to show that these fees were reasonably incurred or necessary. Dr. Cohlmia challenges the reasonableness of assessing fees for St. John's challenge to plaintiff's motion to compel. [48] Plaintiff assigns $20,750.00 for this activity. The undersigned agrees, because St. John continued to pursue a peer review privilege after the issue was determined by Judge Payne.

Dr. Cohlmia challenges approximately $17,126.00 in billings for paralegal time in coding at an hourly rate of $95.00, claiming $50.00 per hour is reasonable. The undersigned agrees that coding is not necessarily a legal skill and the amount requested will be reduced by $8,563.00. [32] Dr. Cohlmia challenges the [*1223] reasonableness of $4,700.00 in billings for preparation of a joint defense agreement. The undersigned finds the amount unreasonable, however the defense agreement resulted in some cost savings in attorney fees for duplicated work. The undersigned will reduce that amount by $2,700.00. Dr. Cohlmia challenges the duplication in work performed by attorneys with Doerner, Saunders, Daniel & Anderson and those with Richards & Connor. Mr. Lewis' firm was hired to defend the antitrust claims, and Mr. Connor's firm was hired for its expertise in cardiothoracic medicine. Dr. Cohlmia does not assign a dollar value to this objection, accordingly its denied. In addition, the undersigned finds the allocation of work [49] between the two firms to be reasonable.

Dr. Cohlmia objects to duplicate billings for communications between attorneys in the same law firm, in house emails, in-house conferences and conferences with co-counsel and for activities not traditionally associated with legal work. Dr. Cohlmia asserts that 20 percent of the billings are for these activities. The undersigned disagrees that billing for inter-office communications and communications with co-counsel is necessarily unreasonable. Such communications are often necessary and can lead to efficiencies in the distribution and provision of legal services. Nonetheless, such fees are subject to abuse and should be supported by specific explanations or more detailed time sheets allowing a ready determination of the benefit of such communications in each instance. Such support was not always present here. In addition, the undersigned finds merit in Dr. Cohlmia's [50] argument that some of the billed time was for activities not traditionally associated with legal work. Thus, the amount claimed has been reduced by an additional 10 percent. A sum of $97,360.13.

[31] Except as set forth below, the undersigned finds that the hourly rates charged by St. John's counsel, including paralegals, was reasonable.

[32] There is, however, no requirement for the court to identify each hour reasonably expended by each timekeeper, nor is there any requirement that the court announce what hours are permitted for each legal task. See Case v. Unified School District No. 233, 157 F.3d 1243 (10th Cir. 1998).

Dr. Cohlmia objects to the $2,400.00 claimed for the work of summer clerks. The undersigned disagrees that billing for the work of summer clerks is necessarily unreasonable. Summer clerks can, sometimes, provide quality legal work at an hourly rate that is far less than a client would pay if the work were performed by an attorney. Such work, however, is generally not performed as efficiently as it would be by an attorney and must be more strictly scrutinized by a supervising attorney. It is difficult, with the information supplied, to determine whether such scrutiny actually occurred here. The undersigned finds that 50% of the time claimed for work of summer clerks is reasonable and, thus, will reduce this amount by one-half, or $1,200.00.

Dr. Cohlmia objects that three of St. John's attorneys separately billed their full hourly rate for attending a full day of depositions of Dr. Allred, Dr. Cohlmia, and Dr. Landgartner. In a case of this size that involves at least three highly specialized areas [51] (thoracic surgery, HCQIA, and antitrust), it is not presumptively unreasonable to have three attorneys present at critical depositions. Moreover, plaintiff did not furnish the undersigned with a dollar value for this objection, accordingly, and in light of the affidavits supplied by St. John's counsel, it is denied. Dr. Cohlmia further claims that attorney fees should be excluded for any deposition not used or cited in preparation of St. John's motions for summary judgement. The undersigned rejects the notion that only the cost of discovery which was used to support a successful dispositive motion is recoverable, particularly since plaintiff fails to show [*1224] that the subject depositions were unnecessary and places no dollar value on this objection.

Dr. Cohlmia objects to attorney fees claimed for defending against plaintiff's antitrust claims, arguing that St. John adopted the briefs filed by Womble, Carlyle, Sandridge & Rice, a law firm in North Carolina, specifically attorney Mark Horoscak, whose expertise is antitrust law. However, adopting the briefs of Mr. Horoscak likely saved St. John, and now plaintiff, substantial attorney fees. In addition, the fact that Mr. Horoscak prepared [52] the briefing did not reduce the obligation of St. John's counsel to be informed of, and to participate in, its potential defenses to the antitrust claims, particularly since St. John was the sole remaining defendant at the time of the summary judgment hearing before Judge Frizzell. Knowledge of the content of these briefs was essential in preparing for the hearing. The undersigned denies this objection.

Dr. Cohlmia also challenges the "exorbitant number of timekeepers, use of block and/or indecipherable billing entries," and the excessive and unrealistic number of hours claimed. [Dkt. # 529 at 27-28]. Dr. Cohlmia does not assign a dollar value to these objections. In response, St. John asserts that 90.3 percent of the legal work performed by Doerner, Saunders, Daniel & Anderson was performed by Mr. Lewis as lead counsel; Hilary Velandia as a healthcare lawyer; Marilyn Schooling as lead paralegal and William Spitler for general litigation. The undersigned finds some validity to Dr. Cohlmia's objection. Accordingly, to accommodate this objection, the undersigned will reduce the fees requested by 10 percent to eliminate fees not attributed to principal timekeepers and block billing, a [53] reduction of $97,360.13. Those objections which fail to specify a dollar value are denied for lack of sufficient evidence (again, in light of St. John's counsel's affidavits).

Finally, the undersigned RECOMMENDS that St. John's request for leave to file supplemental attorney fees in its pursuit of an attorney fee award be denied. Based on the undersigned's detailed review of the time records presented, consideration of the Burk factors, and review of the entire docket, the recommended fee award reflects a reasonable fee for the services provided by St. John's counsel in this litigation, taking into account its efforts on the pending motion.

Recommendation

In consideration of the objection filed and supported by Dr. Cohlmia, the undersigned RECOMMENDS that St. John be awarded $732,668.00 in attorney fees as prevailing party in this action pursuit to 42 U.S.C. § 11113.

Objection

In accordance with 28 U.S.C. § 636(b) a party may file specific written objections to this report and recommendation. Such specific written objections must be filed with the Clerk of the District Court for the Northern District of Oklahoma by February 3, 2012.

If specific written objections are timely filed, Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b) [54] directs the district judge to:

> determine de novo any part of the magistrate judge's disposition that has been properly objected to. The district judge may accept, reject, or modify the recommended disposition; receive further evidence; or return the matter to the magistrate judge with instructions.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 72(b); see also 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1).

The Tenth Circuit has adopted a "firm waiver rule" which "provides that the failure to make timely objections to the magistrate's findings or recommendations [*1225] waives appellate review of factual and legal questions." United States v. One Parcel of Real Property, 73 F.3d 1057, 1059 (10th Cir. 1996) (quoting Moore v. United States, 950 F.2d 656, 659 (10th Cir. 1991)). Only a timely specific objection will preserve an issue for de novo review by the district court or for appellate review.

SUBMITTED THIS 20th day of January, 2012.

HN1[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) requires that any proposed class action: (1) be sufficiently numerous; (2) involve questions of law or fact common to the class; (3) involve class plaintiffs whose claims are typical of those of the class; and (4) involve a class representative or representatives who adequately represent the interests of the class. Courts commonly use a shorthand summary to describe these requirements, referring to the four prongs simply as numerosity, commonality, typicality, and adequacy. In addition to satisfying each of the four prerequisites listed in Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a), a party seeking class certification must satisfy one of the subsections of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b).

Plaintiffs seek to certify a class pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) must show that questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members and that a class action is superior to other available methods for adjudicating the controversy. Plaintiffs seek to certify a class pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) must show that a party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole.

HN2[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Regardless of whether class certification is contested, a court may not certify a putative class unless it has performed a rigorous analysis and determined that each of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23's requirements has been met. As part of this analysis, the court must assess all relevant evidence admitted at the class certification stage and resolve any relevant factual disputes, even if this requires a determination of issues that go to the merits of the case.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Evidence > Burdens of Proof > Preponderance of Evidence

HN3[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The party moving for class certification bears the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that each of the requirements of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 has been met. Despite a district court's obligation to carefully analyze each prong of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 before granting class certification, the Second Circuit has emphasized that Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 should be given liberal rather than restrictive construction and has shown a general preference for granting rather than denying class certification.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Numerosity

HN4[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

To satisfy the numerosity requirement, plaintiff must show that the putative class is so numerous that joinder of all members would be impracticable. Fed R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1). Although the numerosity requirement imposes no absolute limitations and requires a case-by-case analysis of the facts, courts within the Second Circuit generally presume that joinder of all putative class members is impracticable if the class has more than 40 members.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Commonality

HN5[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Commonality

Although some courts tend to merge Fed. R. Civ. P. 23's commonality prong with the typicality prong, the commonality requirement is distinct from typicality in that it tests the definition of the class itself rather than focusing on the relationship between the putative class representative and the other class members. Under commonality, the class definition is tested to ensure that the class members' claims depend on a common contention that is of such a nature that it is capable of class wide resolution. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a)(2), read literally, requires only that a class share common questions of law or fact. What matters under the commonality requirement is not the raising of common questions—even in droves—but, rather, the capacity of a classwide proceeding to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation. A single common question of law or fact may suffice to satisfy this requirement if the question is capable of giving rise to a common answer through a class action.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN6[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

The adequacy requirement focuses on the fitness of purported class representatives to competently discharge the responsibility of litigating the case on behalf of absent class members. Under this prong of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a), a court must ensure that the putative representatives possess the same interests and suffer the same injuries as the class members.Although it is important for a court to thoroughly vet any putative class representative, a court must be wary of a defendant's efforts to defeat representation of a class on grounds of inadequacy where the effect of an inadequacy finding would be to eliminate any class representation.

HN7[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

A class representative is not adequate unless it is a member of the class it purports to represent. This requirement is evident from the opening sentence of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23, which explains that one or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all members. Once it is determined that a putative representative is indeed a class member, courts generally focus the adequacy analysis on three primary areas of concern. First, the named plaintiff must demonstrate that class counsel is qualified, experienced, and generally able to conduct the litigation. Second, the named plaintiff must show that there is no conflict of interest between the named plaintiffs and other members of the plaintiff class. Finally, a named plaintiff must exhibit enough integrity and credibility to convince the court that the named plaintiff will diligently perform its fiduciary duties to the class.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

HN8[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

As a general rule, indirect purchasers may not recover damages for monopolistic overcharges under federal antitrust law.

Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Monopolies & Monopolization > Actual Monopolization > Claims

HN9[] Actual Monopolization, Claims

The ownership or control exception to the Illinois Brick rule is now firmly established and has been expanded to include instances where the defendant owns or controls the intermediary that sold the goods to the indirect-purchaser plaintiff. Despite this minor expansion, however, courts remain conscious that the exceptions to the Illinois Brick rule are few and far between. A narrow construction of the ownership or control exception has led courts to apply it only when the relationship between the defendant and the middleman involves such functional economic or other unity that there effectively has been only one sale between the defendant and the indirect purchaser. A plaintiff seeking to gain the benefit of this exception must therefore present facts demonstrating that such unity exists and may not rely simply on the existence of a parent-subsidiary relationship. Crucially, this exception is available only if the plaintiff shows that the defendant has such control over the subsidiary that the defendant can be said to have set prices along the chain of distribution.

HN10[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

A putative representative cannot adequately protect the class if his interests are antagonistic to or in conflict with the objectives of those he purports to represent. However, a conflict of interest will not destroy adequacy under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23 unless the conflict is fundamental and concrete; conflicts that are merely speculative should be disregarded at the class certification stage.

HN11[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Because class representatives have a duty to guard the interests of the class, a court should deny class certification if the putative representative is not honest or ethical enough to adequately discharge this fiduciary duty. However, this inquiry into the representative's integrity is not an examination into his or her moral righteousness but, rather, is an inquiry directed at improper or questionable conduct arising out of or touching upon the very prosecution of the lawsuit. Because integrity considerations are restricted to their relevance to issues in the litigation, courts in the Second Circuit disregard ad hominem attacks that call the putative representative's character into question over incidents unrelated to the case before the court.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN12[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Typicality

The typicality criterion does not require complete symmetry between the class representative's claims and those of the absent class members. Rather, the named plaintiff must simply raise claims that arise from the same course of events as the class claims and make similar legal arguments to prove defendant's liability.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN13[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Typicality

In general, typicality is lacking when a putative class representative would be subject to unique defenses that threaten to become the focus of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN14[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Class representative status may properly be denied where the proposed representative has no meaningful commitment to the litigation and virtually no knowledge or understanding of the key litigation issues, but the Second Circuit has expressed a general disfavor of attacks on the adequacy of a class representative based on the representative's ignorance. Courts in the Second Circuit therefore deny class certification due to the putative representative's ignorance only when the ignorance is so profound that the class representative would be unable or unwilling to protect the interests of the class against the possibly competing interests of the attorneys. A proposed representative can avoid such a fate simply by showing a willingness and ability to pursue the litigation on behalf of the class and a basic understanding of the litigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN15[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

It is hornbook law that, in a complex lawsuit, the class representative need not have extensive knowledge of the facts of the case in order to be an adequate representative.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

HN16[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

Counsel's decision to advance litigation costs in a class action case is typical and proper. In fact, courts have explicitly recognized that this common practice facilitates Fed. R. Civ. P. 23's goals by allowing individuals to initiate important lawsuits that may otherwise have been prohibitively costly. This is even true in the context of securities litigation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN17[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3), plaintiffs must show that questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members and that a class action is superior to other available methods" for adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) permits class certification for cases in which a class action would achieve economies of time, effort, and expense and promote uniformity of decision as to persons similarly situated. The goal of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) is to provide vindication of the rights of groups of people who individually would be without effective strength to bring their opponents into court at all. The predominance requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) tests whether the proposed class is sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation. This criterion is satisfied if resolution of some of the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member's case as a genuine controversy can be achieved through generalized proof and if these particular issues are more substantial than the issues subject only to individualized proof.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Predominance

HN18[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Predominance

The existence of individual defenses will not defeat predominance if a sufficient constellation of common issues binds class members together. Where a class is united by common issues of law and fact that are determinative of liability and causation, that is more than sufficient to satisfy predominance.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN19[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Superiority

The superiority requirement of Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3) is frequently satisfied when it would be prohibitively expensive for class members with small claims to proceed individually.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Superiority

HN20[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Superiority

Factors relevant to a finding of superiority include the manageability of a class action and the desirability of litigating the claims in a particular forum.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Typicality

HN21[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Typicality

A putative class representative need not be a heavy-weight in its industry to satisfy the typicality prong; the relevant inquiry is simply whether absent class members' interests are advanced by the prosecution of the representative's claim.

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Balance of Hardships

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Irreparable Harm

Civil Procedure > ... > Injunctions > Grounds for Injunctions > Public Interest

HN22[] Grounds for Injunctions, Balance of Hardships

A plaintiff seeking a permanent injunction must ordinarily demonstrate that: (1) plaintiff has suffered an irreparable injury; (2) remedies available at law are inadequate to compensate for that injury; (3) an equitable remedy is warranted after consideration of the balance of hardships; and (4) the public interest would not be disserved by a permanent injunction.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

HN23[] Remedies, Injunctions

Section 16 of the Clayton Act provides that a plaintiff may sue to enjoin any threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws. 15 U.S.C.S. § 26. Accordingly held that a § 16 plaintiff need not demonstrate actual loss; he need only demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws or from a contemporary violation likely to continue or recur.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

HN24[] Remedies, Injunctions

While a plaintiff seeking injunctive relief for an alleged antitrust violation must demonstrate a threat of injury and while this is a threshold requirement that is appropriately addressed at the class certification stage, this injury need not be demonstrable as an accrued—or even prospective—loss of profits. Instead, plaintiff must simply show a threat of injury of the type the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

HN25[] Remedies, Injunctions

The antitrust laws were enacted for the protection of competition, and a lessening of competition is precisely the kind of irreparable injury that injunctive relief under § 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 26, was intended to prevent. When a purchase is made after a simulated competition at a price fixed by a trust in excess of the natural market price, the buyer has suffered an antitrust injury.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Clayton Act > Remedies > Injunctions

HN26[] Remedies, Injunctions

The purpose of § 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C.S. § 26, is to provide courts with a flexible mechanism with which to serve the high purpose of enforcing the antitrust laws. Since courts need not precisely calculate the economic injury inflicted by an artificial price when granting injunctive relief, there is certainly no reason to do so at the class certification stage. The standard for demonstrating antitrust injury under § 16 is accordingly less stringent than the standard for demonstrating antitrust injury in a suit seeking damages.

HN27[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

The Second Circuit recently held that a conflict posed by dual representation does not justify refusing to certify a class where the conflict is potential rather than actual and where the district court could revisit the issue and de-certify the class if a true conflict ever manifested. A conflict of interest will not defeat class certification unless it is fundamental. In other words, a conflict undermines adequacy only if it presents antagonistic interests that go to the heart of the litigation, relating to the subject matter of the suit.

Civil Procedure > ... > Class Actions > Prerequisites for Class Action > Adequacy of Representation

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Res Judicata

HN28[] Prerequisites for Class Action, Adequacy of Representation

A final judgment on the merits generally precludes a plaintiff from bringing a new lawsuit raising issues that could have been litigated in the first suit but were not. Some courts have held that a class representative who splits the claims of absent class members—thereby exposing their non-litigated claims to foreclosure through claim preclusion—is inadequate to represent the class. However, participation in a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) class seeking injunctive relief does not ordinarily preclude absent class members from bringing their non-litigated claims in subsequent lawsuits.

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Res Judicata

HN29[] Special Proceedings, Class Actions

A class action judgment binds the class members as to matters actually litigated but does not resolve any claim based on individual circumstances that was not addressed in the class action. Moreover, every federal court of appeals that has considered the question has held that a class action seeking only declaratory or injunctive relief does not bar subsequent individual suits for damages.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > Certification of Classes

Civil Procedure > Judgments > Preclusion of Judgments > Res Judicata

HN30[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

In the Second Circuit, membership in a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) class does not bar a member's subsequent claims for damages. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) does not provide an opportunity for class members to opt out and does not even oblige a district court to afford class members notice of the action; due process therefore requires that class certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) be granted only if broad, class-wide injunctive or declaratory relief is necessary to redress a group-wide injury. Damages claims usually require individualized analyses of class members' circumstances and thus tend to destroy class certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2).

HN31[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Although Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(a) contains no express requirement regarding ascertainability, courts within the Second Circuit have held that the rule impliedly prohibits certification of a class that is not identifiable by reference to objective criteria. When a class definition includes a subjective criterion, such as state of mind, the class is not ascertainable and should not be certified. When the class definition consists entirely of objective criteria, a court need only determine whether it would be administratively feasible to determine whether or not any given entity belongs to the class. Although a class is not ascertainable if determining class membership would require a mini-hearing on the merits of each case,a class is not rendered unascertainable merely because an analysis of data is necessary to determine class membership.

HN32[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

The ascertainability requirement is less important in a Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) class since a chief objective of this rule is to provide broad injunctive relief to large and amorphous classes not capable of certification under Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3).

HN33[] Class Actions, Certification of Classes

Class certification pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) is appropriate when the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole. The justification for allowing certification of such claims is that the relief sought must perforce affect the entire class at once. Differences between the extent of harm suffered by each class member do not make Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2) certification inappropriate.

Opinion

[*96] MEMORANDUM DECISION AND ORDER

Cogan, District Judge.

Plaintiffs are suing Chinese vitamin C manufacturers for allegedly violating Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1, by engaging in a cartel to fix prices and limit the output of vitamin C exported to the United States. The four main defendants are Hebei [8] Welcome Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd.; Jiangsu Jiangshan Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd.; Northeast Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd.; and Weisheng Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd. (collectively "defendants"). Plaintiffs The Ranis Company ("Ranis") and Magno-Humphries Laboratories, Inc. ("MHL") move for class certification on behalf of a group of direct purchasers seeking treble damages against all defendants except Northeast Pharmaceutical Co. Ltd. ("Northeast"). Plaintiff Animal Science Products, Inc., ("Animal Science") has moved separately for certification of a class of direct and indirect purchasers seeking injunctive relief against all defendants, including Northeast. Defendants opposed [*97] both motions for class certification. For the reasons stated below, I grant class certification on behalf of a damages class represented by Ranis, but I determine that MHL cannot serve as class representative because it is not a member of the class it seeks to represent. I also grant certification of an injunction class represented by Animal Science.

BACKGROUND

Ranis and Animal Science commenced this action on January 26, 2005. Related actions were subsequently filed in other districts, and all of these cases were eventually coordinated [9] by the Judicial Panel for Multidistrict Litigation and transferred to this Court for pretrial proceedings. In April, 2007, Ranis and Animal Science moved separately for class certification under Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Both putative classes are represented by the same counsel.

Ranis seeks to represent a class composed of purchasers who bought vitamin C directly from the defendants during the class period (the "Damages Class"). The only relief sought by this putative class is damages. The exact class definition is as follows:

> All persons or entities, or assignees of such persons or entities, who directly purchased vitamin C for delivery in the United States, other than pursuant to a contract containing an arbitration clause, from any of Defendants or their co-conspirators, other than Northeast Pharmaceutical (Group) Co. Ltd., from December 1, 2001 to the present. Excluded from the proposed class are all governmental entities, Defendants, their co-conspirators, and their respective subsidiaries or affiliates.

Animal Science seeks to represent a class composed of purchasers who bought vitamin C manufactured by the defendants, regardless of whether the vitamin C was [10] purchased directly from the defendant or through an intermediary (the "Injunction Class"). This putative class seeks only injunctive relief. The exact class definition is as follows:

> All persons or entities, or assignees of such persons or entities, who purchased vitamin C manufactured by Defendants for delivery in the United States, other than pursuant to a contract with a Defendant containing an arbitration clause, requiring injunctive relief against Defendants to end Defendants' antitrust violations.

Defendants opposed Ranis's motion for class certification primarily on the basis of Ranis's adequacy to serve as class representative. Defendants' chief concern is that Ranis is not presently, and has never been, involved in the vitamin C business. Instead, Ranis purchased this antitrust claim from The Graymor Chemical Company ("Graymor") for $100 and is not currently engaged in any business aside from prosecuting Graymor's claim. Defendants question the motives behind the assignment of Graymor's claim and argue that assignees may not serve as class representatives. Defendants further argue that Ranis and putative class counsel have conflicts of interest with other class members; have [11] made decisions that are contrary to the class's interests; and lack the requisite integrity and candor to represent absent class members.

Before briefing was complete on Ranis's motion to certify the Damages Class, however, counsel for Ranis informed defendants of counsel's intention to add a second plaintiff as putative class representative in this action. On September 27, 2007, plaintiffs amended the complaint to add MHL as a plaintiff and the company from which MHL bought vitamin C — JSPC America, Inc. ("JSPCA") — as a defendant.[1] The parties were then permitted to supplement their class certification briefing to address this new putative class representative. Defendants' supplemental opposition to class certification again focused on the adequacy of Ranis and MHL to represent the class.

In their supplemental opposition to certification of the Damages Class, defendants argued that JSPCA, a subsidiary of defendant Jiangsu Jiangshan Pharmaceutical Co., Ltd. ("Jiangsu"), [12] was not part of the price-fixing conspiracy and should therefore be dismissed [*98] from the case. Moreover, defendants argued that MHL — who did not purchase from any defendant other than JSPCA — should be deemed an indirect purchaser and prohibited from joining a class of direct purchasers.[2] After briefing was complete on the issue of class certification, JSPCA moved for summary judgment. On December 27, 2011, I granted JSPCA's motion and dismissed it from the case, finding that JSPCA was legally incapable of having conspired with Jiangsu or the other defendants in this action.

Defendants also opposed Animal Science's motion to certify the Injunction Class. Once again, defendants' attacks focus on the adequacy of Animal Science to serve as class representative. Defendants' primary arguments are that that Animal Science and class counsel suffer from various conflicts of interest and have demonstrated a willingness to sacrifice important class interests.

Although briefing related to class certification [13] was complete in early 2008, a decision on this motion was reserved pending defendants' omnibus motion for summary judgment. On September 6, 2011, I rejected defendants' contention that the Chinese government had compelled the price-fixing conspiracy and accordingly denied defendants' motion for summary judgment.

DISCUSSION

HN1[] Rule 23(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure requires that any proposed class action: "(1) be sufficiently numerous, (2) involve questions of law or fact common to the class, (3) involve class plaintiffs whose claims are typical of those of the class, and (4) involve a class representative or representatives who adequately represent the interests of the class." Myers v. Hertz Corp., 624 F.3d 537, 547 (2d Cir. 2010). Courts commonly use a shorthand summary to describe these requirements, referring to the four prongs simply as "numerosity,"

[1] Legend Ingredients Group, Inc., was also added as a defendant, but the claims against this defendant were voluntarily withdrawn on June 20, 2008, allegedly because this defendant began "providing cooperation to Plaintiffs."

[2] Defendants have other reasons for arguing that MHL is inadequate; since I find this ground to be dispositive on the issue of MHL's adequacy, however, I will not address defendants' other arguments.

"commonality," "typicality," and "adequacy." See, e.g., Gen. Tel. Co. of the Sw v. Falcon, 457 U.S. 147, 161, 102 S. Ct. 2364, 72 L. Ed. 2d 740 (1982).

In addition to satisfying each of the four prerequisites listed in Rule 23(a), a party seeking class certification must satisfy one of the subsections of Rule 23(b). Plaintiffs seek to certify [14] the Damages Class pursuant to subsection 23(b)(3) and must therefore show that "questions of law or fact common to class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods" for adjudicating the controversy. Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(3). Plaintiffs seek to certify the Injunction Class pursuant to subsection 23(b)(2) and must therefore show that "the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2).

HN2[] Regardless of whether class certification is contested, a court may not certify a putative class unless it has performed a "rigorous analysis" and determined that each of Rule 23's requirements has been met. Falcon, 457 U.S. at 161. As part of this analysis, the court must assess all relevant evidence admitted at the class certification stage and resolve any relevant factual disputes, even if this requires a determination of issues that go to the merits of the case. See In re Initial Pub. Offering Sec. Litig., 471 F.3d 24, 41-42 (2d Cir. 2006).

HN3[] The [15] party moving for class certification "bears the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that each of Rule 23's requirements has been met." Myers, 624 F.3d at 547; accord Teamsters Local 445 Freight Div. Pension Fund v. Bombardier, Inc., 546 F.3d 196, 202 (2d Cir. 2008). Despite this Court's obligation to carefully analyze each prong of Rule 23 before granting class certification, "the Second Circuit has emphasized that Rule 23 should be 'given liberal rather than restrictive construction'" and has shown a "general preference" for granting rather than denying class certification. Gortat v. Capala Bros., 257 F.R.D. 353, 361 [*99] (E.D.N.Y. 2009) (quoting Marisol A. v. Giuliani, 126 F.3d 372, 377 (2d Cir. 1997)).

1. THE DAMAGES CLASS

I. Rule 23(a)'s Requirements — Numerosity, Commonality, Adequacy, and Typicality

A. Numerosity

HN4[] To satisfy the numerosity requirement, Ranis and MHL must show that the putative class is so numerous that joinder of all members would be "impracticable." Fed R. Civ. P. 23(a)(1). Although the numerosity requirement "imposes no absolute limitations" and requires a case-by-case analysis of the facts, see Gen. Tel. Co. of the Nw v. EEOC, 446 U.S. 318, 330, 100 S. Ct. 1698, 64 L. Ed. 2d 319 (1980), [16] courts within the Second Circuit generally presume that joinder of all putative class members is impracticable if the class has more than forty members. See, e.g., Ramos v. SimplexGrinnell LP, 796 F. Supp. 2d 346, 353 (E.D.N.Y. 2011) (citing Consol. Rail Corp. v. Town of Hyde Park, 47 F.3d 473, 483 (2d Cir. 1995)).

Transaction records produced by defendants indicate that there are at least 139 discrete entities that directly purchased vitamin C during the relevant time period. Defendants do not contest numerosity in any way, and this Court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that joinder of 139 members would be difficult and inconvenient, if not impossible. Rule 23(a)(1) is therefore satisfied. See Gortat, 257 F.R.D. at 362 (impracticability within the meaning of Rule 23 "does not mean impossibility of joinder, but rather difficulty or inconvenience of joinder").

B. Commonality

HN5[] Although some courts tend to merge Rule 23's commonality prong with the typicality prong, see Marisol A., 126 F.3d at 376, the commonality requirement is distinct from typicality in that it "tests the definition of the class itself rather than focusing on the relationship between the putative class representative [17] and the other class members. See 5-23 James W. Moore et al., Moore's Federal Practice § 23.23[6] (3d ed. 2011). Under commonality, the class definition is tested to ensure that the class members' claims "depend on a common contention [which is] of such a nature that it is capable of class wide resolution." Wal-Mart Stores. Inc. v. Dukes, 131 S. Ct. 2541, 2551, 180 L. Ed. 2d 374 (2011).

Rule 23(a)(2), read literally, requires only that a class share common "questions of law or fact." As the Supreme Court recently declared, however, what matters under the commonality requirement "'is not the raising of common questions — even in droves — but, rather the capacity of a classwide proceeding to generate common answers apt to drive the resolution of the litigation.'" Id. (quoting Richard A. Nagareda, Class Certification in the Age of Aggregate Proof, 84 N.Y.U. L. Rev. 97, 132 (2009)). A single common question of law or fact may suffice to satisfy this requirement if the question is capable of giving rise to a common answer through a class action. Id. at 2556.

In an effort to limit the scope of discovery in this case, defendants agreed not to oppose class certification on the grounds of commonality or predominance [18] under Rule 23(b)(3). Defendants' opposition papers therefore contain no argument regarding commonality. Having analyzed plaintiffs' claims, I find that the commonality requirement is satisfied. The most significant question posed by this lawsuit will generate common answers among all class members: did the defendants' price-fixing agreement cause an artificial increase in the market price of vitamin C? Because the answer to this question could not logically vary between class members, the answer will be applicable to all members of this proposed class.

C. Adequacy

HN6[] The adequacy requirement focuses on the fitness of purported class representatives to competently discharge the responsibility of litigating the case on behalf of absent class members. Under this prong of Rule 23(a), a court must ensure that the putative representatives "'possess the same interests and suffer the same injuries as the [*100] class members.'" In re Literary Works in Elec. Databases Copyright Litig., 654 F.3d 242, 249 (2d Cir. 2011) (quoting Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 625-26, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997)). Although it is important for a court to thoroughly vet any putative class representative, a court must [19] be "wary of a defendant's efforts to defeat representation of a class on grounds of inadequacy" where, as here, the effect of an inadequacy finding would be to "eliminate any class representation." Kline v. Wolf, 702 F.2d 400, 402 (2d Cir. 1983).

As a threshold matter, HN7[] a class representative is not "adequate" unless it is a member of the class it purports to represent. This requirement is evident from the opening sentence of Rule 23, which explains that "one or more members of a class may sue or be sued as representative parties on behalf of all members." Once it is determined that a putative representative is indeed a class member, courts generally focus the adequacy analysis on three primary areas of concern.

First, the named plaintiff must "demonstrate that class counsel is qualified, experienced, and generally able to conduct the litigation." Marisol A., 126 F.3d at 378. This factor is undisputed in this case, as defendants concede that plaintiffs' lawyers are "experienced class action attorneys" and this Court is familiar with their reputation. Second, the named plaintiff must show that "there is no conflict of interest between the named plaintiffs and other members of the plaintiff [20] class." Id. Finally, a named plaintiff must exhibit enough integrity and credibility to convince the court that the named plaintiff will diligently perform its fiduciary duties to the class. See Savino v. Computer Credit. Inc., 164 F.3d 81 (2d Cir. 1998); Shakhnes ex rel. Shakhnes v. Eggleston, 740 F. Supp. 2d 602, 627 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). These final two factors — as well as the class membership of both MHL and Ranis — are hotly disputed by the parties. For the reasons stated below, I find that Ranis is adequate to represent the class and MHL is inadequate.

1. Class Membership of MHL and Ranis

Defendants claim that MHL is not a member of the class because MHL only purchased vitamin C from JSPCA, which is a subsidiary of defendant Jiangsu rather than a defendant itself. This fact technically brings MHL outside the definition of the class, which includes only those entities that "directly purchased vitamin C" from one of the defendants in this action. Of equal importance, defendants argue that allowing MHL to join the class would run afoul of HN8[] the general rule that indirect purchasers may not recover damages for monopolistic overcharges under federal antitrust law. See Illinois Brick Co., et al., v. Illinois, et al., 431 U.S. 720, 97 S.Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977).

Plaintiffs [21] assert that MHL is in fact a direct purchaser because the parent-subsidiary relationship between Jiangsu and JSPCA means that "direct purchases from JSPCA are the same as direct purchases from Jiangsu itself." Some history of the rule set forth in Illinois Brick is necessary to address this argument.

The Supreme Court laid the framework for the Illinois Brick rule in Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S.Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968). The defendant in Hanover Shoe was a manufacturer of shoe-making machinery which was accused of driving up the price of this machinery by monopolizing the industry. The defendant argued that the plaintiff — a shoe seller which leased the defendant's machines — had not suffered any injury from these artificially increased prices because the plaintiff had passed the overcharge on to its own customers through higher shoe prices. The Supreme Court described this defense as a "pass-on" theory, and rejected it. The Court reasoned that, if such a defense were permitted, courts would be charged with the "insurmountable" task of weighing the "wide range" of market-based factors that can influence a company's decision to raise prices. Hanover Shoe, 392 U.S. at 493.

According [22] to Hanover Shoe, if antitrust damages were measured by the plaintiff's net loss — taking into consideration any profit recouped through a price-hike in downstream sales — antitrust cases would "require additional long and complicated proceedings [*101] involving massive evidence and complicated theories." Id. The Court therefore held that the relevant injury in an antitrust lawsuit is simply the overcharge that a defendant inflicted on its direct purchasers; any attempts by the direct purchasers to recoup this overcharge by passing it on to more remote purchasers is irrelevant to the damages calculation.

The Court's decision in Illinois Brick was the inverse of Hanover Shoe; since defendants could not use the "pass-on" theory to claim that a direct purchaser suffered no net injury, plaintiffs could not use the "pass-on" theory to claim damages for an overcharge that was allegedly passed on from the defendant, through a middleman, to the indirect-purchaser plaintiff. The Court reasoned that the "evidentiary complexities and uncertainties" feared by the Hanover Shoe Court would be multiplied if a plaintiff who is "several steps removed from the defendant in the chain of distribution" could claim [23] monetary damages for an overcharge allegedly caused by the defendant. Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 732. This case therefore established a mostly bright-line rule barring indirect purchasers from seeking damages for antitrust violations in federal court.

Although the Illinois Brick Court explained that any exception to its holding would be "narrow in scope," the Court gave examples of specific situations in which the "pass-on" theory would not require a court to consider "complex market interactions." In such situations, since a court would conceivably be capable of calculating the damages a defendant caused its remote purchasers to suffer, indirect purchasers would be permitted to sue for damages. Id. at 736. For example, the Court suggested in a footnote that indirect purchasers who "owned or controlled" the direct purchaser would be permitted to sue. Id. at 736 n. 16.

HN9[] The "ownership or control" exception is now firmly established and has been expanded to include instances where the defendant owns or controls the intermediary that sold the goods to the indirect-purchaser plaintiff. See, e.g., In re Indus. Diamonds Antitrust Litig., 119 F. Supp. 2d 418, 421 (S.D.N.Y. 2000). Despite this [24] minor expansion, however, courts remain conscious that the Supreme Court "intended exceptions to the Illinois Brick rule to be few and far between." *Drug Mart Pharmacy Corp. v. Am. Home Prods. Corp., No. 93-CV-5148, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 19954, 2002 WL 31528625, at 10 (E.D.N.Y. Aug. 21, 2002) (citing Kansas v. UtiliCorp United, Inc., 497 U.S. 199, 110 S. Ct. 2807, 111 L. Ed. 2d 169 (1990)). Any existing exception, moreover, should be narrowly construed to apply only to those situations in which the court is sure that a calculation of damages would not require consideration of complex market interactions. See Illinois Brick, 431 U.S. at 745; accord Del. Valley Surgical Supply Inc. v. Johnson & Johnson, 523 F.3d 1116, 1125 (9th Cir. 2008) ("'[A]ny exception to the Illinois Brick direct purchaser rule must be narrowly restricted to a situation in which complex market forces are stripped of their effect due to preexisting conditions . . . so that the pass-on is clearly discernible.'" (quoting In re Lorazepam & Clorazepate Antitrust Litig., 202 F.R.D. 12, 20 (D.D.C. 2001))).

A narrow construction of the "ownership or control" exception has led courts to apply it only when the relationship between the defendant and the middleman "involve[s] [25] such functional economic or other unity that there effectively has been only one sale" between the defendant and the indirect purchaser. *Leider v. Ralfe, No. 01-CV-3137, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18270, 2003 WL 22339305, at 4 (S.D.N. Y. Oct. 10, 2003). A plaintiff seeking to gain the benefit of this exception must therefore present facts demonstrating that such unity exists and may not rely simply on the existence of a parent-subsidiary relationship. See id.; Mid-West Paper Prods. Co. v. Cont'l Grp., Inc., 596 F.2d 573, 589 (3d Cir. 1979). Crucially, this exception is available only if the plaintiff shows that the defendant has such control over the subsidiary that the defendant can be said to have "set prices along the chain of distribution." Kloth v. Microsoft Corp., 444 F.3d 312, 321 (4th Cir. 2006).

Here, plaintiffs seek to invoke the "ownership or control" exception by proffering the simple fact that JSPCA is a wholly-owned [*102] subsidiary of Jiangsu. This evidentiary showing is singularly insufficient to convince me that Jiangsu was responsible for any overcharge inflicted on MHL by JSPCA.[3] In fact, defendants submitted the declaration of Jeffery Fang, a former JSPCA employee, who explained that he and JSPCA's sales [26] manager determined the price of all vitamin C sold by JSPCA. Fang stated that Jiangsu "did not exercise control over the prices that JSPCA charged JSPCA's customers" and explained that JSPCA's pricing determinations were influenced by market factors such as competition with other vitamin C distributors. The concerns that drove the Supreme Court's decisions in Hanover Shoe and Illinois Brick are therefore present with full force in this case, and an exception to the direct purchaser rule is unwarranted.

Because MHL is an indirect purchaser and no exception to the Illinois Brick rule applies here, MHL lacks standing to sue for damages under federal law and cannot join the putative Damages Class. MHL therefore has no interest in vigorously pursuing the class claims and is inadequate to serve as class representative.

Defendants argue that, like MHL, Ranis is inadequate to represent the class because [27] it is not even a class member. It is undisputed that Ranis never bought any vitamin C and is therefore eligible for class membership only by dint of being an assignee of Graymor's claims. While conceding that the assignment of Graymor's claim technically brought Ranis within the class definition — which explicitly accounts for assignees of direct purchasers — defendants argue that assignees were included in the class definition in order for Ranis to make a specious end-run around the rule prohibiting assignment of class membership.

Contrary to defendants' assertion, however, there is no rule prohibiting the assignment of class membership. Defendants found support for this rule in a 2006 case from the Southern District of New York in which Judge McKenna refused to allow an assignee to represent a class and warned that "very serious problems" would arise if class membership were treated as a "transferable asset." *In re Pub. Offering Fee Antitrust Litig., No. 98-CV- 7890, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21076, 2006 WL 1026653, at 4 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 18, 2006), vacated sub nom. Cordes & Co. Fin. Servs., Inc. v. A.G. Edwards & Sons. Inc., 502 F.3d 91 (2d Cir. 2007). After defendants filed their brief in opposition to class certification, [28] however, the Second Circuit vacated and remanded Judge McKenna's decision, holding that there are no particular dangers inherent in the practice of transferring class membership that do not arise in the context of claim assignment generally. See Cordes. 502 F.3d at 103. Since antitrust claims are generally assignable, the Cordes Court held that an assignment of class representative status in an antitrust case is likewise permissible and does not amount to champerty. Id. Ranis's status as an assignee therefore does not prevent it from joining or representing the class.

[3] As noted in my decision granting summary judgment on behalf of JSPCA, JSPCA's former chief executive officer failed to preserve documents and e-mails relevant to this case. However, this possible spoliation did not prevent plaintiffs from seeking other evidence of Jiangsu's domination of JSPCA.

2. Conflicts of Interest

"It is axiomatic that HN10[] a putative representative cannot adequately protect the class if his interests are antagonistic to or in conflict with the objectives of those he purports to represent." 7A Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 1768 (3d ed. 2011). However, a conflict of interest will not destroy adequacy under Rule 23 unless the conflict is "fundamental" and concrete; conflicts which are merely "speculative . . . should be disregarded at the class certification stage." In re Visa Check/MasterMoney Antitrust Litig., 280 F.3d 124, 145 (2d Cir. 2001) (overruled on other grounds [29] by In re IPO. 471 F.3d at 24) (internal quotation marks omitted); accord Denney v. Deutsche Bank AG, 443 F.3d 253, 268 (2d Cir. 2006).

Defendants argue that Ranis has an inherent conflict of interest with the rest of the class because Ranis's assignor, Graymor, "wanted to see higher market prices for vitamin C" in order to "increase its opportunities [*103] to profit as a distributor." Since the other class members all sought lower vitamin C prices, defendants argue, Ranis is more closely aligned with the defendants in this action and is therefore unlikely to vigorously pursue the class claims.

Defendants do not allege, and the facts would not support a finding, that Graymor actually took part in defendants' price-fixing conspiracy. Instead, defendants offer evidence tending to show that, at certain points in time, it was in Graymor's self-interest to see the market price of vitamin C rise. For example, Graymor's sales director wrote an e-mail in which he appeared to express satisfaction over the prospect of "dramatic price increases" in the vitamin C market. But defendants do not dispute that Graymor, like the rest of the class members, sought to purchase vitamin C at the lowest price possible. [30] Presumably, any distributor of vitamin C aims to maximize profits by buying low and selling high. This is consistent with the e-mails cited by defendants, in which Graymor's sales director explained his intention to hold vitamin C inventory until the market price rose again, at which time Graymor could sell the inventory at a larger profit margin.

Defendants' conflict-of-interest argument must logically be based on an assumption that the entire class, save Graymor, consists of end-users who never resell vitamin C and therefore oppose price increases at all points in time. But the class is defined solely by whether or not a business purchased directly from a defendant — in other words, the class is defined by purchasing practices, not by downstream sales. There is thus no reason to believe that the entire class is homogenously end-users; in fact it is equally likely that the class consists entirely of distributors whose business habits dovetail perfectly with Graymor's.

Moreover, even if Graymor were the only distributor in the entire class, its occasional interest in high market prices would not create a conflict of interest. Plaintiffs seek to represent a class of direct purchasers [31] in a damages-only suit. When antitrust plaintiffs seek only damages, Hanover Shoe requires a court to disregard the downstream sales of these direct purchasers. Graymor's interest in seeing market prices rise, which appears to have been an attempt to "pass-on" any overcharges suffered by Graymor, is therefore irrelevant to this case. Since Graymor's downstream-sales practices will not come into play in this case, they are incapable of causing a conflict of interest between Ranis and the class. Ranis and the rest of the class, including the end-users, have precisely the same goal in this case: to demonstrate that the defendants' alleged antitrust violations caused each plaintiff to purchase vitamin C at an artificially inflated price. This Court will look no further down the stream.

Although defendants did not cite to it, there is one important case that lends support to their conflict-of-interest argument. In Valley Drug Company v. Geneva Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 350 F.3d 1181 (11th Cir. 2003), the Eleventh Circuit held that a conflict of interest could arise between a named plaintiff and absent class members if the named plaintiff had benefitted from the defendant's antitrust violation [32] by passing on the overcharge to remote purchasers. Although the Court acknowledged that Hanover Shoe requires a court to disregard downstream sales when calculating damages in an antitrust case, the Court believed that the question addressed in Hanover Shoe was distinct from the question of whether "the economic reality of the situation leads some class members to have economic interests that are significantly different from — and potentially antagonistic to — the named representatives purporting to represent them." Id. at 1195.

I disagree with the Valley Drug Court's holding in the context of a damages-only class. Although the Court was correct to note that Hanover Shoe dealt with the calculation of damages in an antitrust case, rather than the existence of a conflict of interest under a Rule 23(a) analysis, the Valley Drug Court failed to recognize that Hanover Shoe's holding eradicates any possibility that a named plaintiff's downstream sales could create a conflict of interest with other class members. Conceivably, if Ranis were seeking to enjoin defendants' alleged price-fixing conspiracy, evidence that it benefitted economically [*104] from the conspiracy could weigh into my consideration [33] of whether Ranis would "vigorously prosecute the interests of the class." Id. at 1196 (internal quotation marks omitted). But the same is not true when all class members seek simply to collect damages.

Other courts that have considered this issue have also declined to follow Valley Drug, finding it irreconcilable with Hanover Shoe. See, e.g., Meijer, Inc. v. Warner Chilcott Holdings Co. III, Ltd., 246 F.R.D. 293 (D.D.C. 2007) ("[T]he Eleventh Circuit's holding fails to appreciate the true import of the Hanover Shoe rule that a direct purchaser may recover the full amount of the overcharge, even if he is otherwise benefitted . . . ."); *In re Hypodermic Prod. Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., No. 05-CV-1602, 2006 U.S. Dist. Lexis 89353, at 16 (D.N.J. Sept. 7, 2006) (citing with approval a magistrate judge's ruling that Valley Drug's "narrow reading of Hanover Shoe is neither shared by this Court nor this circuit"); *In re Wellbutrin Sr Direct Purchaser Antitrust Litig., Civil Action No. 04-5525, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 36719, 2008 WL 1946848, at 6 (E.D. Pa. May 2, 2008) ("[T]he Court declines to follow Valley Drug and will adhere instead to the principles announced in Hanover Shoe and Illinois Brick.").

In any event, [34] the Valley Drug decision is distinguishable from this case because it was limited to the particular characteristics of the pharmaceutical industry. Specifically, the Valley Drug Court relied on an assumption that the demand for pharmaceuticals is less elastic than the demand for most consumer goods. If a court need not consider fluctuations in demand levels, according to the Valley Drug Court, the process of determining whether an overcharge was passed on to a remote purchaser would be simplified. Valley Drug, 350 F.3d at 1195. The defendants do not make such an argument in this case, and this Court therefore has no reason to shrug off the Hanover Shoe Court's concerns over the "evidentiary complexities and uncertainties" associated with the "pass-on" theory. See *In re Air Cargo Shipping Servs. Antitrust Litig., No. 06-MD-1775, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 3 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 24, 2010) (distinguishing Valley Drug on these grounds).

Defendants also argue that Ranis's lawyers have a conflict of interest. This conflict is supposedly caused by the lawyers' representation of Animal Science, an indirect purchaser that has moved for certification of the Injunction Class. Defendants surmise that the Injunction [35] Class may include indirect purchasers that are also members of putative classes seeking damages under state-law provisions. Because these various class actions all seek relief against the same defendants, it is argued that both direct and indirect purchasers are "seeking to recover from the same pool of money." Defendants are apparently concerned that, by representing both direct and indirect purchasers, Ranis's lawyers will be forced to prioritize one class over another.

This argument does not make sense. The indirect purchasers who seek damages from the defendants under state law are not represented by Ranis's lawyers. Ranis's lawyers represent only two classes: the instant class, which seeks damages on behalf of direct purchasers under federal law, and a class of direct and indirect purchasers seeking only injunctive relief under federal law. The interests of these two classes do not conflict, and counsel therefore will not have to choose between them. Ranis's counsel is free to litigate the instant case vigorously without fear of prejudicing the Injunction Class in any way.

3. Ranis's Credibility and Integrity

HN11[] Because class representatives have a duty to guard the interests of the [36] class, a court should deny class certification if the putative representative is not honest or ethical enough to adequately discharge this fiduciary duty. See Savino, 164 F.3d at 87. However, this inquiry into the representative's integrity "is not an examination into their moral righteousness, but rather an inquiry directed at improper or questionable conduct arising out of or touching upon the very prosecution of the lawsuit." Friedman-Katz v. Lindt & Sprungli (USA), Inc., 270 F.R.D. 150, 159 (S.D.N.Y. 2010) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because integrity considerations are "restricted to their relevance to issues in the litigation," *Rocco v. Nam Tai Elecs., Inc., 245 F.R.D. 131, 137 [105] (S.D.N.Y. 2007), courts in this Circuit have disregarded ad hominem attacks that call the putative representative's character into question over incidents unrelated to the case before the court. See, e.g., *Jones v. Ford Motor Credit Co., No. 00-CV-8330, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5381, 2005 WL 743213, at 18-19 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 31, 2005) (class representative's prior convictions for burglary and rape "by no means touch upon the class claims").

Defendants' attacks on Ranis's credibility fall into the category of criticisms that courts [37] in this Circuit tend to disregard. Defendants argue that Ranis and class counsel have engaged in a dishonorable plot to conceal Graymor's "questionable business practices" from this Court. These business practices involve attempts by Robert Conway, Graymor's sales manager, to obtain tips from the defendants regarding future price trends. In various e-mails, Conway refers to these tips as "inside pricing information"; offers to pay "a reasonable fee" for the information; and vaguely asserts that Graymor was willing to "work quietly behind the scenes" to obtain such information. Defendants argue that Ranis's lawyers attempted to hide these practices from the Court by assigning Graymor's claims to Ranis and refusing to disclose Graymor's identity for more than a year.

In response to this charge, plaintiffs argue that Graymor's business practices were legitimate and that its claims were assigned to Ranis in order to protect Graymor from any potential retaliation by Chinese manufacturers. Defendants counter that Graymor could not reasonably fear retaliation, as it had left the vitamin C business two years prior to filing this lawsuit. However, it is uncontested that Graymor continued to [38] purchase other products from Chinese manufacturers. Alfred J. Gordon, the president of Ranis and Graymor, submitted an affidavit stating that Graymor's identity was concealed during the early stages of this litigation because he "was concerned that publicity about [Graymor's] name could be used against [Graymor] in China and subject [Graymor] to possible retaliation." Gordon testified at deposition that he believed that "there was a shared basis of information among Chinese manufacturers" and that he was worried that Graymor could be frozen out of the market in retaliation for suing the Chinese vitamin C manufacturers.

I find that defendants have failed to rebut Gordon's explanation for keeping Graymor's identity private. Moreover, despite their sinister characterization of Graymor's business practices, defendants' exact grievance is not apparent to me. Defendants do not allege that Graymor took part in any alleged antitrust violations, nor do defendants allege that Graymor misappropriated trade secrets or violated any laws against inside trading. To the extent that Graymor's quest for "inside information" was otherwise illegal or immoral, for reasons I am unable to envision, I find [39] that this conduct bears no meaningful connection to the litigation at hand.

D. Typicality

The typicality analysis focuses on whether the named plaintiff's interests align with the interests of the rest of the class. See Moore et al., supra, § 23.24[1]. The purpose of this analysis is to ensure that, by prosecuting its own case, the named plaintiff "simultaneously advances the interests of the absent class members." 1 Joseph M. McLaughlin, McLaughlin on Class Actions § 4:16 (8th ed. 2011).

HN12[] The typicality criterion does not require complete symmetry between the class representative's claims and those of the absent class members. See Shakhnes ex rel. Shakhnes v. Eggleston, 740 F. Supp. 2d 602, 625 (S.D.N. Y. 2010). Rather, the named plaintiff must simply raise claims that "arise from the same course of events" as the class claims and make "similar legal arguments to prove the defendant's liability." Robidoux v. Celani, 987 F.2d 931, 936 (2d Cir. 1993).

Defendants do not dispute that Graymor directly purchased vitamin C from one of the defendants at a price that was allegedly inflated due to an illegal conspiracy to impose price floors and limit exports to the United States. The claims and [40] legal arguments brought by Ranis, as assignee of Graymor, thus appear completely parallel to the claims brought by other class members, [*106] and the typicality requirement is therefore satisfied.

However, defendants argue that Ranis will be subject to unique defenses not applicable to other class members. HN13[] In general, typicality is lacking when a putative class representative would be "subject to unique defenses which threaten to become the focus of the litigation." Baffa v. Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Sec. Corp., 222 F.3d 52, 59 (2d Cir. 2000). Specifically, defendants allege that Ranis is an ignorant class representative and is being propped up by lawyers who are driving this case in pursuit of their own interests.[4]

Defendants proclaim that Ranis has no "meaningful commitment to this litigation" and "virtually no knowledge or understanding" of the key litigation issues in this case. HN14[] Class representative status may properly be denied on this basis, but the Second Circuit has expressed a "general disfavor of attacks on the adequacy of a class representative based on the representative's ignorance." In re Flag Telecom Holdings, Ltd. Sec. Litig., 574 F.3d 29, 42 (2d Cir. 2009) (internal quotation marks omitted). Courts in this Circuit therefore deny class certification due to the putative representative's ignorance only when the ignorance is so profound that the class representative "would be unable or unwilling to protect the interests of the class against the possibly competing interests of the attorneys." Maywalt v. Parker & Parsley Petrol. Co., 67 F.3d 1072, 1077-78 (2d Cir. 1995). A proposed representative can avoid such a fate simply by showing [42] a willingness and ability to pursue the litigation on behalf of the class and a basic understanding of the litigation. See Baffa, 222 F.3d at 62.

Ranis clears this low hurdle easily. Gordon's deposition testimony shows that he fully understands the nature of the claims and is generally apprised of the procedural and technical aspects of the litigation. In an affidavit, he affirmed that he is dedicated to pursuing the class claims and is prepared to cooperate with discovery and trial. In fact, defendants' allegations regarding Ranis's ignorance are supported by almost nothing. The only fact offered in support of this charge is deposition testimony in which Gordon admitted that he did not completely understand why class counsel decided to dismiss the damages claims against defendant Northeast.

Class counsel explains that Northeast was dismissed because Ranis, and presumably other class members, had signed contracts with Northeast that included arbitration clauses. Pursuant to these clauses, defendants sought to compel arbitration of this entire case in Beijing.[5] Plaintiffs' decision to dismiss Northeast, and keep this case in American courts, was tactical and undoubtedly required a sophisticated [43] analysis that could be difficult to explain to a layperson. As Gordon explained at deposition, he was aware that the decision to dismiss Northeast "involve[d] this arbitration in some way," but he did not understand "how that affected the rest of the situation." This is a sufficient level of knowledge and understanding for a named plaintiff, as these individuals are not expected to understand every intricacy of the litigation or possess a professional-level understanding of the law. See, e.g., Baffa, 222 F.3d at 52; Gunnells v. Healthplan [*107] Servs., Inc., 348 F.3d 417, 430 (4th Cir. 2003) HN15[] ("It is hornbook law . . . that in a complex lawsuit... the representative need not have extensive knowledge of the facts of the case in order to be an adequate representative.").

Defendants also argue that Ranis is atypical of the class because it never purchased any vitamin C and because Graymor has been out of the vitamin C business for years. Of course, it is irrelevant that Ranis never purchased any vitamin C, as Ranis is litigating Graymor's claim. It is also irrelevant that Graymor left the business and, according to defendants, has "no stake in what happens to prices going forward." Ranis purports to represent a class seeking damages for antitrust violations that occurred in the past; Graymor's plans regarding prospective business with the defendants therefore do not matter and will not differentiate Ranis from the rest of the class in any meaningful way. This factor does not have any impact on my adequacy analysis either, as Ranis remains

[4] Defendants do not identify this argument as addressing any particular subsection of Rule 23(a). Although the argument seems to call Ranis's adequacy into question, the Second Circuit has held that such attacks on the putative class representative should be addressed under the typicality prong because an ignorant representative may give "misleading and contradictory testimony with regard to basic issues in the case that might make their claims subject to unique defenses." Baffa, 222 F.3d at 61. [41] I would note, however, that the Second Circuit has addressed this issue under the adequacy prong in the past, and despite this technical change the analysis remains the same. See Maywalt v. Parker & Parsley Petrol. Co., 67 F.3d 1072, 1077-78 (2d Cir. 1995).

[5] Defendants also argue that Ranis's decision to dismiss Northeast advanced Ranis's interests at the expense of other class members who may not have signed arbitration clauses with Northeast. This argument is puzzling, as defendants fail to explain how the absent class members' interests would be served by moving this case to an arbitration panel in a country that has expressly condoned the defendants' agreements to fix the price [44] of vitamin C. incentivized to collect damages for prior antitrust violations. See In re Playmobil Antitrust Litig., 35 F. Supp. 2d 231, 243 (E.D.N.Y. 1998) ("Where the plaintiffs have alleged a single conspiracy to artificially inflate prices, a representative plaintiff may satisfy the adequacy requirement without having . . . made purchases throughout the entire class period." (internal quotation marks omitted)).

Another [45] argument raised by defendants is that this lawsuit is "lawyer-driven" and would never have been filed if Ranis had not been solicited by "lawyers looking for someone to 'front' a case that they had created." Defendants believe that class counsel is interested in this case solely for the "perceived financial rewards they anticipate," rather than any sincere desire to enforce antitrust laws. Defendants opine that I "should not allow the class action mechanism to be used to create litigation that would not otherwise exist."

Either defendants are naive for making this argument, or, more likely, they hope that I am naive enough to accept it. Of course this lawsuit is driven by lawyers who perceive financial rewards. It would make little sense for a law firm like plaintiffs' to bring a massive antitrust class-action on a pro-bono basis. By the same token, individual class members are unlikely to have sufficient resources — let alone fluency with federal antitrust law — to institute a lawsuit such as this. A primary objective of Rule 23 is to allow lawsuits to be brought that would not have otherwise been brought; whether the idea for a class action first arose in the mind of a lawyer, rather [46] than a class member, is of no moment in a class certification analysis.

The case law and Senate Report to which defendants cite, which discuss Congress's rationale in passing the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act of 1995 ("PSLRA"), do not support defendants' argument. Defendants are correct that Congress passed this law in response to concerns that securities litigators were driving class-action lawsuits that would never have been filed by any of the class members. See S. REP. NO. 104-98, at 5 (1995) reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. 679, 685. Courts in this Circuit often cite this law with approval, noting that its provisions "were intended to curtail the vice of 'lawyer-driven' litigation . . . in contingent securities fraud class actions." Iron Workers Local No. 25 Pension Fund v. Credit-Based Asset Servicing & Securitization, LLC, 616 F. Supp. 2d 461, 463 (S.D.N.Y. 2009).

However, these courts' concerns are particular to the nature of large securities litigations. The PSLRA was passed because Congress was concerned about harm to the marketplace caused by the prevalence of "frivolous 'strike' suits . . . [which] are often based on nothing more than a company's announcement of [47] bad news" and which extort companies into paying large settlements simply to avoid the costs of fighting a meritless lawsuit. S. REP. No. 104-98, at 5 (1995) reprinted in 1995 U.S.C.C.A.N. 679, 685. In contrast, defendants in this case have never disputed that there was a widespread conspiracy among Chinese vitamin C manufacturers to fix the price of vitamin C at an artificially high level in violation of American antitrust laws.

Congress's disapproval of lawyers who drive frivolous lawsuits is therefore inapplicable to a case such as this. Moreover, the [*108] provisions of the PSLRA do not apply to antitrust cases; if Congress saw the need to curtail lawyer-driven antitrust class actions, it could have passed an analogous statute.

Defendants' misgivings over the potential for abuse in a lawyer-driven class action find good company among judges and scholars. See, e.g., Thorogood v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 627 F.3d 289, 293-294 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J.) (collecting cases and scholarship). In Thorogood, the Seventh Circuit listed some abuses that can arise in a lawyer-driven class action, such as settlement extortion; collusion between defense lawyers and class counsel; and intentional maximization [48] of attorneys' fees. Conceivably, if these abuses were shown to exist here, this could factor into my determination of whether class counsel is an adequate guardian of class interests. But this case presents no evidence of these abuses. To the contrary, although defendants' briefs are laden with hysterical warnings about the dangers of a "lawyer-driven" class action, defendants support this argument only by two undisputed facts: 1.) Ranis is not footing the bill for this lawsuit; and 2.) Ranis had not considered bringing this lawsuit until Gordon was contacted by class counsel.

HN16[] Counsel's decision to advance litigation costs in this case is typical and proper. In fact, courts have explicitly recognized that this common practice facilitates Rule 23's goals by allowing individuals to initiate important lawsuits that may otherwise have been prohibitively costly. See, e.g., Suffolk County v. Long Island Lighting Co., 710 F. Supp. 1407,1414 (E.D.N.Y. 1989) ("Rule 23 requires, as a practical matter, that attorneys advance costs on a scale not reimbursable by any normal client."); Rand v. Monsanto Co., 926 F.2d 596, 600-601 (7th Cir. 1991) (Easterbrook, J.) (remarking that a rule requiring a [49] class representative, rather than class counsel, to bear the cost of litigating a class action would "cripple the class action device," would "serve no good purpose," and is "inconsistent with Rule 23"). This is even true in the context of securities litigation. See In re Worldcom, Inc., Sec. Litig., 219 F.R.D. 267, 284 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[R]equiring named plaintiffs to pay litigation expenses, even their pro rata share of litigation expenses, can have deleterious effects on the federal class action device.").

I am similarly unmoved by the fact that Ranis did not consider suing until solicited by class counsel. In the past, the fact that class counsel had solicited a representative party to bring a class action was taken into consideration by courts making class certification determinations. See William B. Rubenstein et al., Newberg on Class Actions § 15:4 (4th ed. 2011). However, this concern has waned in recent years and courts are now reluctant to give much weight to this factor in a class certification analysis. See id.; Busby v. JRHBW Realty, Inc., 513 F.3d 1314, 1324 (11th Cir. 2008) (holding that, if class counsel had improperly solicited the class representative, "'the ordinary [50] remedy is disciplinary action . . .' not denial of class certification" (quoting Halverson v. Convenient Food Mart, Inc., 458 F.2d 927, 932 (7th Cir. 1972))); Jim Ball Pontiac-Buick-GMC, Inc. v. DHL Express (USA). Inc., No. 08-CV-761C, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20758, 2011 WL 815209, at *5 (W.D.N.Y. Mar. 2, 2011) (noting that defendants had argued "that counsel solicited plaintiff to be the class representative," but holding that "the class is [nonetheless] adequately represented by plaintiff's counsel"); Ballan v. Upjohn Co., 159 F.R.D. 473, 488 (W.D. Mich. 1994) ("open solicitation is no longer frowned upon as in the past").

I share these courts' doubts over the relevance of this factor in a class certification analysis. If the solicitation of a named plaintiff violated a state's ethical rules, it is conceivable that this violation, in conjunction with other evidence of ethical misconduct, could be relevant to a determination of whether class counsel is generally trustworthy and ethical enough to represent the class. Here, however, defendants do not allege that the solicitation at issue violated any state's ethical rules and make no other accusations of professional misconduct against class counsel. Denial of class [51] certification on this basis is therefore unwarranted.

II. Rule 23(b)(3)'s Requirements — Predominance and Superiority

HN17[] Under Rule 23(b)(3), plaintiffs must show that "questions of law or fact common to [*109] class members predominate over any questions affecting only individual members, and that a class action is superior to other available methods" for adjudicating the controversy. As the Advisory Committee explains, Rule 23(b)(3) permits class certification for cases "in which a class action would achieve economies of time, effort, and expense, and promote uniformity of decision as to persons similarly situated . . . ." The Supreme Court has recognized that the goal of Rule 23(b)(3) is to provide "vindication of the rights of groups of people who individually would be without effective strength to bring their opponents into court at all." Amchem, 521 U.S. at 617 (citation and quotation marks omitted).

The "predominance" requirement of Rule 23(b)(3) "tests whether the proposed [class is] sufficiently cohesive to warrant adjudication by representation." Id. at 623. This criterion is satisfied if "resolution of some of the legal or factual questions that qualify each class member's case as a [52] genuine controversy can be achieved through generalized proof, and if these particular issues are more substantial than the issues subject only to individualized proof." Myers, 624 F.3d at 547 (internal quotation marks omitted). Here, plaintiffs allege that defendants engaged in a horizontal price-fixing conspiracy that caused the market price of vitamin C to rise. In cases such as this, courts have frequently held that the predominance requirement is satisfied because the existence and effect of the conspiracy are the prime issues in the case and are common across the class. See *Arden Architectural Specialties, Inc. v. Wash. Mills Electro Minerals Corp., No. 95-CV-7574, 2002 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21506, 2002 WL 31421915, at 7 (W.D.N.Y. Sept. 17, 2002); *In Re Med. X-Ray Film Antitrust Litig., No. 93-CV-5904, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21936, 1997 WL 33320580, at 5 (E.D.N.Y. Dec. 26, 1997) ("As a general rule in anti-trust price-fixing cases, questions common to the members of the class will predominate over questions affecting only individual members."

Defendants do not deny that the alleged conspiracy's existence [53] and effect are the chief issues in this case and can be demonstrated through generalized proof. Instead, defendants simply argue that common issues do not predominate because Ranis "has many individual issues not shared with other members of the class." As discussed above, however, the "individual issues" of which defendants complain — for example, Ranis's status as an assignee; Graymor's "questionable" business practices; and Graymor's interest in high vitamin C prices — are insubstantial. None of these "individual issues" presents a meritorious defense that could distinguish Ranis from any other class member. Moreover, HN18[] the existence of individual defenses will not defeat predominance if "a sufficient constellation of common issues binds class members together." Brown v. Kelly, 609 F.3d 467, 483 (2d Cir. 2010). This class is united by common issues of law and fact that are determinative of liability and causation; this is more than sufficient to satisfy predominance. See In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 140.

HN19[] Rule 23(b)(3)'s "superiority" requirement is frequently satisfied when it would be prohibitively expensive for class members with small claims to proceed individually. Seijas v. Republic of Argentina, 606 F.3d 53, 58 (2d Cir. 2010). [54] In this case, plaintiffs seek to prove the existence and effect of a large conspiracy among Chinese vitamin C manufacturers. It has required and will continue to require a vast outpouring of resources to conduct even the minimum number of depositions abroad or to procure the necessary translation services required to interpret the documentary evidence. Moreover, proving that the alleged conspiracy affected the market price of vitamin C will require significant fees toward expert analyses and testimony. Direct purchasers are permitted to join the class regardless of the quantity of vitamin C purchased from the defendants; many of the class members' claims will therefore be small relative to the costs of maintaining this litigation. A class action is thus superior to requiring each class member to bring an individual claim.

[*110] Other HN20[] factors relevant to a finding of superiority include the manageability of a class action and the desirability of litigating the claims in a particular forum. See In re Visa Check, 280 F.3d at 133. In a case such as this, a single proceeding is far more manageable than a series of disjointed proceedings, as adjudicating the claims in a single class action will [55] promote uniformity of decisions and will protect courts from wasting resources on duplicative litigation. See In re Currency Conversion Fee Antitrust Litig., 264 F.R.D. 100, 117 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). Furthermore, this Court is highly familiar with the class claims as a consequence of the coordination of many similar cases by the Judicial Panel for Multidistrict Litigation. The class members will therefore benefit from streamlined pre-trial proceedings in this forum. See id.

III. Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Ranis's Claim for Damages or Strike Ranis's Class Allegations

On September 22, 2006, defendants moved to dismiss Ranis's claim for damages on two grounds. First, defendants argued that the complaint failed to allege that Ranis had been harmed by the conspiracy, as there was no allegation that Ranis purchased any vitamin C or was assigned a valid claim by an entity that purchased vitamin C. Second, defendants argued that even if Ranis amended the complaint to allege that it had been assigned a valid claim, "its allegations would not be sufficient as a matter of law to satisfy the direct purchaser requirement set forth by the Supreme Court in Illinois Brick." In the alternative, defendants [56] argued that Ranis's class allegations should be stricken under Rule 12(f) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure based on Judge McKenna's holding that class representative status may not be assigned. See In re Pub. Offering Fee, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21076, 2006 WL 1026653, at *4.

Defendants' first argument was mooted when plaintiffs amended the complaint, on January 31, 2007, to include the allegation that Graymor directly purchased vitamin C from defendants and assigned its claim to Ranis. Defendants' second argument is foreclosed by the Second Circuit's decision in Cordes, which held that an assignee of an antitrust claim stands before the court "in the shoes of its assignor. 502 F.3d at 101. Since Ranis stands in the shoes of Graymor, and defendants concede that Graymor is a direct purchaser of vitamin C, there is no violation of the Illinois Brick rule, Defendants' motion to dismiss Ranis's claim for damages is accordingly denied.

The Second Circuit has also foreclosed defendants' motion to strike Ranis's class allegations. As discussed above, the Cordes Court reversed Judge McKenna's decision and found that the assignment of class representative status is permissible in an antitrust case, Id. at 103. Defendants' [57] motion to strike Ranis's class allegations is therefore denied.

2. THE INJUNCTION CLASS

I. Rule 23(a)'s Requirements — Numerosity, Commonality, Typicality, and Adequacy

A. Numerosity

The Injunction Class includes both direct purchasers of vitamin C and indirect purchasers of vitamin C. As discussed above, there are at least 139 entities that directly purchased vitamin C from the defendants. Defendants do not contest numerosity in any way, and this Court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that the Injunction Class is sufficiently numerous because joinder of more than 139 members would be difficult and inconvenient, if not impossible. See Gortat, 257 F.R.D. at 362.

B. Commonality

Again, defendants do not contest commonality in this case. Having analyzed the Injunction Class's claims, I find that this class has satisfied the commonality requirement for the same reason that the Damages Class satisfied this requirement. The most significant question posed by the Injunction Class is the same question posed by the Damages Class: did the defendants' price-fixing agreement cause an artificial increase in the market price of vitamin C? The answer to this [*111] question will be generally applicable [58] to all members of the Injunction Class.

C. Typicality

Animal Science is a manufacturer and distributor of animal feed additives and has purchased vitamin C manufactured by defendants for use in these products. Defendants do not dispute that Animal Science's claims and the class claims "arise from the same course of events" and rely on the same "legal arguments to prove the defendant's liability." Robidoux, 987 F.2d at 936. Defendants nevertheless argue that Animal Science is not a typical member of the Injunction Class, as it spent only $127,388.11 on vitamin C during the year 2005. Defendants explain that Animal Science's vitamin C expenditures represented a small percentage of Animal Science's total purchases for that year and thus characterize Animal Science's stake in this litigation as "de minimis."

In a price-fixing case such as this, the fact that a putative class representative purchased "only a small portion of the products whose prices were anti-competitively established" does not itself destroy typicality. In re Playmobil, 35 F. Supp. 2d at 243. HN21[] A putative class representative need not be a heavy-weight in its industry to satisfy the typicality prong; the relevant inquiry is [59] simply whether absent class members' interests are advanced by the prosecution of the representative's claim. Defendants have presented no evidence by which this Court could compare Animal Science's vitamin C expenditure with the expenditures of absent class members; there is thus no reason to accept defendants' "de minimis" characterization. Moreover, even if this expenditure is modest in comparison to the regular buying practices of absent class members, this fact does not subject Animal Science to any unique defenses or otherwise differentiate Animal Science's claim in any meaningful way. Typicality is therefore satisfied.

D. Adequacy

As discussed above, class counsel are seasoned class action litigators. Furthermore, defendants do not challenge Animal Science's assertion that it is a vigorous and well-informed class representative. Instead, defendants argue that Animal Science is inadequate to represent the Injunction Class because it is not a member of the class; suffers from various conflicts of interest; and has already demonstrated a willingness to sacrifice important class interests. I will address these arguments in turn.

1. Animal Science's Class Membership

Defendants argue [60] that Animal Science is not a "proper class member of an injunctive class" because Animal Science has not satisfied the four-factor test that a plaintiff must satisfy in order to qualify for permanent injunctive relief. According to the Supreme Court, HN22[] a plaintiff seeking a permanent injunction must ordinarily demonstrate that: 1.) the plaintiff has suffered an "irreparable injury"; 2.) remedies available at law are inadequate to compensate for that injury; 3.) an equitable remedy is warranted after consideration of the balance of hardships; and 4.) the public interest would not be disserved by a permanent injunction. EBay, Inc. v. MercExchange, LLC, 547 U.S. 388, 391, 126 S. Ct. 1837, 164 L. Ed. 2d 641 (2006). Defendants home in on the first factor of this test, arguing that Animal Science has suffered no "irreparable injury" because it has managed to pass any overcharge on to its customers and ultimately realize a profit on each of its vitamin C transactions.

This argument is flawed in three fundamental ways. First, defendants have lifted the standard for granting a permanent injunction and grafted it onto Rule 23's standard for class certification. This is clearly improper, and defendants have not pointed [61] me to any case that holds a plaintiff to this standard at the class certification stage. Defendants' citation to Hnot v. Willis Group Holdings Limited, 241 F.R.D. 204, 212 (S.D.N.Y. 2007), does not support their argument; the Hnot court simply held that a Rule 23(b)(2) analysis requires a court to determine whether an injunction will be appropriate if plaintiffs succeed on the merits. This determination is different from the four-factor test cited by defendants, which is essentially [*112] a merits determination that does not overlap with any Rule 23 considerations.

Second, Animal Science need not show that it has suffered "irreparable injury" in order to enjoin an antitrust violation. Animal Science derives its standing to sue for injunctive relief from HN23[] section 16 of the Clayton Act, which provides that a plaintiff may sue to enjoin any "threatened loss or damage by a violation of the antitrust laws." 15 U.S.C. § 26. The Supreme Court has accordingly held that a section 16 plaintiff need not demonstrate actual loss; "he need only demonstrate a significant threat of injury from an impending violation of the antitrust laws or from a contemporary violation likely to continue or recur." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 130, 89 S. Ct. 1562, 23 L. Ed. 2d 129 (1969); [62] accord Cargill, Inc. v. Monfort of Colo., Inc., 479 U.S. 104, 111, 107 S. Ct. 484, 93 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1986); Kruman v. Christie's Int'l. PLC. 284 F.3d 384, 397 (2d Cir. 2002) (abrogated on other grounds).

Finally, defendants misconstrue the term "injury" in the context of the Clayton Act. HN24[] It is true that a plaintiff seeking injunctive relief for an alleged antitrust violation must demonstrate a threat of injury, see Zenith, 395 U.S. at 130, and defendants correctly note that this is a threshold requirement which is appropriately addressed at the class certification stage. See, e.g., *Sullivan v. DB Invs., Inc., No. 08-CV-2785, 667 F.3d 273, 2011 U.S. App. LEXIS 25185, 2011 WL 6367740, at 26 (3d Cir. Dec. 20, 2011) (en banc). But this "injury" need not be demonstrable as an accrued — or even prospective — loss of profits. Instead, Animal Science must simply show a threat of injury "of the type the antitrust laws were designed to prevent and that flows from that which makes defendants' acts unlawful." Consol, Gold Fields PLC v. Minorco, SA, 871 F.2d 252, 257 (2d Cir. 1989) (citing Cargill, 479 U.S. at 111).

Defendants insist that Animal Science has suffered no actual or prospective injury because Animal Science "makes money off each of its purchases [63] and resales of vitamin C" and has continued to make rosy predictions about the company's future growth. In essence, defendants are again waging a pass-on defense: because Animal Science has passed on any overcharge that it suffered as a result of the defendants' conspiracy, Animal Science has suffered no net economic injury and has no right to enjoin the conspiracy.

This theory misconstrues the purpose of the Clayton Act and, if adopted, would foreclose an unacceptable number of antitrust suits seeking injunctive relief. HN25[] The antitrust laws were enacted "for the protection of competition," Cargill, 479 U.S. at 115, and a lessening of competition is "precisely the kind of irreparable injury that injunctive relief under section 16 of the Clayton Act was intended to prevent." California v. Am. Stores Co., 492 U.S. 1301, 1304, 110 S.Ct. 1, 106 L. Ed. 2d 616 (1989) (internal quotation marks omitted). When a purchase is made "after a simulated competition, at a price fixed by [a] trust" in excess of the natural market price, the buyer has suffered an antitrust injury. Chattanooga Foundry & Pipe Works v. Atlanta, 203 U.S. 390, 395-96, 27 S. Ct. 65, 51 L. Ed. 241 (1906); accord In re New Motor Vehicles Canadian Export Antitrust Litig., 522 F.3d 6, 13 (1st Cir. 2008) [64] ("There is no doubt that the types of injuries alleged here — consumers paying artificially inflated prices due to antitrust violations — are antitrust injuries.").

I therefore find that Animal Science's past and prospective purchases of vitamin C at artificially inflated prices constitutes antitrust injury regardless of whether Animal Science recoups this overcharge by passing it along to remote purchasers. This finding is consistent with HN26[] the purpose of section 16 of the Clayton Act, which is to provide courts a "flexible" mechanism with which to serve "the high purpose of enforcing the antitrust laws." Zenith, 395 U.S. at 131. Since courts need not precisely calculate the economic injury inflicted by an artificial price when granting injunctive relief, there is certainly no reason to do so at the class certification stage. The standard for demonstrating antitrust injury under section 16 is accordingly less stringent than the standard for demonstrating antitrust injury in a suit seeking damages, see *In re New [113] Motor Vehicles, 522 F.3d at 12-13, and it is easily met here.

2. Conflicts of Interest

Defendants argue that class counsel has a debilitating conflict of interest caused by their [65] dual representation of the Damages Class and the Injunction Class. This argument is not well-articulated, but defendants quote at length from a District of Maryland case which involved an antitrust class action that was similarly divided between a damages class and an injunction class. See In re Microsoft Corp. Antitrust Litig., 214 F.R.D. 371 (D. Md. 2003). The Microsoft court held that a putative class representative could not adequately protect the interests of both an injunction class and a damages class because the interests of these two classes had the potential to collide. The court explained that the members of the damages class were likely to be interested in a monetary settlement, whereas the members of the injunction class may be compelled to settle for nothing short of a complete injunction on all disputed behavior. This contradiction, the court explained, could force the class representative to choose between rejecting a settlement that would be in the interest of the damages class or "appearing to use the leverage provided by the nationwide injunctive class to achieve a monetary settlement that leaves some members of the injunctive class disgruntled." Id. at 379.

I disagree [66] with the Microsoft court's holding for two reasons. First, by characterizing this problem as "at least an apparent conflict of interest," the Microsoft court implicitly acknowledged that the conflict presented was speculative rather than concrete. Defendants correspondingly insist that "potential conflicts" destroy adequacy in a Rule 23 analysis. This is incorrect; a conflict of interest will not destroy adequacy if it is "merely speculative or hypothetical." Moore et al., supra, § 23.25[2][b][ii]; accord Hnot v. Willis Grp. Holdings Ltd., 228 F.R.D. 476, 486 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("A potential for conflict need not defeat class certification."). In fact, HN27[] the Second Circuit recently held that a conflict posed by dual representation did not justify refusing to certify a class because the conflict was "potential," rather than actual, and because the district court could revisit the issue and de-certify the class if a true conflict ever manifested. Seijas v. Republic of Argentina, 606 F.3d 53, 57 (2d Cir. 2010); accord *Ingles v. City of New York, No. 01-CV-8279, 2003 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2453, 2003 WL 402565, at 6 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 20, 2003) (Chin, J.) ("to the extent any conflicts do arise, I can adjust the definition of the [67] class at that time").

Under my continuing obligation to amend class certification as necessary to ensure that Rule 23's requirements remain satisfied, see Fed. R Civ. P. 23(c)(1)(C), I can revisit this conflict if it ripens.

Second, a conflict of interest will not defeat class certification unless it is "fundamental." In re Flag, 574 F.3d at 35. In other words, a conflict undermines adequacy only if it presents antagonistic interests which "go to the heart of the litigation, relating to the subject matter of the suit." Rubenstein et al, supra, § 18:14; accord *Dziennik v. Sealift, Inc., No. 05-CV-4659, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 38701, 2007 WL 1580080, at 8 (E.D.N.Y. May 29, 2007). The conflict presented here is merely the prospect that class counsel will use manipulative litigation tactics to leverage one class for the benefit of another. This does not touch upon the subject matter of the litigation and is not particular to the facts before me; it is an accusation that could be waged in any case of dual representation. Even if this conflict ripens, therefore, it is unlikely to create a "fundamental" conflict capable of destroying class certification.

Defendants also assert that there is a conflict of interest between [68] two categories of Injunction Class members. Specifically, defendants argue that "direct purchasers are seeking the full amount of any overcharge while indirect purchasers will likely argue that any damages have been passed on to them." This argument is illogical. First, direct purchasers are not seeking to be compensated for an overcharge through the Injunction Class; they are seeking an injunction. Second, to the extent defendants are arguing that there is a conflict of interest between the indirect purchasers of the Injunction Class and the direct purchasers of the Damages Class, this conflict is foreclosed [*114] by Hanover Shoe. Since downstream sales are irrelevant to a damages action under Hanover Shoe, the Damages Class will take no position on whether the overcharge was ultimately passed on to indirect purchasers. The Injunction Class is thus free to litigate this issue without encountering any disagreement between the direct and indirect purchasers.

3. Willingness to Sacrifice Class Interests

Defendants argue that Animal Science and class counsel have structured this lawsuit in a way that splits certain class members' claims. Although all direct purchasers of vitamin C are members [69] of both the Injunction Class and the Damages Class, neither class seeks damages on behalf of indirect purchasers. Since the Injunction Class seeks injunctive relief on behalf of indirect purchasers but fails to pursue damages — to which indirect purchasers may be entitled under state law — defendants argue that the Injunction Class has split the indirect purchasers' claims. The crux of this argument is that principles of res judicata will bar the indirect purchasers from bringing these claims in the future. By forfeiting the indirect purchasers' damages claims, defendants argue, Animal Science and class counsel have exhibited their disregard for the indirect purchasers' interests and have demonstrated their inadequacy to represent the indirect purchasers.

Defendants' basic understanding of claim splitting is correct: HN28[] a final judgment on the merits generally precludes a plaintiff from bringing a new lawsuit raising issues that could have been litigated in the first suit, but were not. See, e.g., Schwab v. Philip Morris USA, Inc., 449 F. Supp. 2d 992, 1076 (E.D.N.Y. 2006) (reversed on other grounds) (citing Federated Dep't Stores, Inc. v. Moitie, 452 U.S. 394, 398, 101 S. Ct. 2424, 69 L. Ed. 2d 103 (1981)). [70] Furthermore, some courts have held that a class representative who splits the claims of absent class members — thereby exposing their non-litigated claims to foreclosure through claim preclusion — is inadequate to represent the class. See, e.g., Feinstein v. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 535 F. Supp. 595, 606 (S.D.N.Y. 1982); In re Universal Serv. Fund Tel. Billing Practices Litig., 219 F.R.D. 661, 668 (D.Kan. 2004).

Contrary to defendants' assertion, however, participation in a Rule 23(b)(2) class seeking injunctive relief does not ordinarily preclude absent class members from bringing their non-litigated claims in subsequent lawsuits. This exception to the general claim-splitting rule has its origin in a puzzling Supreme Court decision from 1984. In Cooper v. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, 467 U.S. 867, 880, 104 S. Ct. 2794, 81 L. Ed. 2d 718 (1984), the Court held that a plaintiff's claim for individual discrimination under Title VII was not precluded by the plaintiffs earlier participation in a class action alleging a "pattern and practice" of discrimination against the same defendant for the same underlying conduct. The Cooper Court recited the principle that a judgment in a class action would [71] extinguish absent class members' claims "on any issue actually litigated and determined," id. at 874, but did not directly address the claim-splitting rule. In fact, the Court's analysis revolved entirely around Title VII principles and never acknowledged that the ordinary rule against claim-splitting would have mandated a different result. See Tobias Barrington Wolff, Preclusion in Class Action Litigation, 105 Colum. L. Rev. 717, 730 (2005) ("The [Cooper] Court confronted a limited question . . . and it offered an answer informed primarily by Title VII policy, making no attempt to explain its result with reference to general preclusion principles.").

Although Cooper did not announce any bright-line rules, some courts have cited this case for the sweeping proposition that HN29[] "a class action judgment . . . binds the class members as to matters actually litigated but does not resolve any claim based on individual circumstances that was not addressed in the class action." Cameron v. Tomes, 990 F.2d 14, 17 (1st Cir. 1993). Moreover, "every federal court of appeals that has considered the question has held that a class action seeking only declaratory or injunctive relief does not bar subsequent [72] individual suits for damages." Hiser v. Franklin, 94 F.3d 1287, 1291 (9th Cir. 1996) (emphasis added); accord *Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1031 (11th [115] Cir. 1993); Norris v. Slothouber, 718 F.2d 1116, 1117, 231 U.S. App. D.C. 78 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (per curiam); Crowder v. Lash 687 F.2d 996,1009 (7th Cir 1982). Although some of these courts have appeared to limit their holdings to particular contexts — such as prisoners' conditions of confinement, see, e.g., Crowder, 687 F.2d at 1009 — the Ninth Circuit has gone so far as to hold that it would offend due process to preclude any suit for damages as a result of prior membership in a Rule 23(b)(2) class seeking only injunctive relief. See Frank v. United Airlines, Inc., 216 F.3d 845, 851 (9th Cir. 2000); Brown v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 982 F.2d 386, 392 (9th Cir. 1992).

Although the Second Circuit has not provided any guidance, I agree with the rationale of the other Circuits that have considered this issue and hold that HN30[] membership in this Rule 23(b)(2) class does not bar the indirect purchasers' subsequent claims for damages. Rule 23(b)(2) does not provide an opportunity for class members to opt out and does not even oblige a district court to afford class members [73] notice of the action; due process therefore requires that class certification under Rule 23(b)(2) be granted only if "broad, class-wide injunctive or declaratory relief is necessary to redress a group-wide injury." Robinson v. Metro-North Commuter R.R. Co., 267 F.3d 147, 162 (2d Cir. 2001). Damages claims usually require individualized analyses of class members' circumstances and thus tend to destroy class certification under Rule 23(b)(2). See id. at 165 (damages may not be recovered by a Rule 23(b)(2) class unless the damages calculation "flows directly from a finding of liability on the claims for class-wide injunctive and declaratory relief (internal quotation marks omitted)).

In the instant case, the indirect purchasers' damages claims vary between states and vary between class members based on the extent to which any overcharge was passed on through each class members' seller. See *In re Flash Memory Antitrust Litig., No. C 07-0086, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 59491, 2010 WL 2332081, at 10 (N.D.Cal. June 9, 2010) ("Recovery in an Indirect-Purchaser case under state law requires a demonstration that a defendant overcharged its Direct-Purchasers for the product at issue, and that those Direct-Purchasers then passed [74] on the overcharges to indirect purchasers."). Such individualized claims would defeat class certification under Rule 23(b)(2), and the class members should therefore be permitted to bring these claims separately.[6]

Although I find that the indirect purchasers' damages claims should not be barred in subsequent suits, it is necessary to discuss the oft-cited notion that "the court conducting the action cannot predetermine the res judicata effect of the judgment." See 18A Charles Alan Wright et al., Federal Practice and Procedure § 4455 (2d ed. 2011). Reliance on this principle has caused at least one district court in this Circuit to refuse to certify a class which [75] sought injunctive relief but excluded some class members' damages claims. See In re Methyl Tertiary Butyl Ether ("MTBE") Prods. Liability Litig., 209 F.R.D. 323 (S.D.N.Y. 2002). Although the In re MTBE court recognized that "courts generally allow plaintiffs in class actions to sue for injunctive relief on behalf of the class and then bring damages claims in subsequent individual actions," the court nevertheless held that it had no way to "ensure" that the court considering such subsequent actions would reach the same result on the issue of claim preclusion. Id. at 340. The court therefore refused to certify the class and declined to make its own ruling regarding the preclusive effect of a suit seeking injunctive relief.

[6] I do not think that allowing class members to opt out of the Injunction Class would solve this problem. Like the Seventh Circuit, I find it "unacceptable" to require an indirect purchaser to "elect between joining an ongoing class suit and thereby forfeiting his right to seek individual damages, on the one hand, and removing himself from the class (and hence risking exclusion from any equitable relief granted) in order to preserve the possibility of bringing a subsequent damage action, on the other." Crowder, 687 F.2d at 1009.

I disagree with the In re MTBE court's approach. The Restatement of Judgments lists several exceptions to the claim-splitting principle, one of which arises when "[t]he court in the first action has expressly reserved the plaintiff's right to maintain the second action." Restatement (Second) of Judgments § 26(1)(b) [*116] (1982). Several Circuits have endorsed this exception. See Mountain Pure, LLC v. Turner Holdings, LLC, 439 F.3d 920, 925 (8th Cir. 2006); Vines v. Univ. of La. at Monroe, 398 F.3d 700, 712 (5th Cir. 2005); [76] Yapp v. Excel Corp., 186 F.3d 1222, 1234 (10th Cir. 1999); Venuto v. Witco Corp., 117 F.3d 754, 758-59 (3rd Cir. 1997). Furthermore, the In re MTBE court's approach has been criticized as saying, in effect, "'I know that you have proposed a class action that may be properly maintainable, but I won't allow you to proceed because I must protect the absentees from the possibility that a subsequent court might misapply my judgment.'" Wolff, supra, at 745. This is an unacceptable result. I hereby expressly reserve the right of the indirect purchasers to maintain their damages claims in subsequent proceedings notwithstanding their participation in the Injunction Class. This, of course, is not a guarantee of what subsequent courts will actually do, but it is sufficient to extinguish defendants' claim-splitting concerns for the purpose of class certification. See Schwab, 449 F. Supp. 2d at 1077.

Animal Science's brief in support of class certification persuasively demonstrates class counsel's belief that their method of structuring this litigation would not result in preclusion of the indirect purchasers' damages claims. The claim-splitting at issue here therefore does not raise any adequacy-related [77] red flags on the part of Animal Science or class counsel. See *Wu v. Pearson Educ., Inc., No. 09-CV-6557, 277 F.R.D. 255, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112308, 2011 WL 4526078, at 13, (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 30, 2011) ("Claim-splitting is [an adequacy] concern only where the class representatives had left aside the far stronger claims for monetary damages and sought to have the weaker claims certified, for dubious strategic purposes." (internal quotation marks omitted)).

E. Ascertain ability

HN31[] Although Rule 23(a) contains no express requirement regarding ascertainability, courts within the Second Circuit have held that the rule impliedly prohibits certification of a class that is not identifiable by reference to objective criteria. See, e.g., Friedman-Katz, 270 F.R.D. 150, 154 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). When a class definition includes a subjective criterion, such as state of mind, the class is not ascertainable and should not be certified. See Spagnola v. Chubb Corp., 264 F.R.D. 76, 97 (S.D.N.Y. 2010). When the class definition consists entirely of objective criteria, a court need only determine whether it would be "administratively feasible" to determine whether or not any given entity belongs to the class. Charron v. Pinnacle Grp. N.Y. LLC, 269 F.R.D. 221, 229 (S.D.N.Y. 2010).

Although [78] a class is not ascertainable if determining class membership would "require a mini-hearing on the merits of each case," see id., a class is not rendered unascertainable merely because an analysis of data is necessary to determine class membership. See Dunnigan v. Metro. Life Ins. Co., 214 F.R.D. 125 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) ("[T]he class can be identified through an examination of the individual files of each of the participants. The fact that this manual process may be slow and burdensome cannot defeat the ascertainability requirement."); In re TFT-LCD (Flat Panel) Antitrust Litig., 267 F.R.D. 583, 592 (N.D.Cal. 2010).

Defendants argue that the Injunction Class is unascertainable because it "contains indefinite multiple levels of indirect vitamin C purchasers, and appears on its face to reach many levels of the business, from direct purchasers to wholesalers, manufacturers, distributors, retailers and consumers." Defendants are correct that the class definition is broad and spans many levels along the distribution chain. However, the criteria used to define the class — whether an entity purchased vitamin C and whether that vitamin C was manufactured by a defendant in this action — are decidedly [79] objective. The fact that these criteria may require an entity to trace the chain of sales via invoices or other company records does not render the class unascertainable, as this process seems administratively feasible. Moreover, HN32[] the ascertainability requirement is less important in a Rule 23(b)(2) class, since a chief objective of this rule is to provide broad injunctive relief to "large and amorphous" classes not capable of certification under Rule 23(b)(3). Marisol A., 126 F.3d at 378; accord Rule 23(b)(2) advisory committee's note (explaining [*117] that an "illustrative" example of a Rule 23(b)(2) class is a civil rights class "whose members are incapable of specific enumeration").

II. Rule 23(b)(2)

HN33[] Class certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2) is appropriate when "the party opposing the class has acted or refused to act on grounds that apply generally to the class, so that final injunctive relief or corresponding declaratory relief is appropriate respecting the class as a whole." Fed. R. Civ. P. 23(b)(2). The justification for allowing certification of such claims is that "the relief sought must perforce affect the entire class at once." Wal-Mart, 131 S. Ct. at 2558. Differences between [80] the extent of harm suffered by each class member do not make Rule 23(b)(2) certification inappropriate. See Marisol A., 126 F.3d at 378.

Defendants argue that certification pursuant to Rule 23(b)(2) is not appropriate because plaintiffs have not established that defendants' conduct had a "common impact" on all class members. Although defendants do not explain this argument clearly, it appears to be a reiteration of their "no irreparable injury" argument. Defendants assert that plaintiffs have failed to show that injunctive relief is appropriate with respect to the class as a whole because plaintiffs have not demonstrated that all class members suffered a net economic harm. I have already explained that this argument has no merit. Defendants' price-fixing conduct is alleged to have caused every class member to purchase vitamin C at an artificially increased price; this is a sufficient "common impact" to warrant certification under Rule 23(b)(2).

Finally, defendants argue that certification under Rule 23(b)(2) is inappropriate because Animal Science's request for an injunction "does not . . . adequately delineate what behavior is lawful and what behavior is unlawful," and is therefore [81] too vague. This argument has no place in a class certification analysis. Of course, the Court will fashion any ultimate injunctive relief in a way that provides reasonable notice to the defendants of what behavior is unlawful.

CONCLUSION

Ranis's [247] motion for certification of the Damages Class is granted. Defendants' [63] motion to dismiss Ranis's claim for damages or strike Ranis's class allegations is denied in its entirety. Animal Science's [242] motion for certification of the Injunction Class is granted. The Court hereby certifies the following classes:

> 1. All persons or entities, or assignees of such persons or entities, who directly purchased vitamin C for delivery in the United States, other than pursuant to a contract containing an arbitration clause, from any of Defendants or their co-conspirators, other than Northeast Pharmaceutical (Group) Co. Ltd., from December 1, 2001 to the present. Excluded from the proposed class are all governmental entities, Defendants, their co-conspirators, and their respective subsidiaries or affiliates.
> 2. All persons or entities, or assignees of such persons or entities, who purchased vitamin C manufactured by Defendants for delivery in the [82] United States, other than pursuant to a contract with a Defendant containing an arbitration clause, requiring injunctive relief against Defendants to end Defendants' antitrust violations.

ORDER DENYING MOTION TO DISMISS SECOND AMENDED COMPLAINT (11-0671); ORDER GRANTING IN PART AND DENYING IN PART MOTION TO DISMISS FIRST AMENDED COMPLAINT (11-4407)

Currently before the Court in Case No. 11-0671 is the motion by defendants Intellectual Ventures I, LLC ("IV-I") and Intellectual Ventures II, LLC ("IV-II") to dismiss five claims from plaintiff Xilinx's Second Amended Complaint. Also before the Court in a related case is the motion by defendants Intellectual Ventures, LLC ("IV"), Intellectual Ventures Management, LLC ("IV Management"), and others to dismiss Xilinx's First Amended Complaint in Case No. 11-4407. Pursuant [*3] to Civil Local Rule 7-1(b), the Court finds these matters appropriate for resolution without oral argument and hereby VACATES the January 27, 2012 hearing. Having considered the papers submitted, and for good cause shown, the Court DENIES the motion to dismiss in 11-0671 and GRANTS in part and DENIES in part the motion in 11-4407.

BACKGROUND

1. Factual background

These cases arise from a common set of facts and allegations. Plaintiff Xilinx is in the business of "designing, developing and marketing complete programmable logic solutions, including advanced integrated circuits, software design tools, predefined system functions delivered as intellectual property cores, design services, customer training, field engineering and customer support." Second Amended Complaint 11-0671 (SAC) [Docket No. 100], ¶ 2; First Amended Complaint 11-4407 (FAC), ¶ 13. The Intellectual Ventures defendants (i.e., IV, IV-I, IV-II, and IV Management), are alleged to be patent holding and management companies which own and manage the rights to more than 30,000 patents and patent applications. SAC, ¶¶ 15-16. [1] Xilinx alleges that in 2005 and 2008 it became a limited partner in two funds — Intellectual Ventures [*4] Fund I and Intellectual Ventures Fund II — held and managed by some of the defendants. Id., ¶ 20-21. Xilinx alleges that in summer 2010 the parties entered negotiations over whether Xilinx would make additional investments in IV Funds to take licenses to certain patent portfolios. Id., ¶ 24. Plaintiff asserts that IV Management refused to consider granting Xilinx licenses to individual patents and Xilinx declined to pay for licenses to the portfolios. Id., ¶ 24.

In late November 2010, Joseph Chernesky (a Vice-President and General Manager of IV and IV Management's Hardware Intellectual Property group) emailed Xilinx's General Counsel asking Xilinx to reconsider its decision not to [*5] elect into additional portfolios and suggested some urgency to renewing the parties' discussions in light of IV Management's intention to move forward "with our plans regarding the FPGA industry." Declaration of Justin Liu, Ex. 1. [2] In response, Xilinx's general counsel requested IV Management to send Xilinx a list of the portfolios that IV/IV Management believed Xilinx should reconsider. Id., Ex. 2. Mr. Chernesky responded on December 7, 2010

[1] The other defendants in Case No. 11-4407 are alleged assignees of patents in suit: Latrosse Technologies, LLC (patent '165), Roldan Block NY, LLC (patent '736), Intellectual Ventures Funding, LLC (patent '061), TR Technologies Foundation (patent '331), LLC, Taichi Holdings, LLC (patent '350), Noregin Assets N.V., LLC (patent '497), and Detelle Relay KG, LLC (patent '251). Plaintiff alleges that these entities are holding companies and that their activities are directed by IV and/or IV Management. FAC, ¶ 24.

[2] As the Court is faced with a motion challenging its jurisdiction, the Court is allowed to review material outside of the complaints at issue. McCarthy v. United States, 850 F.2d 558 (9th Cir. 1988). The Court recognizes that the parties have filed much of the information regarding their business negotiations under seal. However, the Court does not find that the parties have met the good cause standard required for continued sealing to the extent the Court relies on and cites that information in this publicly filed order.

with a list twelve "deals" (portfolios) containing sixteen "key" patents. Id., Ex. 4. That email was followed up the next day by Chernesky informing Xilinx's GC that IV/IV Management had "taken action to enforce our invention rights" by filing suits, including a suit against three of Xilinx's competitors in the FPGA market. Id., Ex. 5. Mr. Chernesky indicated that IV/IV Management took that action only after "business negotiations broke down" and to protect their obligations to investors, inventors and licensees. Id. The parties continued their discussions regarding the lawsuits and the relationship between Xilinx and IV, as well as the list of the sixteen patents from twelve patent portfolios and Xilinx's "election process going forward." Id., [*6] Ex. 7. As part of those negotiations, Xilinx requested that IV/IV Management provide exemplary patent information and claim charts mapping current and future Xilinx products against the sixteen patents being discussed. See id., Ex. 8. In early January, IV/IV Management delivered claim charts for nine of the sixteen "key patents," representing 8 out of the 12 portfolios identified by IV. Lui Decl., ¶ 13.

As the parties' discussions continued, Xilinx asserts that IV Management representatives demanded that Xilinx take a license to all 12 of the patent portfolios (which contained the sixteen "key" patents among others), and set a deadline in late February for conclusion [*7] of the parties' negotiations. Id., ¶ 16. Xilinx alleges that IV Management demanded "tens of millions of dollars" for the licenses and an additional $10 million for future IV acquisitions. Id. Xilinx claims that it did not receive any additional claim charts mapping the remaining patents against Xilinx's products because Xilinx refused to sign a new non-disclosure and FRE 408 agreement and IV Management would not produce the remaining charts without it. Id., ¶ 19. IV/IV Management's representative acknowledges that IV produced claim charts for only a subset of the patents at issue, but offers no explanation as to why. See Declaration of Joseph F. Chernesky [Doc. No. 78], ¶ 4. IV/IV Management's representative also asserts that at no point did IV refuse to allow Xilinx to invest into a "subset of the portfolios identified during the 'true-up' process," but does not dispute Xilinx's point that IV refused to allow Xilinx to take individual licenses to any of the "key" patents. Id.

The parties' negotiations broke down when Xilinx filed the 11-0671 suit on February 14, 2010 and the next day defendants filed an amended complaint in an action pending in Delaware action adding Xilinx as a defendant. [*8] Liu Decl., Ex. 16.

2. Procedural background

On December 8, 2010, some of the IV defendants in these actions filed suit against three of Xilinx's competitors in the District Court of Delaware (Delaware action). That action contends that Xilinx's competitors are infringing four of IV's patents, which patents are among the sixteen "key" patents identified by the IV defendants in the negotiations with Xilinx. Following the filing of the Delaware action and the breakdown of the parties' negotiations, Xilinx filed Case No. 11-0671 SI in this Court on February 14, 2011. That lawsuit originally named numerous defendants, including IV, IV Management, IV-I and IV-II. The suit sought a declaratory judgment of non-infringement and invalidity as to each of the sixteen patents identified by the IV defendants as "key." On February 15, 2011, the IV entities litigating the Delaware action filed an amended complaint adding Xilinx as a defendant. Subsequently, defendants moved to dismiss the complaint pending here (No. 11-0671 SI), or in the alternative, to transfer the claims regarding the four "overlapping" patents to the Court in Delaware. Plaintiff responded by moving the Court to enjoin defendants [*9] from prosecuting the claims against Xilinx in the Delaware action.

In ruling on the motions, this Court held that plaintiff's declaratory relief claims regarding the four patents at issue in the Delaware action should be transferred to the Delaware court. July 27, 2011 Order [Docket No. 86] at 6. This Court also dismissed Xilinx's claims with respect to seven patents (patents '251, '736, '165, '331, '350, '497, and '061) because those patents were not owned by or assigned to any parties to the suit. Id., at 5. With respect to the remaining five patents (patents '527, '415, '865, '001 and '301), the Court granted defendants' motion to dismiss for failure to plead the invalidity assertions with specificity and failure to identify the products or conduct alleged not to infringe. Id., at 9-10. Plaintiff was given leave to amend. Finally, the Court dismissed defendants Invention Investment Fund I LLP, Invention Investment Fund II LLC, Intellectual Ventures LLC, and Intellectual Ventures Management LLC from the 11-0671 action, because they were not shown to have any ownership interest in the five remaining patents in suit. Id., at 10. Plaintiff filed its Amended Complaint against the two [*10] remaining defendants (IV-I and IV-II) on August 18, 2011, and by stipulation, filed the operative Second Amended Complaint on September 30, 2011.

On September 2, 2011, Xilinx filed Case No. C 11-4407, and filed a First Amended Complaint on October 17, 2011. In that case, Xilinx re-raises it claims for a declaratory judgment of invalidity against the seven patents dismissed from the 11-0671 action (patent nos. '251, '736, '165, '331, '350, '497, and '061), and adds as defendants the entities who are on record with the USPTO as being the assignees for each of those seven patents.

DISCUSSION

1. Motion to Dismiss SAC in 11-0671

Defendants IV-I and IV-II (collectively "IV" for purposes of this motion) move to dismiss claims five through ten of the SAC. Those claims involve three patents: the '865 patent, the '001 patent, and the '301 patent. IV argues that no real, immediate controversy exists between the parties regarding these patents sufficient to sustain declaratory judgment jurisdiction.

The Declaratory Judgment Act provides that "[i]n a case of actual controversy within its jurisdiction . . . any court of the United States . . . may declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested [*11] party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought." 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). The dispute, however, must be "real and substantial" and "definite and concrete, touching the legal relations of parties having adverse legal interests[.]" MedImmune, Inc. v. Genentech, Inc., 549 U.S. 118, 127, 127 S. Ct. 764, 166 L. Ed. 2d 604 (2007). A district court must ask "whether the facts alleged, under all the circumstances, show that there is a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the issuance of a declaratory judgment." Id. (citations omitted). To determine whether jurisdiction exists, the party invoking jurisdiction must point to "some affirmative act by the patentee" that forms the basis for an actual controversy between the parties. Prasco, LLC v. Medicis Pharm. Corp., 537 F.3d 1329, 1338-39 (Fed. Cir. 2008). The "affirmative act" necessary to sustain declaratory judgment jurisdiction can arise in "a variety of ways, for example, by creating a reasonable apprehension of an infringement suit . . . demanding the right to royalty payments, . . . or creating a barrier to the regulatory approval of a product that is necessary [*12] for marketing." Id.,537 F.3d at 1339; but see Trend Micro Corp. v. WhiteCell Software, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 12248 (N.D. Cal. Feb. 8, 2011) (finding lack of declaratory judgment jurisdiction where defendant patent holder "has not made any claim that [plaintiff] infringes" its patent, has not "threatened or otherwise communicated" with plaintiff regarding infringement of that patent, and has "not even performed an infringement analysis to determine whether any" of plaintiff's products may infringe the patent).

A. '865 and '001 Patents

Defendants argue that there is no definite and immediate controversy between the parties with respect to Xilinx's non-infringement claims under the '865 and '001 patents because IV Management did not accuse any specific Xilinx product of infringing these two patents and did not, as part of the parties' business negotiations in late 2010 and early 2011, provide claim charts for the '865 or '001 patents (while it did provide claim charts for other patents at issue). See Motion to Dismiss (MTD) SAC at 9-10.

The Court finds that, on the record before it, Xilinx has demonstrated a real and definite dispute between the parties sufficient to confer declaratory [*13] judgment jurisdiction over Xilinx's non-infringement claims as to the '865 and '001 patents. The Court notes that it was IV's representative who identified these two patents among the sixteen "key" patents IV believed should be "of interest" to Xilinx. See, e.g., Liu Decl, Ex. 4. IV made this identification in the context of business negotiations and in an attempt to convince Xilinx that it should "true-up" and invest in the twelve portfolios containing the sixteen "key" patents. Id., Ex. 7. IV, however, refused to allow Xilinx to take licenses to any of the individual "key" patents, insisting that Xilinx instead "elect" into some or all of the twelve portfolios. While IV makes much of the fact that it did not threaten Xilinx with litigation, but instead was simply engaging in "business negotiations," the Court notes that IV identified the sixteen key patents for Xilinx shortly before filing suit against three of Xilinx's competitors in order to "enforce" IV's intellectual property rights but only "after our efforts to engage these companies in business discussions broke down." Liu Decl., Ex 5. This conduct all indicates that a real, immediate case or controversy exists. See, e.g., [*14] Hewlett-Packard Co. v. Acceleron LLC, 587 F.3d 1358, 1363 (Fed. Cir. 2009) (finding correspondence exchanged between a patent holding company and a manufacturer, where correspondence referenced patent held by company as well as a product line of manufacturer's and imposed a deadline for a response, was sufficient to create declaratory judgment jurisdiction)

Though IV now attempts to argue that there is no "real" and "immediate" controversy over the '865 and '001 patents, based on the record before the Court it appears that those patents were a necessary part of IV's attempt to induce Xilinx to invest in broad portfolios of patents, by holding out Xilinx's alleged need to secure licenses to the sixteen "key" patents. Although IV did not provide Xilinx with claim charts for the '865 and '001 patents, that could be because either Xilinx refused to sign a new NDA/408 agreement (as Xilinx asserts, Liu Decl., ¶ 19) or because IV did not believe —despite its attempts to convince Xilinx otherwise — that Xilinx should be interested in the '865 and '001 patents in light of its current and future products. In support of its motion, IV's declarant explains that despite Xilinx's request for claim [*15] charts for each of the sixteen "key" patents, IV "prepared and delivered" to Xilinx charts for only a subset of the patents. IV does not explain why it did this, or attempt to rebut Xilinx's argument. See, e.g., Chernesky Decl., ¶ 4. Similarly, while IV's declarant asserts that the true-up process did not involve allegations of "infringement" with respect to the '865 and '001 patents, IV does not introduce evidence that it backed away from its belief that the '865 and '001 patents were "key" and should be of interest to Xilinx given Xilinx's current or future products, or that IV stopped pushing Xilinx to invest in the specific portfolios containing these two "key" patents. Id., ¶ 5. These factors, and IV's failure to adequately rebut plaintiff's evidence and arguments, also support a finding of a real, immediate case or controversy. Cf. Microsoft Corp. v. Phoenix Solutions, Inc., 741 F. Supp. 2d 1156, 1162 (C.D. Cal. 2010) (finding declaratory judgment jurisdiction where correspondence between parties identified fifteen patents and sought to negotiate licenses over fifteen patents, even though defendant subsequently provided claim charts for only nine patents). [3]

In sum, Xilinx has pointed to sufficient evidence to show that IV's own actions have created a substantial controversy, between the parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the exercise of declaratory judgment jurisdiction over Xilinx' invalidity claims with respect to the '865 and '001 patents.

B. '301 Patent

IV argues that there is no justiciable [*17] controversy as to non-infringement between the parties as to the '301 patent because Xilinx fails to identify a current or future product with "sufficient specificity" that contains or will contain an "ARM dual-core Cortex A9 MPC Core processor;" a component which allegedly infringes Claim 4 of the '301 patent. MTD SAC at 6-8. In opposition, Xilinx states that at "least one of its 28 nm programmable logic products, including a variation of the 7-Series FPGA does indeed contain an ARM core processor," as alleged in paragraph 95 of the SAC. Xilinx Oppo. to MTD SAC at 12. Xilinx also points out that in IV's own claim chart for the '301 patent, IV describes how the ARM Core processor is used with Xilinx's 28 nm programmable logic technology. Liu Decl., Ex. 11 at 1. Moreover, Xilinx provides evidence that devices incorporating the ARM Core processor have not only been announced to the public, but are also being fabricated and tested and the first devices scheduled for production in early 2012. Lui Decl., ¶ 26. The Court finds that Xilinx has made an adequate showing that is has potentially infringing products far enough along in not only the development process but the production process [*18] to create a real, concrete and immediate exposure to infringement liability. Cf. Sierra Applied Scis., Inc. v. Advanced Energy Indus., 363 F.3d 1361, 1379 (Fed. Cir. 2004) (party asserting declaratory judgment jurisdiction needs to show that "design of the potentially infringing subject of the declaratory-judgment suit [is] substantially fixed" to support jurisdiction); see also Int'l Harvester Co. v. Deere & Co., 623 F.2d 1207, 1216 (7th Cir. 1980) (dismissing for lack of case or controversy where "because of the relatively early stage of its development, the design which is before us now may not be the design which is ultimately produced and marketed.").

[3] The Court has reviewed [*16] the case cited in defendants' statement of recent decision, Streck, Inc. v. Research & Diagnostic Sys., 665 F.3d 1269, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 458 (Fed. Cir. Jan. 10, 2012), but finds that case inapposite. In Streck, the issue before the Court was whether the district court had declaratory relief jurisdiction over defendants' cross-claims for invalidity with respect to all claims for all of the patents in dispute, where the plaintiff was asserting only some claims against defendants' products. The Federal Circuit affirmed the district court's holding that jurisdiction existed against only the asserted claims, and reiterated that the standard for declaratory relief jurisdiction, under MedImmune, is that a party seeking declaratory judgment has the burden of establishing jurisdiction under the totality of circumstances test.

C. Declaratory Judgment for Invalidity Claims

IV argues that because the Court does not have declaratory judgment jurisdiction over Xilinx's non-infringement claims with respect to the '865, '001 and '301 patents, the Court likewise does not have jurisdiction over Xilinx's claims as to invalidity in Claims Six, Eight and Ten of the SAC. However, because the Court has found sufficient jurisdiction over the non-infringement claims, it has jurisdiction over the invalidity claims asserted in Claims Six, Eight and Ten.

D. Scope of Declaratory [*19] Relief

Finally, defendants ask the Court to dismiss Xilinx's declaratory relief claims to the extent Xilinx seeks declaratory relief of non-infringement for "all" Xilinx products. IV argues that, despite Xilinx's identification of specific products or product families to support each of its non-infringement allegations in the SAC, the non-infringement claims are still impermissibly broad and indefinite. The Court rejects this argument and finds that Xilinx has adequately responded to the concerns expressed in the Court's July 27, 2011 Order and identified specific products and product families that it claims are non-infringing. In the July 2011 Order, the Court noted that Xilinx's total failure to identify any product or product line with specificity did "not allow defendants to assess the true nature of any potential counterclaims that they have, nor can they mount a meaningful defense in the face of such bare allegations." Order at 10. Here, however, Xilinx has identified a specific product or product family which it asserts do not infringe with respect to each of the patents at issue. See SAC at ¶¶ 35, 50, 65, 80, 95 & pgs. 15-16. That is sufficient at this stage to allow IV to mount [*20] its defense.

For the foregoing reasons, defendants' motion to dismiss the SAC is DENIED.

2. Motion to dismiss complaint in 11-4407

A. Non-infringement claims with respect to '061 patent

Defendants argue that declaratory judgment jurisdiction does not exist for the non-infringement claims as to the '061 patent for the same reasons argued above with respect to the '865 and '001 patents — i.e., that IV and IV Management did not accuse any specific Xilinx product of infringing the '061 patent and did not provide a '061 claim chart. See MTD FAC at 12-13. However, as above, the Court finds that given the context of the parties' licensing negotiations, Xilinx has presented sufficient evidence to show that IV and IV Management's actions have created a substantial controversy, between parties having adverse legal interests, of sufficient immediacy and reality to warrant the exercise of declaratory judgment jurisdiction over Xilinx' invalidity claims with respect to the '061 patent.

B. Non-infringement claims with respect to '251 and '331 patents

Defendants argue that declaratory judgment jurisdiction does not exist over the non-infringement claims as to the '251 and '331 patents for the same reasons [*21] argued above with respect to the '301 patent. See MTD FAC at 9-10. However, as above, the Court finds that Xilinx has made an adequate showing that is has potentially infringing products — incorporating the ARM Core processor — far enough along in the development and production process to create a real, concrete and immediate exposure to infringement liability. [4]

C. UCL claim

Defendants also move to dismiss pursuant to Rule 12(b)(6) Xilinx's claim under California's Unfair Competition Law (UCL), Business and Professions Code section 17200. To survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, the plaintiff must allege "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." [*22] Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). This "facial plausibility" standard requires the plaintiff to allege facts that add up to "more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). While courts do not require "heightened fact pleading of specifics," a plaintiff must allege facts sufficient to "raise a right to relief above the speculative level." Twombly, 550 U.S. at 544, 555

In the FAC, Xilinx alleges that order to convince Xilinx to make future investments in IV Funds, defendants IV and IV Management made various misrepresentations — in particular that IV or IV Management owned, had the right to license and the right to enforce the patents at issue in the parties' discussions. FAC, ¶ 146. Xilinx asserts that it was harmed by this conduct because it was forced to "expend time and resources litigating" the jurisdictional issue of who could enforce the patents in the first case (No. 11-0671) on the prior round of motions to dismiss. Id., ¶ 154. Xilinx also asserts that had it known that IV or IV Management "had no rights to enforce" the patents at issue in this case, Xilinx would not have "expended the [*23] time and resources to investigate the claims or to negotiate for a possible license." Id., ¶ 155. Xilinx alleges IV and IV Management's conduct was "unfair" under the UCL. Id., ¶ 160.

Conduct is "unfair" under the UCL when either it "threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law," see Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co., 20 Cal. 4th 163, 187, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (Cal. 1999) (applying heightened standard to "competitor claims"); or when the practice "offends an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers," see, e.g., Smith v. State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co., 93 Cal. App. 4th 700, 719, 113 Cal. Rptr. 2d 399 (Cal. App. 2001) (quotation omitted); see also Distor v. US Bank NA, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 98361, 22-23 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 22, 2009) (under this test, the court weighs the utility of the defendant's conduct against the gravity of the harm to the alleged victim). The Ninth Circuit has recognized that California courts have not settled on which test — the heightened Cel-Tech [*24] test or the more lenient balancing test — applies to claims that the arise in the consumer context and not the competitor-to-competitor context. See Lozano v. AT&T Wireless Servs., 504 F.3d 718, 736 (9th Cir. 2007). This Court need not decide which standard applies in this case (i.e., whether Xilinx and IV Management are competitors when IV Management is simply a holding company and produces no products) because Xilinx has failed to allege a UCL claim even under the more lenient standard.

There are two significant problems with Xilinx's UCL claim. First, Xilinx fails to acknowledge that even if a party does not own a patent or is not an assignee with standing to sue on that patent, it can still be a party authorized to engage in licensing discussions. See, e.g., Propat Int'l Corp. v. RPost US, Inc., 473 F.3d 1187, 1192 (Fed. Cir. 2007) (recognizing that patent owners may give third parties the right to license, select targets of suit and other "power of attorney" powers, without conferring on third parties the right to sue and enforce the patent). Xilinx acknowledges that IV and IV Management are patent holding companies and Xilinx has not alleged any conduct that reasonably exceeds [*25] the power of someone authorized to engage in patent licensing discussions on behalf of the patents' owners. In other words, even if IV and/or IV Management did not own or were not the assignee for the patents under discussion, assuming IV is authorized to license the patents at issue the conduct alleged cannot be considered "immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers."

[4] IV again argues that declaratory judgment jurisdiction for invalidity claims is lacking because there is no jurisdiction over the non-infringement claims. As above, that argument is rejected. IV also re-raises its argument that Xilinx's non-infringement claims are impermissibly broad in seeking a judgment that "all" Xilinx products do not infringe. As above, the Court rejects that argument and finds that Xilinx's FAC adequately specifies the products and families of products, so that IV can defend this case.

As a second matter, Xilinx has failed to allege sufficient facts to support its allegation of injury from IV and IV Management's misrepresentations. Under the UCL, only someone who has suffered an "economic injury arising from reliance" on a party's misrepresentations has standing to sue. Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 327, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877 (2011). Xilinx's first allegation of injury — that Xilinx was forced to expend time and resources litigating jurisdictional issues in No. 11-0671 — is insufficient as a matter of law. Litigation costs cannot form the basis of "harm" under the UCL to confer standing. See Buckland v. Threshold Enterprises, Ltd., 155 Cal. App. 4th 798, 816, 66 Cal. Rptr. 3d 543 (Cal. App. 2007), overruled on other grounds by Kwikset Corp. v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. 4th 310, 120 Cal. Rptr. 3d 741, 246 P.3d 877. [5]

Xilinx's second alleged harm is also insufficient. Xilinx alleges simply that if it had been informed that IV and IV Management did not have "rights to enforce" the patents at issue in this case, it would not have expended time and resources to investigate the claims or negotiate licenses. Xilinx, however, ignores the licensing issue. There are no facts alleged to support the assertion that Xilinx would not have engaged in these same investigations and negotiations if — as defendants contend — IV and IV Management were authorized to engage in licensing [*27] discussions for the patents.

For the foregoing reasons, plaintiff's UCL claim must be dismissed. The Court has significant doubts as to whether Xilinx will be able to amend to cure these deficiencies, but will give plaintiff leave to amend.

D. Discretion to decline declaratory judgment jurisdiction

In its Reply, for the first time, defendants request that if the Court finds that an actual case or controversy exists, it should nonetheless exercise its discretion and decline declaratory judgment jurisdiction. See EMC Corp. v. Norand Corp., 89 F.3d 807, 810 (Fed. Cir. 1996) (even if "there is an actual controversy, the district court is not required to exercise declaratory judgment jurisdiction, but has discretion to decline that jurisdiction."). To support their request, defendants argue that any conduct that led to the existence of declaratory judgment jurisdiction was the result of Xilinx asking IV and/or IV Management for a list of patents it should "consider" and the exchange of claim charts requested by Xilinx. This argument, however, overlooks the fact that IV and IV Management started these business negotiations by approaching Xilinx, proposing that there were a number of portfolios [*28] that Xilinx should reconsider investing in, and suggesting an "urgency" requiring discussions within the next "few weeks" because IV intended to move forward with "its plans regarding the FPGA industry." Liu Decl., Ex. 1. The IV entities then sued three of Xilinx's competitors in the FPGA industry two weeks later. Id., Ex. 5. The Court concludes that the IV defendants created the circumstances supporting declaratory judgment jurisdiction.

Defendants also argue that the "real" dispute between the parties is in the Delaware action (against Xilinx and its three competitors) and that Xilinx filed in this Court simply to gain a foothold here. Defendants also assert that because Xilinx argued that the Delaware action should be stayed pending the USPTO's examination of patents at issue in that case and because Xilinx or its counsel have likewise initiated reexamination proceedings on at least six of the seven patents in suit in this case, equity does not counsel proceeding with this case. However, no motion to stay in light of any actions by the USPTO has been made to this Court. If one is made, the Court will consider it. At this juncture, the Court believes this action should proceed and [*29] will not exercise its discretion to decline jurisdiction.

[5] Also, [*26] as IV points out, in Xilinx's original complaint in the 11-0671 action, Xilinx itself alleged that IV Management had not shown it had the right to "bring an action" to enforce any of the patents at issue in this case. See, e.g., 11-0671 Docket No. 1, ¶ 38 ('251 patent). It is hard to see how Xilinx was misled by these representations when it apparently knew that IV and/or IV Management were not assignees at least by the time Xilinx filed suit in February 2011. Moreover, the current assignee of a patent can be readily discerned from the United State Patent and Trade Office website. See <http://assignments.uspto.gov/assignments/?db=pat>.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court DENIES defendants' motion to dismiss the Second Amended Complaint in 11-0671. The Court GRANTS defendants' motions to dismiss the UCL claim in the First Amended Complaint in 11-4407, and DENIES the remainder of the motion. If plaintiff wishes to file an amended complaint addressing the deficiencies in its UCL claim it must do so on or before February 6, 2012.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

MEMORANDUM OPINION

CHARLES P. KOCORAS, District Judge:

This matter comes before the Court on Counter-Defendant Iberdrola Renewables, Inc.'s ("Iberdrola") motion to dismiss Counter-Plaintiff Outland Renewable Energy, LLC, Outland Renewable Energy Field Services, LLC, and Outland Energy Services, LLC's (collectively, "Outland") counterclaim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). For the reasons set forth below, Iberdrola's motion is granted.

BACKGROUND[1]

This lawsuit arises out of personal injuries that Aaron McCoy ("McCoy"), an Outland employee, suffered while performing maintenance services on a wind turbine manufactured by Gamesa Wind U.S., LLC ("Gamesa"). The wind turbine was located at the Cayuga Ridge wind farm ("Cayuga Ridge"), a wind farm operated by Iberdrola. Though the case was born as a personal injury suit, [*5] it has expanded into a web of counterclaims, crossclaims, and counter-crossclaims that are, at best, only tangentially related to McCoy's injuries. Outland's present counterclaim, for example, includes allegations of antitrust violations and tortious interference with business relationships that have no bearing on McCoy's negligence suit.

[1] For the purposes of a motion to dismiss, the Court accepts all well-pleaded allegations in the complaint as true. Justice v. Town of Cicero, 577 F.3d 768, 771 (7th Cir. 2009).

The Gamesa-Outland Relationship

Gamesa manufactures and sells wind turbines to various wind farms. At its peak, Gamesa controlled more than 10% of the U.S. market for wind turbine sales. As part of the sale of its turbines, Gamesa requires that purchasers contract with Gamesa for operation, maintenance, and repair services ("O&M Services") for the wind turbines for a specified period of time. As Gamesa does not have an internal O&M Services division, it subcontracts its O&M Services to other companies such as Outland.

Between August 2006 and October 2008, Gamesa subcontracted its O&M services to Outland through purchase orders, which would encompass work for a specific task or set of tasks. By 2010, Outland generated approximately $6.1 million in revenue through Gamesa purchase orders.

To ensure longer-term commitments, Gamesa and Outland entered into [*6] a Framework Services Agreement (the "FSA") on October 3, 2008. Under the FSA, Gamesa would subcontract its O&M Services to Outland at certain Iberdrola-operated wind farms for a longer period of time. On November 19, 2009 Outland and Gamesa entered into a new agreement, the Maintenance Services Agreement (the "MSA"). Purchase orders executed under the MSA placed additional Iberdrola wind farms, including Cayuga Ridge, under a long-term agreement. The MSA further required Outland to train its employees on health and safety standards and to comply with any of Iberdrola's site-specific rules and safety procedures.

The Gamesa-Iberdrola Relationship

Prior to this action, Iberdrola had been purchasing wind turbines from Gamesa for use on its wind farms. In 2009, Gamesa and Iberdrola entered into a strategic agreement to jointly develop and operate wind farms. Outland alleges that as of 2009 Iberdrola owned approximately 25% of Gamesa and currently owns approximately 14% of Gamesa.

The Safety Protocols and McCoy's Injury

Outland technicians use a "lock-out, tag-out" ("LOTO") safety procedure when dealing with potentially hazardous electrical energy. Under the LOTO procedure, the turbine is powered [*7] down and a technician locks the controls such that the turbine cannot be powered up while the lock is in place. Each individual technician maintains his own lock and controls the key to that lock, and no other individual can remove the lock and power up the turbine. The technician then applies a tag to the lock upon which he describes the nature of the maintenance he is performing to inform other technicians of the need for the lock. The tag states that it is only to be removed by the person who affixed it to the lock. Having applied the lock and tag, the technician may climb to the top of the turbine tower to safely perform maintenance services. The LOTO procedure complies with industry standards and federal regulations.

In September 2010, Iberdrola and Gamesa modified the standard LOTO procedure such that a technician would not retain his key after locking the power controls. Rather, the technician would leave the key near the lock while he scaled the tower to service the turbine. Upon completing his work, the technician would retreat to a "safe zone" away from hazardous electrical equipment and communicate via radio with an Iberdrola technician, who would unlock the power controls [*8] and power up the turbine. Upon ensuring that the turbine was functioning properly, the technician would climb down from the tower. This modified LOTO procedure increased efficiency, as a technician would not need to repeatedly climb up and down the tower and re-energize the turbine to perform multiple maintenance operations. Outland's off-site management was unaware of the use of the modified LOTO procedure.

On October 20, 2010, McCoy and several other Outland technicians were working uptower in different turbines at Cayuga Ridge. The technicians were using the modified LOTO procedure rather than the standard LOTO procedure. When one technician radioed an Iberdrola technician to re-energize a wind turbine, the Iberdrola technician mistakenly powered up the turbine that McCoy was servicing. This resulted in an electrical explosion that caused McCoy's injuries.

As a result of the accident, the United States Occupational Health and Safety Administration ("OSHA") conducted an investigation. On April 8, 2011 OSHA issued six citations to Outland concerning the modified LOTO procedure. Although neither Gamesa nor Iberdrola were cited, Outland alleges that OSHA informally warned Iberdrola that [*9] it would seek criminal penalties if another accident occurred at an Iberdrola site.

Gamesa's Attempted Takeover of Outland

In the summer of 2010, Gamesa shifted its business model. Rather than continuing to subcontract its O&M Services to other companies, Gamesa decided to develop an internal O&M Services division. However, Gamesa had assured Outland that the companies would not compete. Despite these assurances, Gamesa openly attempted to recruit Outland technicians. These attempts were ultimately unsuccessful, with only a few Outland technicians moving to Gamesa. Finally, in January 2011, the head of service at Gamesa expressed interest in formally acquiring Outland. Outland's President declined Gamesa's offer.

Gamesa then allegedly secretly attempted to put Outland out of business so that it could hire its employees at minimal cost while simultaneously eliminating Outland as a competitor. Throughout this time, Gamesa allegedly misrepresented to Outland that Outland would continue to receive Gamesa's purchase orders.

On February 17, 2011 Outland and Duke Energy, one of Iberdrola's competitors, entered into a letter of intent pursuant to which Duke Energy would purchase a 25% interest [*10] in Outland. Gamesa determined that this deal could potentially allow Outland to withstand Gamesa's destablization attempts. On February 26, 2011 Gamesa called Outland and stated that Iberdrola may refuse to allow Outland to perform O&M Services on its wind farms if the deal went through because Iberdrola and Duke Energy were competitors. However, on March 27, 2011 Outland contacted Iberdrola directly. Iberdrola informed Outland that it endorsed Outland's prospective agreement with Duke Energy and reassured Outland that the competition between Duke Energy and Iberdrola was not a concern.

As a result of this conversation, Gamesa allegedly escalated its approach. On April 14, 2011 Gamesa called Duke directly and stated that it opposed Duke Energy's agreement with Iberdrola. During this conversation, Gamesa attempted to induce Duke to abstain from purchasing an interest in Outland, but Duke Energy rejected Gamesa's interference. On May 11, 2011 Duke Energy and an unnamed institutional investor entered into an agreement with Outland for the sale of 100% of the interests in Outland.

The very next day, Gamesa sent a letter to Outland declaring Outland in default under the MSA for violation [*11] of the health and safety requirements of the agreement and cited to the OSHA violations issued to Outland. Gamesa also stated that Iberdrola demanded that Gamesa remove Outland from all of its wind farms. Shortly thereafter, Gamesa ceased subcontracting any new business to Outland. Within days thereafter, both Duke Energy and the unnamed institutional investor reduced the amount that they were willing to pay for Outland by approximately $15 million dollars. The acquisition ultimately failed.

In various letters between May and July 2011, Gamesa reiterated that Outland was in default under the MSA and the dormant FSA. On August 31, 2011 Gamesa's attorneys sent letters to Outland in which they disclosed that Gamesa had contacted various third parties in an attempt to interfere with Outland's ability to receive subcontracts with these third parties. Outland alleges that Gamesa acted in concert, combination, or conspiracy with Iberdrola throughout these events.

Procedural Posture

On December 7, 2010 McCoy filed a negligence action against Gamesa's parent corporation, Gamesa Technology Corporation, Inc., and Iberdrola in Illinois state court, which was removed to this Court on January 26, 2011. [*12] [2] Iberdrola filed a third-party complaint against Outland for contribution, upon which Outland mounted its offensive, which included a twenty-three count counterclaim against Gamesa and a nine count counterclaim against Iberdrola. Iberdrola now moves to dismiss Outland's counterclaim in its entirety.

LEGAL STANDARD

A Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is used to test the legal sufficiency of a complaint. To state a claim, the allegations in the complaint must set forth a "short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief." Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2). While detailed factual allegations are not required, a plaintiff must provide enough factual support to raise his right to relief above a speculative level. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). "Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice;" rather, a claim must provide sufficient factual matter "to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009) [*13] (citing Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570). In ruling on a motion to dismiss, a court accepts all well-pleaded facts and allegations as true and draws all reasonable inferences in the plaintiff's favor. Justice v. Town of Cicero, 577 F.3d 768, 771 (7th Cir. 2009).

DISCUSSION

The nine counts of Outland's counterclaim fall into three broad categories: (1) claims for tortious interference with business relationships (Counts I-V), (2) antitrust claims (Counts VI, VII, and IX), and (3) a request for injunctive relief (Count VIII). Although the gravamen of Outland's claims involve Gamesa's behavior, Outland implicates Iberdrola in the majority of its claims by alleging that Gamesa and Iberdrola conspired to engage in the illicit conduct. Therefore, we first address Outland's conspiracy allegations.

I. Conspiracy

Outland's claims against Iberdrola are premised upon two conspiracy theories. First, Outland alleges that Gamesa and Iberdrola tortiously interfered with Outland's business relationships by conspiring to eliminate Outland as a competitor. Second, Outland alleges that Gamesa and Iberdrola violated several federal and state antitrust laws by both conspiring to eliminate Outland as a competitor [*14] and by conspiring to engage in an unlawful tying arrangement. We address each of these conspiracy theories in turn.

A. Conspiracy to Eliminate Outland

To establish a civil conspiracy under Illinois law, a plaintiff must show that each alleged conspirator "knowingly and voluntarily participated in a common scheme to commit an unlawful act or a lawful act in an unlawful manner." McClure v. Owens Corning Fiberglas Corp., 188 Ill. 2d 102, 720 N.E.2d 242, 258, 241 Ill. Dec. 787 (Ill. 1999).

---

[2] On August 30, 2011 McCoy filed an amended complaint naming Gamesa and Streator-Cayuga Ridge Wind Power, LLC as additional defendants.

Allegations that the parties entered into an agreement must include sufficient factual support to raise the right to relief above the speculative level. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555.

Outland's counterclaim falls woefully short of implicating Iberdrola in a conspiracy, either directly or circumstantially. Outland premises its conspiracy allegations exclusively on two facts. First, Outland points to the financial ties between Gamesa and Iberdrola as an indication that Iberdrola would benefit if Gamesa's plan was successful. Second, Outland alleges that Iberdrola required or urged Gamesa to remove Outland from its wind farms. However, these allegations, even if true, do not allow for the reasonable inference that there was a broader agreement between [*15] Iberdrola and Gamesa to destroy Outland. Outland's counterclaim encompasses allegedly tortious conduct by Gamesa that spans nearly a year, but Outland has not alleged at what point Iberdrola agreed to participate in Gamesa's plan. Rather, Outland conclusorily alleges that Iberdrola acted "in concert, combination, or conspiracy" with Gamesa, and this naked assertion does not raise the possibility of a conspiracy above the speculative level. [3]

To the contrary, Outland's counterclaim demonstrates that Gamesa acted [*16] independently of Iberdrola. A court may dismiss a claim if the complaint includes facts that undermine the claim. McMillian v. Litscher, 72 Fed. App'x 438, 441 (7th Cir. 2003); *Junction Solutions, LLC v. MBS Dev., Inc., No. 06 C 1632, 2007 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 86953, 2007 WL 4234091, at 5 (N.D. Ill. Nov. 20, 2007) (citing EEOC v. Concentra Health Servs., Inc., 496 F.3d 773, 776 (7th Cir. 2007)). Outland's naked assertion of a conspiracy is belied by the allegations that Gamesa had its own agenda and was acting independently of Iberdrola. For example, Outland's allegation that Iberdrola "required or urged" Gamesa to remove Outland from its wind farms suggests that the companies were not involved in a common scheme. Additionally, when Iberdrola informed Outland that it endorsed the Duke Energy acquisition and that the agreement was "not a concern," Gamesa was forced to "escalate its approach" to destabilize Outland. This suggests that Iberdrola had actually subverted Gamesa's plan.

Ultimately, Outland details Gamesa's plan through twenty pages of allegations, after which it conclusorily alleges that Iberdrola acted "in concert, combination, or conspiracy" with Gamesa. This conclusory allegation is insufficient to survive [*17] a motion to dismiss. Accordingly, Counts III and IV, which exclusively implicate Iberdrola through allegations of a civil conspiracy to eliminate Outland as a competitor, are dismissed.

B. Antitrust Conspiracy

Counts VI, VII, and IX allege antitrust violations arising under two distinct theories. First, Outland alleges that Gamesa and Iberdrola violated the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 1-7, and the Texas Free Enterprise and Antitrust Act, Tex. Bus. & Com. Code § 15.50 (the "Texas Antitrust Act"), [4] by conspiring to eliminate Outland as a competitor in the market for O&M Services on Gamesa wind turbines. As discussed above, however, Outland has failed to sufficiently plead the existence of such a conspiracy. Second, Outland claims that Gamesa and Iberdrola violated the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 14, the Minnesota Antitrust Act, Minn. Stat. § 325D.52, and the Texas Antitrust Act by conspiring to engage in an illegal tying arrangement of Gamesa O&M Services to Gamesa wind turbines. [5] A

[3] Outland maintains that it need not provide greater factual support for its claims because a motion to dismiss must only be granted "if it is impossible for the plaintiff to prevail under any set of facts that could be proven consistent with the allegations." (Pl.'s Resp. at 2) (quoting *Jackson v. United States Steel Corp., No. 05-CV-486DRH, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 16233, 2006 WL 897903 at 2 (S.D. Ill. Apr. 3, 2006)). Outland misstates the prevailing law. As discussed above, the current legal standard for testing the sufficiency of a complaint is set forth in Twombly and its progeny and requires that a complaint plead sufficient facts that raise the right to relief above the speculative level. 550 U.S. at 555.

[4] Count [*18] IX alleges that Iberdrola violated Section 15.50 of the Texas Antitrust Act. Section 15.50 deals with covenants not to compete, and Outland has not pled any such cause of action in its complaint. Presumably, Outland intended to allege a violation of Section 15.05, which prohibits conspiracies in restrain of trade and mirrors the language of the Sherman Act.

tying arrangement is the practice of selling one product or service on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different product or service. Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Tech. Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 462, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992).

Outland alleges that Gamesa and Iberdrola conspired to engage in an unlawful tying arrangement by requiring purchasers of Gamesa's wind turbines to contract with Gamesa for O&M Services on those turbines. To succeed on an antitrust conspiracy claim, a plaintiff must establish that the alleged conspirators "had a conscious commitment to a common scheme designed to achieve an unlawful objective." Omnicare, Inc. v. UnitedHealth Grp., Inc., 629 F.3d 697, 706 (7th Cir. 2011) [*19] (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 764, 104 S. Ct. 1464, 79 L. Ed. 2d 775 (1984)). However, Outland's allegations of a tying conspiracy are even more attenuated than those of its alleged conspiracy to eliminate Outland as a competitor. Outland exclusively relies on the financial ties between Gamesa and Iberdrola to support its allegation of a tying conspiracy. The fact that Iberdrola may profit from Gamesa's alleged tying scheme, without more, is insufficient to plausibly suggest that Iberdrola played any role in the design, development, or implementation of Gamesa's alleged tying scheme. Therefore, Outland has failed to sufficiently plead a tying conspiracy.

As Outland has failed to plead an antitrust conspiracy under either theory, Counts VI, VII, and IX are dismissed. We now turn our attention to Outland's remaining claims for tortious interference with existing and prospective business relationships (Counts I, II, and V) and Outland's request for injunctive relief (Count VIII).

II. Tortious Interference Claims

Counts I and II allege that Iberdrola interfered with Outland's existing and prospective business relationship with Gamesa. To state a claim for tortious interference with an existing [*20] contractual relationship, a plaintiff must allege: (1) the existence of a valid and enforceable contract, (2) the defendant's awareness of the contract, (3) the defendant's unjustified and intentional inducement of a breach of the contract, (4) a subsequent breach of the contract, and (5) damages. Cody v. Harris, 409 F.3d 853, 859 (7th Cir. 2005) (citing Fellhauer v. City of Geneva, 142 Ill. 2d 495, 568 N.E.2d 870, 878, 154 Ill. Dec. 649 (Ill. 1991)). The elements of a claim for tortious interference with a prospective economic relationship are similar: (1) plaintiff's reasonable expectation of entering into a valid business relationship, (2) defendant's knowledge of this expectation, (3) defendant's intentional interference that prevents plaintiff's reasonable expectation from materializing, and (4) damages. Voelker v. Porsche Cars N. Am., Inc., 353 F.3d 516, 527-28 (7th Cir. 2003) (citing HPI Health Care Servs., Inc. v. Mt. Vernon Hosp., Inc., 131 Ill. 2d 145, 545 N.E.2d 672, 676, 137 Ill. Dec. 19 (Ill. 1989)).

The parties dispute whether Outland has sufficiently alleged that Iberdrola unjustifiably and intentionally induced Gamesa to breach the MSA and prevented Outland's prospective relationships from materializing. Under Illinois law, a defendant [*21] has induced a breach only if "the contract would otherwise have been performed," i.e., "that it was breached and abandoned by reason of the defendant's wrongful act and that such act was the moving cause thereof." Farley v. Kissell Co., 18 Ill. App. 3d 139, 310 N.E.2d 385, 390 (Ill. App. Ct. 1974) (internal quotation omitted); see *Morris v. Northstar Aerospace (Chi.) Inc., No. 11 C 210, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 150091, 2011 WL 6938455, at 4 (N.D. Ill. Dec. 29, 2011) (dismissing a claim of tortious interference with a contract when it was not plausible that the alleged interference caused the breach). Similarly, for claims of tortious interference with a prospective business relationship, "the interference complained of must induce or cause a breach or termination of the relationship or expectancy." Heying v. Simonaitis, 126 Ill. App. 3d 157, 466 N.E.2d 1137, 1141, 81 Ill. Dec. 335 (Ill. App. Ct. 1984).

[5] Courts routinely evaluate antitrust claims under the Minnesota Antitrust Act of 1971 and the Texas Antitrust Act by applying federal antitrust law. Therefore, Outland's state and federal antitrust claims rise and fall together. See Howard v. Minn. Timberwolves Basketball Ltd. P'ship, 636 N.W.2d 551, 557 (Minn. Ct. App. 2001); Marlin v. Robertson, 307 S.W.3d 418, 422 n.2 (Tex Ct. App. 2009).

The only factual support that Outland provides for its allegation that Iberdrola caused Gamesa to breach its existing and prospective agreements with Outland are statements made by Gamesa that Iberdrola did not want Outland personnel on its wind farms. The sole assertion that Iberdrola required or urged Gamesa to remove Outland from Iberdrola sites is directly contradicted by [*22] the first 122 allegations of Outland's counterclaim, in which Outland unambiguously alleges that Gamesa intended to breach the MSA independent of any alleged demands by Iberdrola. For example, Outland alleges that Gamesa "intended to . . . frivolously terminate the MSA" and that Gamesa designed and implemented a plan to "terminate the remaining contractual work represented by the MSA." Outland alleges an intricate scheme by Gamesa to eliminate Outland as a competitor that began nearly one year before Gamesa made any representation that Iberdrola would no longer accept Outland personnel on its wind farms. As Gamesa had been plotting to breach the MSA for a considerable time period, it is not plausible that Iberdrola induced Gamesa to breach the agreement. Outland's allegations that Iberdrola caused Gamesa to breach its agreements, when considered in light of Gamesa's scheme to destroy Outland, do little to plausibly suggest that Iberdrola caused Gamesa to breach the MSA. Therefore, Counts I and II are dismissed.

Count V alleges that Iberdrola intentionally interfered with "Outland's directives, training, and safety protocols by directing Outland's on-site technicians to use a [modified] [*23] LOTO procedure," thereby forcing Outland to breach the MSA. Tortious interference with a contractual relationship requires an allegation that a defendant (Iberdrola) induced a third party (Gamesa) to breach its contract with a plaintiff (Outland). Skopp v. First Fed. Sav. of Wilmette, 189 Ill. App. 3d 440, 545 N.E.2d 356, 361, 136 Ill. Dec. 832 (Ill. App. Ct. 1989). Here, Outland alleges that Iberdrola induced Outland, not Gamesa, to breach the MSA. Outland cannot state a claim for tortious interference by alleging that Iberdrola induced Outland to breach its own agreement. Accordingly, Count V is dismissed.

III. Injunctive Relief

Count VIII alleges that Outland seeks an injunction to prevent Iberdrola from taking further action to interfere with Outland's ongoing and prospective business relationships and from making false or disparaging statements with respect to Outland. A request for an injunction is a remedy and not a cause of action. As the remainder of Outland's claim has been dismissed for failing to state a claim, Outland is not entitled to this relief, and Count VIII is dismissed.

IV. Dismissal Without Prejudice

Iberdrola requests that Outland's counterclaim be dismissed with prejudice. Outland has not previously requested [*24] leave to amend its counterclaim, and at this stage we cannot definitively conclude that Outland is unable to provide additional factual support of a conspiracy to implicate Iberdrola. Therefore, Outland's counterclaim is dismissed without prejudice. Should Outland request leave to file an amended counterclaim pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a), the Court will evaluate Outland's request at that time.

The Court does, however, express serious concern over the tenuous relationship between Outland's counterclaim and McCoy's personal injury suit that spawned the present litigation. Outland contends that Iberdrola and Gamesa used McCoy's accident as a pretext for implementing their scheme to destroy Outland and evade responsibility for McCoy's injuries. The broad scheme alleged by Outland bears no relation to whether McCoy is entitled to compensation for his injuries, either from Gamesa, Iberdrola, or Outland. Moreover, Outland's counterclaim would unjustifiably prolong the adjudication of McCoy's right to recover for his injuries. We recognize that Outland, as a third-party defendant, is entitled to assert any counterclaims it may have against Iberdrola, the third-party plaintiff [*25] See Fed. R. Civ. P. 14(a)(2)(B). However, a court may nevertheless sever any counterclaims that are "discrete and separate" from the original claims such that "one claim is capable of resolution despite the outcome of the other claim." Gaffney v. Riverboat Servs. of Ind., Inc., 451 F.3d 424, 442 (7th Cir. 2006) (citing Rice v. Sunrise Express, Inc., 209 F.3d 1008, 1016 (7th Cir. 2000)); Fed. R. Civ. P. 21. Should Outland request leave to re-plead its counterclaim rather than file an independent suit against Iberdrola, the Court would consider the possibility of severance at that time.

CONCLUSION

In light of the foregoing, Iberdrola's motion to dismiss Outland's counterclaim in its entirety is granted.

ORDER

Pending before the Court are Defendants' motion for an accounting and for Plaintiff to release funds (Doc. 211), Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's first amended complaint (Doc. 232), and Plaintiff's motion to dismiss Defendants' third amended counterclaims (Doc. 235). Each motion has been fully briefed (Docs. 229, 236; 241, 260; 242, 261). For the reasons that follow, the Court will deny Defendants' motion for an accounting and release of funds, grant in part and deny in part Defendants' motion to dismiss Plaintiff's first amended complaint, and grant in part and deny in part Plaintiff's motion to dismiss Defendants' third amended counterclaims.[1]

I. Factual Background.

Verizon operates a wireless [*6] telephone network. Part of Verizon's service involves providing premium text message service ("PSMS"), which offers Verizon customers such applications as ring tones, horoscopes, recipes, celebrity gossip, and news alerts. Verizon contracts with third-party companies, known as "aggregators," who, in turn, contract with Verizon-approved PSMS providers. The providers supply PSMS services to wireless customers, typically by marketing them on the internet. When a Verizon customer orders a PSMS service, the service is delivered to the customer's phone over the Verizon network and Verizon includes the charge for the PSMS on the customer's monthly wireless bill. Verizon keeps part of the payment for these services and forwards the remaining amount to the aggregators, who collect their respective fees and pass the rest on to the PSMS providers. Verizon requires its providers to adhere to the Consumer Best Practices Guidelines for Cross Carrier Mobile Content Services promulgated by the Mobile Marketing Association ("MMA Best Practices"). Defendants, who did business under the name "Cylon," and later "JAWA," are in the business of providing PSMS services directly over the internet and through [*7] aggregators. Defendants acted as PSMS providers under contract with Verizon aggregators.

Verizon brought this action against Defendants, alleging that they fraudulently obtained access to the Verizon network, violated MMA Best Practices in soliciting business from Verizon customers, and deceived Verizon customers, resulting in Verizon incurring costs to remedy customer complaints and stop Defendants' conduct. Verizon's first amended complaint asserts seven causes of action: (1) violation of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act ("RICO"), 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c); (2) violation of RICO, 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d); (3) violation of the Arizona Organized Crime, Fraud, and Terrorism Act ("ACFTA"), A.R.S. § 13-2310(A); (4) violation of ACFTA, A.R.S.§ 13-2312(B); (5) common law fraud; (6) violation of Arizona's Consumer Fraud Act, A.R.S. § 44-1522 (A), and (7) tortious interference.

II. Defendants' Motion for an Accounting/Release of Funds.

Defendants claim that prior to filing the instant lawsuit, Verizon launched an attack on JAWA that included terminating JAWA's service to Verizon customers, instructing aggregators not to pay JAWA, refunding customers who had not complained, and "withholding [*8] money rightfully due to both the Aggregators and JAWA for services already provided that were not refunded to customers." Doc. 211 at 3. Defendants move the Court to order an accounting from Verizon of money it is currently withholding from its aggregators, and, indirectly, from JAWA. Defendants further move the Court to order Verizon to release these funds. Id. at 2, 6. Defendants claim that from the start of this litigation, "it has been undisputed that Verizon was holding money that does not legally belong to it." Id. Defendants claim that Verizon counsel has been aware of the retained funds since August, 2011, and that they recently estimated the amount to be $8 million. Id. Defendants state that they informed Verizon, through counsel, that their own accounting determined the amount to be $9 million. Id. Defendants argue that regardless of the exact amount, it is undisputed that Verizon is withholding money to which it is not legally entitled and that the Court should order an accounting from Verizon because JAWA lacks any other remedy at law to require Verizon to state the exact amount withheld. Id. at 4. Defendants further argue that the Court should order Verizon to release [*9] these funds because withholding them amounts to impermissible self-help and the proper legal avenue for holding such funds is to seek a pre-judgment order or garnishment, which Verizon has not done. Id.

Verizon opposes Defendants' motion, characterizing it as "an attempt to obtain final relief based upon unsubstantiated allegations" that have no basis in law. Doc. 229 at 1. Verizon disputes Plaintiffs' assertion that it has admitted to withholding funds and states that there is no evidence on the record to support Defendants' facts. Id. at 2. Verizon also argues that Defendants' request has no basis in law. Id. Verizon argues that the only basis for Defendants' request under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is a request for pre-judgment relief, and that an injunction cannot issue on the basis of unverified allegations. Id. at 3. Verizon also argues, on the basis of this Court's opinion in Wolf v. Martin, No. CV 10-8163 PCT DGC, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112982, 2010 WL 3984826 (D. Ariz. Oct. 12, 2010), that an accounting request is not a proper basis for an injunction. Id. Verizon asserts that Defendants' request for pre-judgment payment amounts to a "mandatory injunction" and that Defendants' motion falls far short [*10] of meeting the exacting standards of proof and serious harm required for such an order. Id. at 3-4 (citing Tinsley v. Schriro, No. CV 07-1676-NVW-CRP, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 113259, 2008 WL 2783279, at 9-10 (D. Ariz. June 26, 2008) and Marlyn Nutraceuticals, Inc. v. Mucos Pharma GmbH & Co., 571 F.3d 873, 879 (9th Cir. 2009)). Finally, Verizon argues that Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469, 82 S. Ct. 894, 8 L. Ed. 2d 44 (1962), the only case Defendants cite as a legal basis for relief, does not support the pre-judgment relief that Defendants request. Doc. 229 at 4-5.

Defendants have failed to establish that they are entitled to the requested relief. Defendants would have the Court rule in their favor merely because Verizon does not provide evidence to controvert Defendants' claim that Verizon is in possession of funds owing to Defendants. Doc. 236 at 2. Defendants also argue that because Plaintiff's counsel has made multiple representations to Defense counsel that it is withholding funds, and Defendants have direct knowledge of these representations, verification of this fact is unnecessary. Id. The Court does not agree that these allegations provide sufficient grounds for the Court to grant Defendants' motion.

Defendants previously petitioned [*11] the Court for a preliminary injunction, claiming, among other things, that Verizon and the aggregators were withholding approximately $19 million for services they had provided, and asking the Court to order Verizon not to withhold payments owed to JAWA for its messaging services. Doc. 60, ¶¶ 6, 38(b)(4). The Court denied Defendants' motion because they had not shown a likelihood of success on the merits of their counterclaims. See Doc. 133 at 17-23. Here, also, Defendants state that Verizon's actions amount to conversion (Doc. 236 at 3), but Defendants make no attempt to establish the four factors required for injunctive relief, including a showing that they are "likely to succeed on the merits" (see, e.g., Winter v. Natural Res. Def. Council, 555 U.S. 7, 129 S. Ct. 365, 374, 172 L. Ed. 2d 249 (2008)), or a showing that the balance of hardships tips sharply in their favor and the existence of "serious questions" that go to the merits of their claim (see Alliance for Wild Rockies v. Cottrell, 622 F.3d 1045, 1049-53 (9th Cir. 2010)).

Defendants argue that their motion is not a request for injunctive relief and that Verizon's obligation to turn over the withheld funds does not depend on the success of its [*12] counterclaims because it is Verizon, not Defendants, that has improperly "helped itself" to pre-judgment relief by withholding the funds. Doc. 236 at 3-4. But regardless of whether Defendants have styled their motion as one for injunctive relief, Defendants have provided no other legal basis for the relief sought. As the Court stated in Wolf, Defendants' request for an accounting "is not a proper request for equitable relief." *2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 112982, 2010 WL 3984826, at 2 (declining Plaintiff's request for an accounting from Defendants because "[t]he Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provide ample tools for Plaintiff to conduct discovery and present evidence of profits to which he is entitled)). Dairy Queen, Inc. v. Wood, 369 U.S. 469, 82 S. Ct. 894, 8 L. Ed. 2d 44 (1962), which Defendants cite, is not to the contrary. In that case, the Supreme Court stated that the prerequisite to an equitable accounting, like any other equitable remedy, is an inadequate remedy at law. Dairy Queen, 369 U.S. at 478. The Court went on to reason that a cause of action cognizable at law may require an equitable accounting in rare cases where the accounts are too complicated for a jury to handle, but that "[t]he legal remedy cannot be characterized as inadequate [*13] merely because the measure of damages may necessitate a look into petitioner's business records." Id.

Defendants have made no showing that legal remedies are insufficient to address their claims that Verizon improperly converted funds owing to the aggregators and JAWA. Defendants argue for the first time in their reply that discovery is not a sufficient route for determining the amount Verizon has wrongfully withheld because Verizon has failed to uphold its discovery obligations. Doc. 236 at 5. Defendants' allegations to this effect are general and conclusory. Id. ("Direct requests . . . and even conversations with counsel . . . have also not been successful in convincing Verizon to uphold its discovery obligations."). Absent a showing of specific discovery violations, the Court is not persuaded that Defendants are left without adequate legal remedies for pursuing the requested relief. Moreover, as noted above, Defendants have not shown, apart from unsubstantiated and directly disputed allegations, that Plaintiffs are impermissibly withholding payments. The Court will deny Defendants' motion for an accounting and release of funds.

III. Defendants' Motion to Dismiss Plaintiff's First [*14] Amended Complaint.

When analyzing a complaint for failure to state a claim to relief under Rule 12(b)(6), the factual allegations "'are taken as true and construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party.'" Cousins v. Lockyer, 568 F.3d 1063, 1067 (9th Cir. 2009) (citation omitted). To avoid a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, the complaint must plead "enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face." Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 570, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 167 L. Ed. 2d 929 (2007). This plausibility standard requires sufficient factual allegations to allow "the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged." Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1949, 173 L. Ed. 2d 868 (2009). "[W]here the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged — but it has not 'show[n]' — 'that the pleader is entitled to relief.'" Id. at 1950 (citing Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(a)(2)). A claim may be dismissed where the complaint lacks a cognizable legal theory, lacks sufficient facts alleged under a cognizable legal theory, or contains allegations disclosing some absolute defense or bar to recovery. See Balistreri v. Pacifica Police Dep't., 901 F.2d 696, 699 (9th Cir. 1988); [*15] Weisbuch v. County of L.A., 119 F.3d 778, 783, n.1 (9th Cir. 1997).

A. Counts 1 and 2: RICO.

Defendants argue that Verizon's claim under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c) is based only on conclusory statements and fails as a matter of law. Defendants' arguments — contained in multiple overlapping bullet-points and supported mainly by footnotes — boil down to two core arguments: (1) that Verizon lacks standing because only Verizon customers, not Verizon, itself, can claim direct injury from Defendants' alleged fraud, and (2) that Verizon has failed to allege the necessary elements, including intent to obtain money from Verizon, for the predicate crimes of mail and wire fraud. See Doc. 232 at 10-12.

Verizon argues that Defendants already made, and the Court already rejected, most of Defendants' arguments in its order responding to Defendants' original motion to dismiss. Doc. 241 at 3, see Docs. 117, 164. The Court agrees that it has already addressed — and rejected — Defendants' lack of standing and lack of direct injury arguments. The Court ruled that Verizon was a proper plaintiff under RICO because it satisfied the proximate cause requirement, as described in Holmes v. Securities Investor Protection [*16] Corp, of showing "some direct relation between the injury asserted and the injurious conduct alleged." Doc. 164 at 2-3; see 503 U.S. 258, 265-66, 112 S. Ct. 1311, 117 L. Ed. 2d 532 (1992). The Court found that Verizon had sufficiently alleged conduct on the part of Defendants — including making false representations to Verizon to obtain access to Verizon's customer network and using "cloaking" software to hide from Verizon its sales and services on unauthorized and misleading webpages — that caused Verizon injury in the form of damage to its business reputation, loss of customers, and expenses incurred in reimbursing customers and addressing thousands of complaints. Doc. 164 at 3. The Court also stated that factual questions regarding proximate cause are to be decided at summary judgment or trial, not on a motion to dismiss. Id. (citing Newcal Indus., Inc. v. Ikon Office Solutions, 513 F.3d 1038, 1055 (9th Cir. 2008)).

The first amended complaint realleges the same conduct (see, e.g., id., ¶¶ 76-84) and the same damages (see, e.g., id., ¶¶ 93-98). Defendants again argue that Verizon is only a derivative victim of the alleged harms against its customers and that a derivative victim is not entitled to bring RICO claims. [*17] Doc. 232 at 10-12; 10, n. 17, 11, n. 21. The cases upon with Defendants rely involve third-party victims who had no direct relation to the parties sued. See Canyon County v. Syngenta Seeds, Inc., 519 F.3d 969, 981 (9th Cir. 2008) (dismissing claims brought by a county bearing the healthcare costs of illegal immigrants against employers for helping their employees violate immigration laws); Laborers & Operating Eng'rs' Util. Agreement Health & Welfare Trust Fund v. Philip Morris, Inc., 42 F. Supp. 2d 943, 948 (D. Ariz. 1999) (dismissing claims brought by trust funds paying members' medical expenses against a tobacco company for harms to their members' health). In contrast to these injuries that the courts have found "too attenuated" or lacking in "direct relation" to the defendants' actions to support a claim, Verizon has alleged a direct relationship between itself and Defendants. Verizon has alleged that Defendants engaged in deceptive sales practices while fraudulently operating as an approved vendor for Verizon, causing customers to incur disputed charges, all billed and collected by Verizon. Verizon previously argued, and the Court agrees, that Verizon's alleged injuries of harm [*18] to its reputation and customer base and its expenses incurred resolving customer complaints are not too attenuated from Defendants' alleged conduct to support a claim. See Doc. 117 at 5-6 (contrasting Sybersound Records, Inc. v. UAV Corp., 517 F.3d 1137 (9th Cir. 2008)). The Court will reject Defendants' arguments that Verizon does not have standing to bring a RICO claim because it is not an aggrieved customer and it has not alleged a sufficient causal connection between Defendants' alleged actions and its alleged harm.

Defendants also argue that Verizon has not pled sufficient facts to support a claim for the predicate crimes of mail and wire fraud. Doc. 232 at 10-12. Defendants first argue on the basis of United States v. Lew, 875 F.2d 219, 221 (9th Cir. 1989), and Williams v. Dow Chemical Co., 255 F. Supp. 2d 219, 225-26 (S.D.N.Y. 2003), that RICO requires a defendant to have the intent to obtain money or property from the one deceived and that Verizon's claim fails because Verizon has only alleged that Defendants sought to obtain money from Verizon customers, not Verizon, itself. Doc. 232 at 11; 11, n. 19.

Verizon responds that both Lew and Dow Chemical are distinguishable from the [*19] current case because in those cases defendants did not receive money from the person deceived, but Defendants in this case regularly received money from Verizon out of the payments Verizon collected from its customers. Doc. 241 at 5; 5, n. 4. The Court agrees that the outcomes in Lew and Dow Chemical do not control this case. In Lew, the Ninth Circuit reversed convictions of mail fraud against an immigration attorney who sent fraudulent documents on behalf of his clients to the Department of Labor ("DOL") because there was no evidence that the clients, from whom the defendant received payment, had been deceived. 875 F. 2d at 221-22 (9th Cir. 1989). In Dow Chemical, the court found that defendant's misrepresentations about a product to the Environmental Protection Agency ("EPA") did not constitute wire or mail fraud because, though intended to deceive the EPA, they were not made with the intent to obtain money, but only with the intent to obtain regulatory approval. Neither case speaks to the alleged deception against Verizon in this complaint.

Verizon argues that United States v. Bonallo, 858 F.2d 1427 (9th Cir. 1988), a bank fraud case cited by the Ninth Circuit in the mail and wire [*20] fraud context (see, e.g., Lew, 875 F. 2d at 221; United States v. Dowie, 411 Fed. Appx., 21, 28 (9th Cir. 2010)), is directly on point. In Bonallo, the Ninth Circuit rejected a former bank employee's argument that he had not defrauded the bank, but only its customers, when he allegedly withdrew money from his own account and falsified ATM records to have the funds deducted from the accounts of other customers. 858 F. 2d at 1429, 1434, n. 9. The court reasoned that defendant's misrepresentation of the records was directed at the bank and that defendant was "effectively harming the bank which was obliged to reimburse customers" for erroneously charged withdrawals. Id. As Verizon notes, the court in Lew cited to Bonallo as providing the element missing in Lew: "an intent to obtain money . . . from the victim of the deceit." 875 F. 2d at 222, see Doc. 242 at 6. Verizon argues that Bonallo is analogous to the instant case because Verizon likewise reimbursed customers wrongfully charged by Defendants' deceptive sales practices. Doc. 242 at 6.

Defendants reply that Bonallo is inapposite because Verizon does not allege that it had a legal obligation to reimburse customers; rather, it simply [*21] made a "unilateral decision" to do so. Doc. 260 at 5. This argument is not persuasive. In rejecting the argument that removing money from customer accounts did not amount to an intent to obtain money from the bank, the court in Bonallo reasoned that it is "common knowledge that banks reimburse the accounts of wrongly charged customers." 858 F. 2d at 1434, n. 9. The relevant question is whether Verizon has alleged facts to show that Defendants were aware or had "common knowledge" that Verizon refunded customer accounts. Defendants also argue that Bonallo is distinguishable because, unlike a bank which obtains title interest in depositors' funds while its customers receive a contract-claim against the bank, Verizon had no legal interest, apart from its own share, of customer payments. This argument is also unpersuasive because it is not clear how, under the facts alleged, Verizon does not take title interest to funds paid directly to Verizon, even if Verizon is contractually obligated to pay portions of those funds to aggregators who, in turn, are contractually obligated to pay PSMS providers, including Defendants.

The Court concludes that Verizon has alleged an intent on the part of [*22] Defendants to obtain money from Verizon. First, unlike the cases Defendants cite in which defendants did not seek money from those deceived (the DOL and the EPA), the facts in this case portray a scheme in which Defendants sought to obtain money from Verizon. The FAC alleges that Defendants submitted applications to operate as an approved vender within Verizon's provider network as a way to receive payments from Verizon while Verizon bore the responsibility of billing customers, collecting payments, and responding to customer complaints. See Doc. 222, ¶¶ 41, 60-61, 66-68. Second, the facts pled lead to the reasonable inference that Defendants anticipated that Verizon would bear the cost associated with its fraudulent sales once Defendants' deceptive marketing practices generated a large number of complaints. The FAC alleges that Defendants set up a number of "silo" companies that they could quickly shut down if Verizon detected that they were deceiving customers, enabling Defendants to continue their unauthorized marketing practices, implicitly leaving Verizon, like the bank in Bonallo, with the responsibility of making refunds while Defendants escaped detection. Id., ¶¶ at 41, 69-70. [*23] Verizon alleges that Defendants' schemes caused Verizon to field more than 3,300 customer complaints and to issue more than $375,000 in reimbursements. Id., ¶¶ 94-96. Defendants raise a factual issue, arguing that Verizon did not reimburse customers from its own profits, but only from money that it withheld from Defendants and aggregators. Doc. 232 at 11, n. 19. Verizon responds, and the Court agrees, that this assertion rests on facts outside the complaint and that, in any case, Defendants do not dispute that they received money from Verizon during the fraud scheme. Doc. 241 at 5, n. 4. The Court finds that for purposes of withstanding a motion to dismiss, Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to show that Defendants acted with an intent to obtain money from Verizon.

Defendants next argue that Verizon has not alleged sufficient facts to support specific acts of mail fraud or wire fraud. Doc. 232 at 10, 12. Defendants argue that Verizon's use of the mails to bill its customers occurred only after customers incurred charges and is therefore not sufficiently related to Defendants' allegedly fraudulent sales schemes. Defendants also argue that Verizon has not alleged sufficient facts to [*24] support wire fraud because no e-mails, including the March 2009 e-mail which Defendant Jason Hope sent to regain access to Verizon's network, were sent from JAWA to Verizon. Doc. 232 at 12.

1. Mail Fraud.

Verizon responds that it has alleged sufficient facts to support mail fraud. Doc. 241 at 7. Verizon first argues that the FAC alleges that Defendants sent applications to the Cellular Telecommunications & Internet Association ("CTIA") to lease short codes, enabling them to act as PSMS providers over the Internet. Id., see FAC, Doc. 222, ¶ 89. Verizon argues that these applications contained false addresses and contact information in order to mask Defendants' identities, and that this deception, passed along to Verizon when it approved each short code campaign, was "an essential element of [Defendants'] scheme" to hide their identities from Verizon and market their PSMS to its customers. Id.; see FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 66(e), 71. Verizon also argues that the FAC alleges that Defendants knew and depended upon Verizon's use of the mails to bill its customers. Id. at 7-8 (see Doc. 222, ¶ 91). Verizon argues that these facts are sufficient to support mail fraud because the mailings of both the [*25] short code applications and the bills to Verizon customers were "for the purpose of, and essential to, the scheme's success." Id. at 7. Verizon relies on the Ninth Circuit's opinion in United States v. Hubbard, 96 F. 3d 1223, 1228 (9th Cir. 1996) ("In order for the mailing to be 'sufficiently closely related,' it must be for the 'purpose of executing the scheme,' or 'incident to an essential part of the scheme'") (internal citations omitted), and the Supreme Court's opinion in Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 710-11, 109 S. Ct. 1443, 103 L. Ed. 2d 734 (1989) ("[T]he use of the mails need not be an essential element of the scheme. . . . It is sufficient for the mailing to be incident to an essential part of the scheme . . . or a step in the plot.") (internal citations omitted).

Defendants reply that Verizon's alleged mail fraud violations are not "sufficiently closely related" to the alleged fraudulent scheme. Doc. 260 at 6. Defendants first argue that Verizon never alleged that Defendants used the mails to send applications to CTIA. Id. at 7. Defendants are correct that the FAC does not expressly say that Defendants used the U.S. mail to send its short code applications. See Doc. 222, ¶ 89. The FAC begins its section [*26] entitled "Defendants' Violations of Federal Criminal law" with the over-arching allegation that Defendants used "the U.S. mail and/or interstate wires" as part of their conspiracy to defraud Verizon. See id. at ¶ 87. When, two paragraphs later, the FAC cites Defendants' short code applications to CTIA and Verizon, it designates these as a violation of the mail fraud statute, with the words "mail fraud" in parentheses, just as it designates other violations in the same section as either mail fraud or wire fraud. See id. at ¶¶ 89-91. Taken in the light most favorable to the non-moving party, the Court finds that the allegation that Defendants used the U.S. mail/and or interstate wire to commit fraud applies to the allegations related to Defendants' short code applications and that the parenthetical reference to mail fraud is meant to distinguish which was used, mail or wire. Thus construed, Verizon has made sufficient allegations at this stage to support a mail fraud claim. Defendants' factual assertion that "no applications were ever sent via U.S. mail to CTIA or Verizon" (Doc. 260 at 6. (emphasis in original)) is a factual issue; Verizon will bear the responsibility of proving use [*27] of the mails at trial. Defendants make no additional arguments for why the short code applications were not sufficiently related to the alleged fraud scheme to constitute mail fraud. The Court is persuaded that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts showing that Defendants' applications for short code leases — a preliminary step required for Defendants to do business over the internet — were essential for carrying out the alleged fraud scheme against Verizon.

Defendants next argue that the mailing of bills to Verizon customers is not sufficiently related to the alleged fraud scheme. Doc. 260 at 7. Defendants repeat the argument that the alleged fraud scheme was simply to obtain access to Verizon's network; therefore, any customer bills sent after Defendants accessed the network were unrelated to the alleged fraud. Id. The Court rejects this argument for the reasons stated above. Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to show that Defendants' scheme was not only to gain access to Verizon's network of customers, but also to obtain money from Verizon. Because a jury could reasonably conclude that billing Verizon's customers was necessary to the success of Defendants' scheme, or "incident to [*28] an essential part of the scheme," the Court finds that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to support a mail fraud claim. See Schmuck, 489 U.S. at 710-11.

2. Wire Fraud.

Verizon argues that it has alleged sufficient predicate acts of wire fraud to support its RICO claims. Doc. 241 at 8. The Court agrees. As shown above, the mail or wire communication need not be with the plaintiff directly, as long as it is connected in some way to the success of the overall scheme. Verizon has alleged multiple acts of wire fraud involving the use of fake URL's meant to direct Verizon away from the actual sites where they conducted their sales, the use of cloaking software to keep Verizon from discovering the actual URL sites, and the use of these sites and text messaging to conduct deceptive sales transactions. See FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 76-79, 90. Defendants' principal argument is that these wire communications were not part of a scheme to defraud Verizon because the facts alleged do not establish an intent to obtain money from Verizon. Doc. 260 at 4. For the reasons already stated, the Court rejects this argument. Because a jury could reasonably conclude that Defendants engaged in wire transactions as [*29] part of an overall scheme to obtain money from Verizon, the Court finds that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to support a wire fraud claim.

3. Individual Defendants.

Defendants also argue that Verizon has failed to state a RICO claim against four specific defendants, Christa Johnson (Stephens), Quinn McCullough, Steve Urhman, and Rick Perry, because Verizon has failed to allege facts showing that these individuals took an "operation or management" role in the alleged enterprise as required under Reves v. Ernst & Young, 507 U.S. 170, 179, 113 S. Ct. 1163, 122 L. Ed. 2d 525 (1993). Doc. 222 at 12.

Verizon argues that the Court already rejected this argument in its prior order, stating that Verizon had alleged the roles of the co-conspirators with sufficient detail and that whether Verizon had sufficient evidence to back up its allegations must be determined after discovery. Doc. 241 (citing Doc. 164 at 4). Verizon also argues that Defendants' reliance on Reves is misplaced, both because that case dealt with a motion for summary judgment, not a motion to dismiss, and because the "operation and management" issue in that case pertained to an outside accounting firm that acted merely as an instrument of a corporation's fraudulent [*30] scheme rather than someone directly involved in the alleged fraudulent conduct. Doc. 241 at 4, n. 2 (citing to Marceau v. IBEW, Local 1269, 618 F. Supp. 2d 1127, 1170 (D. Ariz. 2009) (distinguishing the role of the outside accounting firm in Reves from that of a defendant corporation that did not merely provide outside services, but was "directly involved" in its unlawful acts and thus "clearly had some part in directing the enterprise's affairs.")).

The Court's prior order is not dispositive of Defendants' argument because that order pertained to whether Verizon's pleadings had satisfied the particularity requirement of Rule 9(b) for the purpose of giving Defendants' notice of the alleged fraud claims against them; it did not discuss the sufficiency of the allegations to make a RICO claim against each individual co-defendant. See Doc. 164 at 4. The Court must look to whether Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c) as to each of the four defendants named in Defendants' motion to dismiss.

Under § 1962(c), it is unlawful for a person employed by or associated with an enterprise "to conduct or participate, directly or indirectly, in the conduct of [*31] such enterprise's affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity." 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c). The Court agrees that Reves is the controlling authority on this statute, and that Reves' approach applies equally on a motion to dismiss. See Walter v. Drayson, 538 F.3d 1244, 1247 (9th Cir. 2008). Reves interpreted this section to require that the employee or associate have "some part in directing [the enterprise's] affairs." 507 U.S. at 179. Reves went on to explain that "the word 'participate' makes clear that RICO liability is not limited to those with primary responsibility for the enterprise's affairs, just as the phrase 'directly or indirectly' makes clear that RICO liability is not limited to those with a formal position in the enterprise, but some part in directing the enterprise's affairs is required." Id. (emphasis in original).

The Court concludes that Verizon has not alleged sufficient facts to meet this requirement with respect to Defendant Quinn McCullough, but that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts with respect to the remaining three Defendants. The FAC names all four individuals as being "employed by" and working "in concert with" defendants Hope and DeStefano to further [*32] the scheme described in the complaint. See FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 9-11, 13. The FAC alleges that after Verizon suspended Cylon's access to its network and required defendants Hope and DeStefano to disclose their association with any short codes, Hope and DeStefano designated these defendants "to lease the short codes from the CTIA and activate short code campaigns on the Verizon Wireless network." Id., ¶¶ 59, 71. The FAC also alleges that all four Defendants were named as contact persons for the "silo" companies, created to carry out the scheme. Id. at 111-115. The FAC does not allege that these Defendants took any actions, themselves, to set up these "silo" companies; nor does it allege that the listing of these individuals as the contact persons was anything more than a nominal listing, like that of the false addresses, or that it led to any actions related to the direction of the "silo" companies or of the overall enterprise. See Id., ¶¶ 66, 68, 71, 73, 75. The FAC does allege that Stephens, Perry, and Urhman participated in a meeting in September, 2009, to discuss setting up the "silo" companies, the use of URLs, and the concealment of these URLs from Verizon. Id., ¶¶ 68, 113, 115. [*33] The FAC also alleges that all three of these Defendants were involved in discussions regarding the development of cloaking software, and that Defendant Perry tested the software and knew it would deflect Verizon's auditors. Id., ¶¶ 80, 115. The Court finds that a jury could reasonably conclude from the facts alleged that Defendants Stephens, Perry, and Urhman, through their participation in meetings discussing actions essential to the operation of Defendants' scheme, played "some part in directing the enterprise's affairs." See Reves, 507 U.S. at 179 (emphasis in original). By contrast, the FAC does not allege any facts to show that Defendant McCullough was even aware of the "silo" companies or the use of his name. The Court will grant Defendants' request to dismiss defendant McCullough from Verizon's RICO claims and deny Defendants' request to dismiss Defendants Stephens, Perry, and Urhman.

4. Verizon's 18 U.S.C. § 1962(d) Claim.

Defendants also argue that the Court should dismiss Verizon's § 1962(d) claim because it has failed to state a predicate claim under 18 U.S.C. § 1962(c). Doc. 232 at 13. For the reasons stated above, the Court finds that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts [*34] to make a claim under § 1962(c). With the exception of Defendant McCullough, the Court will deny Defendants' request to dismiss either of Verizon's RICO claims.

B. Counts 3 and 4: A.R.S. §§ 13-2310(A) & 13-2312(B).

Defendants ask the Court to dismiss the claims brought under Arizona's civil racketeering law for the same reasons it asks the Court to dismiss the federal RICO claims. For the reasons stated above, the Court will grant Defendants request with respect to Defendant McCullough and will deny Defendants' request for all other Defendants.

C. Count 5: Common Law Fraud.

Defendants argue that Verizon has failed to allege sufficient facts to show the elements of common law fraud. Defendants note that under Arizona law, common law fraud consists of nine elements: "(1) a representation; (2) its falsity; (3) its materiality; (4) the speaker's knowledge of its falsity or ignorance of its truth; (5) his intent that it should be acted upon by the person and in the manner reasonably contemplated; (6) the hearer's ignorance of its falsity; (7) his reliance on its truth; (8) his right to rely thereon; and (9) his consequent and proximate injury." Doc. 232 at 13-14 (citing Nielson v. Flashberg, 101 Ariz. 335, 419 P.2d 514, 517-18 (Ariz. 1966)).

Defendants [*35] argue that Verizon's alleged false representations are based entirely on a March 2009 e-mail from Jason Hope to an entity called "Open Market."[2] Doc. 232 at 14, Exh. 1. Defendants argue that Verizon's claim fails because Defendants made no representations to Verizon itself; Defendants could not have known that information indirectly transmitted to Verizon was false or have intended for it to induce action on Verizon's part; Defendants cannot be held liable for Verizon's reliance on information that did not come directly from Defendants; and Verizon has suffered no damages because it profited from Defendant's sales. Id. at 14.

The Court finds that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts in the FAC to show all the elements of a common law fraud claim.[3] Even discounting the 2009 e-mail because, as Defendants argue, it did not make any representations directly to Verizon and none of its allegedly false representations was material (Id. at 14-15, 14-15 ns. 23-25), the Court is not persuaded that Verizon's claim rests on this e-mail. Verizon alleges that Defendants made false [*36] representations to Verizon itself by pointing Verizon auditors to MMA-compliant webpages and concealing from Verizon the actual, non-compliant web pages. Doc. 222, ¶¶ 168, 170. Verizon alleges that its reliance on the false web pages was reasonable because Defendants created these sites specifically to gain access to Verizon's network but then switched to non-compliant sites when soliciting customers. Id., ¶ 170. The Court finds that Verizon has sufficiently alleged that Defendants knowingly represented facts (the use of compliant web-pages) to Verizon that were both false and material in order to induce Verizon to give Defendants access to their network and that Verizon reasonably relied on these false representations to do so. Verizon has also alleged that it incurred substantial expenses due to Defendants' actions. Id., ¶¶ 172-73. Defendants' argument that Verizon incurred no damages because it made a net profit from Defendants' sales is a factual issue on which Verizon will bear the burden of proof at trial. The Court will deny Defendants' motion to dismiss the common law fraud claim.

D. Count 6: Arizona's Consumer Fraud Act, A.R.S. § 44-1522.

Defendants argue that the Court dismissed Verizon's claims under A.R.S. § 44-1522 in its prior order and request the Court to state that this claim remains dismissed. Doc. 232 at 15. In its prior order, the Court found that Arizona

[2] Defendants elsewhere identify Open Market as one of the aggregators with whom Verizon did business. See Doc. 220, ¶ 27.

[3] Verizon has not responded to Defendants' fraud arguments. Because the Court may dismiss a claim [*37] under Rule 12(b)(6) only if it is satisfied that the claim is legally unsound, it has considered Defendants' arguments in light of the allegations in the FAC.

courts required, and the Ninth Circuit agreed, that a plaintiff be a consumer in a transaction to come under the protection of Arizona's Consumer Fraud Act. Doc. 164 at 6-7 (citing, e.g., Waste Mfg. & Leasing Corp. v. Hambicki, 183 Ariz. 84, 900 P. 2d 1220, 1224 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1995) ("The purpose of the Act is to provide injured consumers with a remedy"); Dunlap v. Jimmy GMC of Tucson, Inc., 136 Ariz. 338, 666 P. 2d 83, 87 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1983) ("The Consumer Fraud Act provides an injured consumer with an implied private right of action against a violator of the act."); Sutter Home Winery, Inc. v. Vintage Selections, Ltd., 971 F. 2d 401, 407 (9th Cir. 1992) ("The clear intent of this provision is to protect unwary buyers from unscrupulous sellers)). The Court dismissed [*38] this claim because the alleged fraud in the complaint "did not occur 'in connection with' Verizon's purchase of merchandise." Doc. 164 at 7. Verizon has reasserted its Consumer Fraud Act claim in the FAC to preserve it for appeal (Doc. 222 at 45, 45 n. 2), but offers no further response to Defendants' argument or to the Court's prior finding. The Court will grant Defendants' request to dismiss this claim.

E. Tortious Interference.

Defendants argue that the Court should dismiss Verizon's tortious interference claim because Verizon fails to make a valid claim under Arizona law based on Restatement (Second) of Torts ("Restatement") §§ 766 or 766A. Doc. 232 at 7-8, 8-9. Restatement § 766 pertains to the intentional and improper interference with the performance of another's contract with a third party "by inducing or otherwise causing the third person not to perform the contract." Restatement § 766. Restatement § 766A pertains to the intentional and improper interference with the performance of another's contract with a third party "by preventing the other from performing the contract or causing his performance to be more expensive or burdensome." Id. at § 766A. Thus, § 766 would pertain [*39] only to allegations that Defendants' actions caused Verizon customers not to perform their contracts with Verizon, and § 766A would pertain only to allegations that Defendants' actions made it more expensive or burdensome for Verizon to perform on its contracts with customers. Defendants argue for a further distinction: that § 766 requires that the improper actions be directed at the customers, and that § 766A requires that the actions be directed at Verizon itself. On the basis of this distinction, Defendants argue that Verizon cannot make a proper claim under § 766 because Verizon has not alleged actions taken against its customers, but only against Defendants' customers. Id. at 7. Defendants also argue that Verizon's reliance on § 766A fails because Verizon has not alleged actions directed at Verizon. Id. at 6, 8-9. Defendants also argue that the claims fail under both theories because Verizon cannot prove that any customers breached their contracts with Verizon as a result of Defendants' actions, and Verizon has pointed to no particular contract obligation whose performance was made more expensive or burdensome because of Defendants' alleged conduct. Id.

Verizon argues that the [*40] Court has already addressed and rejected Defendants' arguments and that the only potentially new argument — that Verizon has failed to identify a particular contract provision whose performance was made more burdensome or expensive by Defendants' actions — fails because Defendants cite no basis for the proposition that the increased expense or burden be related to a specific contract provision. Doc. 241 at 9, 9, n. 8. Verizon argues that it is sufficient for a claim under § 766A that "the cost that [the plaintiff] incurs in order to obtain the performance by the third party has increased." Id. (citing Restatement § 766A, cmt. c) (emphasis added by Plaintiff). Verizon argues that the increased cost and burden of servicing its customers' complaints were directly related to its efforts to continue to obtain its customers' performance of their own contract obligations, namely payment. Id. Verizon also argues that its claim is valid under § 766 because it has alleged that Defendants' conduct caused Verizon customers to cancel their contracts. Id. (citing FAC, Doc. 222, ¶ 183). Verizon states that Defendants' argument that it cannot prove that any customers, in particular, were induced to [*41] breach their contracts with Verizon attacks only the veracity, not the sufficiency of Verizon's claim. Id. at 9-10.

1. Restatement § 766.

The Court finds that Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to support a claim for tortious interference with contract under Arizona law on the basis of § 766. The Court previously found Defendants' arguments that its alleged actions were not directed at Verizon's customers, but only at its own customers, unavailing because "Verizon has pled sufficient facts to show plausibly that Defendants knew the customers were common to both parties and that Verizon would be injured by Defendants' actions." Id. at 8. Defendants now argue that it would be nonsensical to suppose that Defendants "would have any reason to interfere with and destroy its own contracts with its customers." Id. The Court need not suppose a rationale on Defendants' part, however, to evaluate the sufficiency of Verizon's claims. It is entirely plausible that a party could employ deceptive sales practices that would jeopardize its contracts with its own customers and that this would, in turn, interfere with the contractual relationship between those customers and another party. That is exactly [*42] what Verizon alleges happened in this case. See FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 78-79 (alleging that Defendants deceptively sold their services to customers on URLs, using pop-up screens to hide pricing information and failing to disclose subscription information, and that they sent text messages that obscured the price of PSMS content). Verizon has alleged that Defendants' deceptive sales practices caused Verizon customers to cancel their contracts with Verizon. See FAC, Doc. 222, ¶ 183. The question is not, as Defendants suggest, whether Defendants can be held liable for interference with their own contracts (see Doc. 232 at 7, n. 10); the question is whether Verizon has alleged sufficient facts to support a claim that Defendants' actions induced customers not perform on their contracts with Verizon. The Court finds that it has. Whether customers actually breached their contracts with Verizon as a result of Defendants' actions is a factual issue upon which Verizon will bear the burden of proof at trial, and is not dispositive of Verizon's claim at the pleading stage.

2. Restatement § 766A.

Defendants' argument that Verizon's claim fails under § 766A because the complaint does not allege actions [*43] Defendants took directly against Verizon is also unavailing. First, the fact that this section applies to actions "preventing the [plaintiff] from performing the contract or causing his performance to be more expensive or burdensome" does not necessitate that these actions be expressly directed at the plaintiff. See, e.g., § 766A, cmt. g. ("if the plaintiff is under a contract to keep a highway in repair, a defendant who intentionally inflicts additional expense upon him by damaging the highway is subject to liability"). Second, the FAC alleges many acts by Defendants directed at Verizon itself, such as fraudulently gaining authorization for multiple short code campaigns without disclosing the involvement of defendants Hope and DeStefano and using cloaking software to block Verizon's access to its unauthorized URL sites. See FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 59, 71, 83. The fact that Defendants claim to have had no direct contact with Verizon is immaterial for the sufficiency of this claim. As the Court previously noted, the intent to interfere with a plaintiff's contract is met where the actor "knows that the interference is certain or substantially certain to occur as a result of his action." See [*44] Doc. 164 at 8 (quoting § 766A, cmt. g). The Court also finds that Verizon has made a plausible claim that providing wireless service was made more costly and burdensome because Defendants, whom Verizon unwittingly enlisted as PSMS providers on the basis of Defendants' deceptive short code campaigns, caused Verizon to incur a higher volume of customer complaints and requests for refunds and to suffer damage to its goodwill and reputation. See, e.g., FAC, Doc. 222, ¶¶ 93-98. The Court need not address Verizon's argument that § 766A encompasses situations where, as here, Verizon alleges that Defendants made the cost related to securing the other's performance more costly and burdensome because the Court concludes that Verizon has alleged facts to show that Defendants' actions made its own provision of wireless services — effectuated, in part, through the services of Verizon-approved venders — more costly and burdensome. Specifically, Verizon alleges that Defendants' fraud permitted a portion of its approved PSMS wireless services to be provided without standard pricing disclosures intended to minimize the incidence of improper billing leading to a high incidence of customer complaints. [*45] See FAC, Doc. 222 ¶¶ 3-5, 56-57, 94-96. The increased burden and expense of these complaints is directly related to Verizon's provision of services to its customers via its PSMS providers.

Because the Court finds that Verizon has pled sufficient facts to allege tortious interference under either §§ 766 or 766A, the Court will deny Defendants' request to dismiss these claims.

IV. Verizon's Motion to Dismiss Defendants' Third Amended Counterclaims.

Defendants (collectively referred to as "JAWA") filed a second amended answer to Verizon's complaint containing JAWA's third amended counterclaims ("the TAC"). Doc. 220. The TAC consists of ten causes of action: (1) tortious interference with contract and business expectancies; (2) conspiracy to tortiously interfere; (3) business disparagement/injurious falsehood; (4) conversion; (5) unjust enrichment; (6) constructive trust; (7) violation of the Sherman Act; (8) violation of the New Jersey Antitrust Act; (9) abuse of process; and (10) violation of RICO. See Doc. 220,TAC, ¶¶ 97-209. Verizon filed a motion to dismiss the TAC, arguing that JAWA fails to allege sufficient facts to state a claim for any of the causes of action. Doc. 235 at 2. The [*46] same legal standards apply here as to Defendants' motion to dismiss the FAC (dicussed in Part III, above).

A. Count 1: Tortious Interference.

JAWA alleges that it has business expectancies and contracts with wireless customers and separate written contracts with four aggregators: Motricity, OpenMarket, IPX, and mBlox. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 99. JAWA alleges that Verizon knew of these business expectancies and contracts and knew that its alleged actions (filing this lawsuit and notifying aggregators and customers not to do business with JAWA) would burden and result in the breach of these business relationships. Id., ¶ 100. JAWA alleges that Verizon intentionally and improperly interfered with its contracts and business relationships, resulting in the breach of JAWA's services to its customers and adversely affecting JAWA's ability to conduct current and future business and making performance of its existing contracts more burdensome. Id. at ¶¶ 101-102. JAWA alleges that Verizon's actions caused it irreparable harm and estimates that the damages exceed one billion dollars. Id. at ¶ 102.

Verizon argues that JAWA's allegation that its interference was improper is a legal conclusion unsupported [*47] by facts because JAWA has alleged no actions that were not privileged or were not proper for Verizon to take as a matter of law. Doc. 235 at 3-4. Verizon argues that its actions filing this lawsuit and notifying those with a close relationship to the case are absolutely privileged under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. Id. at 3. Verizon also argues that Arizona law recognizes a party's right to protect its own contractual interests even if asserting those interests causes a third party to breach or terminate an existing contract. Id. at 4 (citing cases).

JAWA responds that Verizon's actions interfering with its contracts and business expectations were improper because Verizon went beyond protecting its own contractual interests and included demands that its aggregators terminate JAWA on all wireless networks, not just Verizon. Doc. 242 at 11. The TAC refers to specific demands Verizon made in its letters to aggregators and incorporates by reference one of the letters. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 60, 61.[4] JAWA also responds that Verizon's actions were improper because Verizon employed economic pressure, defamation, restraint of trade, and antitrust. Id. at 11-12.

As the Court has previously noted, tortious interference with contract requires a showing of improper conduct. See Doc. 133 at 17 (citing *Carey v. Maricopa County, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 18475, 2009 WL 750220 at 7 (D. Ariz. Mar. 10, 2009); Neonatology Assocs. v. Phoenix Perinatal Assocs., 164 P.3d at 693 (Ariz. App. 2007)). The Court agrees with Verizon that its demand letters to aggregators cannot serve as the basis of improper conduct because they are protected under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. Verizon relies on Theme Promotions, Inc. v. News Am. Mktg. FSI, 546 F.3d 991, 1007 (9th Cir. 2008), in which the Ninth Circuit held that this doctrine, stemming from two Supreme Court cases that held that those who petition the government are immune from liability for their petitions, protects federal constitutional rights and therefore applies in state law tort actions. 546 F. 3d at 1006-1007. Theme Promotions found that the doctrine protects presuit demand letters, provided the representations made in them are not so objectively baseless that they threaten what [*49] amounts to "sham litigation." Id. at 1007-1008. The Court has already found that Verizon is likely to succeed on its claims that JAWA used deceptive means to gain access to Verizon's network. See Doc. 133 at 17. The Court therefore cannot find that Verizon's claims are objectively baseless.

[4] The Motricity letter that JAWA refers [*48] to as Exhibit 1 is not attached to the TAC as JAWA indicates, but it is attached to JAWA's motion for leave to amend counterclaims. See Doc. 169-1 at 82-85.

Verizon's alleged demands to its aggregators are also protected by state law privilege to the extent they are asserted for the protection of its own legally protected interests. See Wyatt v. Ruck Constr., Inc., 571 P.2d 683, 687 (Ariz. App. 2001) ("If a defendant has a present, existing interest to protect he is privileged to prevent the performance of a contract of another which threatens it."). The TAC alleges that Verizon demanded that its aggregators "shut off service to JAWA, not only on the Verizon network, but on the networks of all Wireless Carriers." TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 60. The TAC goes on to cite six demands Verizon made, all of which the Court finds pertain to the aggregators' provision of services, collection of payments, or offers of refunds to customers serviced by JAWA through Verizon's own network. See Id., ¶ 61, Exh. 1 ("Motricity Letter"); Doc. 169-1 at 82-85. JAWA's allegation that [*50] Verizon impermissibly interfered with contracts unrelated to Verizon is based only on its allegation that Verizon's direction to its aggregators "was so broad and intimidating and so forceful that it effectively ensured that JAWA's services were cut off with respect to all carriers' customers . . . ." Id., ¶ 62. (emphasis in original). Whatever alleged effect Verizon's demands may have had on JAWA's contracts with the aggregators on other networks, the Court finds that JAWA has failed to allege any demands that were not, themselves, within the scope of protecting Verizon's own existing interests.

The Court also finds that JAWA's allegations that Verizon employed economic pressure, defamation, restraint of trade, and antitrust are conclusory statements based entirely on the same set of allegations. The TAC also fails to allege any improper communications from Verizon to its customers. Absent factual allegations of improper conduct, the Court agrees that JAWA's claim that Verizon's actions were "wrongful, improper and without justification or excuse" (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 101) is conclusory. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's tortious interference claim.

B. Count 2: Conspiracy [*51] to Tortiously Interfere.

JAWA's claim of conspiracy to tortuously interfere with JAWA's business expectancies and contracts fails for the same reason that its underlying claim fails.

C. Count 3: Business Disparagement/Injurious Falsehood.

JAWA claims that Verizon "knowingly (or in reckless disregard of the truth) published false statements of fact about and disparaging to JAWA to third parties with malice, without privilege, and with the intention to harm JAWA'S pecuniary interests." TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 111. JAWA bases this claim on allegations that Verizon made false and defamatory statements in the complaint in this case, in its press release regarding this case, in its March 8, 2011 letter to Motricity, and in other statements made to aggregators and wireless carriers. Id., ¶ 112. JAWA identifies particular statements in the press release and letters in which Verizon claimed that JAWA was involved in an "intricate fraudulent enterprise" and a "massive fraud scheme," and JAWA alleges that Verizon made similar statements to aggregators and wireless carriers. Id.

Verizon argues that none of the alleged actions support a claim of business disparagement as a matter of law. Doc. 235 at 6. Verizon [*52] first argues, and the Court agrees, that allegations made in connection with a judicial proceeding are privileged. Id. (citing, e.g., Sierra Madre Dev., Inc. v. Via Entrada Townhouses Assn., 20 Ariz. App. 550, 514 P.2d 503, 510 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1973) (holding that non-frivolous statements made in a complaint cannot be the basis of a defamation claim). Verizon also argues that its letters to aggregators are privileged as long as the aggregators have a significant relationship with the lawsuit (Id. (citing Hall v. Smith, 214 Ariz. 309, 152 P.3d 1192, 1196 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2007) (citing to the Restatement (Second) Torts § 587)) and that they are protected by the Noerr-Pennington doctrine. Id. Verizon also argues that neither the letters nor the press release, nor any other alleged communications, support a claim of disparagement because they do no more than accurately summarize the privileged information and JAWA has not alleged any statements that are purportedly false. Id. at 7.

JAWA responds that Verizon's claim of privilege under Hall v. Smith does not apply to its communications with its aggregators because, unlike the cases involving an insurer or parent company discussed in Hall, the aggregators do not have a financial [*53] interest in Verizon or decision-making authority in the present litigation. Doc. 242 at 12. JAWA also argues that no privilege applies to Verizon's communication with the press or Verizon customers and that whether or not the alleged statements were false is not a proper inquiry on a motion to dismiss. Id. at 13.

The Court is not persuaded that a judicial privilege applies to Verizon's letters to the aggregators. In Hall, the court cited to the general principle that courts not extend absolute privilege to new situations that do not pertain to the policy upon which the privilege is based. 152 P. 3d at 1197. The court in Hall reviewed Arizona case law interpreting privilege under the Restatement (Torts) § 587 and concluded that "the recipient [of the communication] must have had a close or direct relationship to the [lawsuit] for the privilege to apply." Id. at 1196. The Court in Hall found that a litigating party's communications to its parent company were protected by the privilege because the parent company had sent its own employees to conduct investigations, had helped select attorneys, and its relation to the litigation was "close and direct." Id. at 1197-99. No similar facts are [*54] in evidence respecting the aggregators' role in the current litigation. As already noted, however, Verizon's communications with its aggregators are privileged under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine to the extent they are based on objectively reasonable claims, and they are privileged under state privilege law to the extent they are made to protect Verizon's contractual rights. Verizon's statements that JAWA was involved in fraud are unquestionably related to its claims that the Court has found objectively reasonable, and they directly relate to the demands Verizon made to stop JAWA's allegedly fraudulent activities on the Verizon network. The Court finds that the allegedly false statements in the letters cannot support JAWA's business disparagement claim.

The Court is not persuaded that the press release is similarly privileged. See Green Acres Trust v. London, 141 Ariz. 609, 688 P.2d 617, 623 (Ariz. App. 1984) (finding that no privilege attached to communications made to a newspaper by party litigants). Verizon cites no authority for the proposition that a privilege as to one party carries over to the same communications made to another party, or, as here, to the public via the press. JAWA has alleged [*55] specific defamatory statements. See TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 112. Verizon's arguments that its statements were not false or defamatory and that they were made with the legitimate purpose of informing its customers of their right to refunds and not for an improper purpose are factual matters that do not defeat JAWA's claims at the pleading stage. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss this claim to the extent it relies on Verizon's statements made in the complaint and in letters to the aggregators, and will deny the request as it relates to other allegedly false statements made to third parties.

D. Count 4: Conversion.

The TAC alleges that Verizon holds approximately $9 million in funds from aggregators who owe these funds as payments to JAWA. Doc. 220, ¶ 115. The TAC also alleges that Verizon improperly refunded approximately $9 million to customers. Id. The TAC alleges that all funds in question are clearly identifiable as those billed by Verizon for JAWA's PSMS services. Id., ¶ 117. The TAC also alleges that funds Verizon failed to collect on behalf of JAWA are subject to a claim of conversion as accounts receivable. Id., ¶ 119.

Verizon argues that the Court should dismiss JAWA's [*56] conversion claim because JAWA has failed to plead sufficient facts to show that it is entitled to immediate possession of these funds and the TAC alleges that Verizon owes these funds to its aggregators, not to JAWA. Doc. 235 at 8. Verizon also argues that a contractual obligation to pay is not sufficient to support a claim of conversion, which requires a possessory interest, generally in the nature of a lien. Id. (citing, e.g., Universal Mktg. & Entm't, Inc. v. Bank One of Arizona, 203 Ariz. 266, 53 P. 3d 191 (Ariz. App. 2002)). Verizon also argues that JAWA has not pled sufficient facts to show that Verizon had an obligation to treat the funds in question in a specific manner, as required for a showing of conversion under Arizona law. Id. at 9.

JAWA responds that it has alleged a sufficient possessory interest in the funds at issue because the money that Verizon collected was specifically designated for JAWA. Doc. 242 at 13. JAWA cites to Case Corp. v. Gehrke, 208 Ariz. 140, 91 P. 3d 362, 366-68 (Ariz. App. 2004), to show that a plaintiff has a possessory interest in funds deposited into a specific account for that party. Id. JAWA further argues that even if Verizon did not segregate the funds, JAWA still has [*57] a valid claim for conversion because the funds owing to it can be easily traced using Verizon's billing statements. Id.

The Court finds that the TAC has failed to allege sufficient facts to support a claim of conversion under Arizona law. Case Corp., on which JAWA relies, is distinguishable from the facts alleged here because in Case Corp. the plaintiff had a security agreement giving it a possessory interest in defendant's equipment and in proceeds from the sales of that equipment, which were to be placed in a separate account and electronically submitted to plaintiff within seven days. 91 P. 3d at 366. The court in Case Corp. specifically distinguished those facts from Autoville, Inc. v. Friedman, 20 Ariz. App. 89, 510 P. 2d 400, 402 (Ariz. App. 1973), in which it held that a car salesman had no possessory interest, but only that of an ordinary creditor, in the proceeds of car sales made on behalf of a dealer who had promised him commissions because "the specific sale proceeds at issue had not been set aside in a special account for [plaintiff] or otherwise segregated." Case Corp., 91 P. 3d at 366. Although JAWA argues that the funds owing to it are easily segregable on the basis of Verizon's billing [*58] statements, JAWA has not alleged facts, like those in Case Corp., showing that Verizon was required to pay it "a specifically secured amount from a definite source." See id. Likewise, it has not shown that it had a possessory interest in the funds refunded to customers or in Verizon's accounts receivable. Autoville stated that "the modern rule, in which Arizona joins, is that money can be the subject of a conversion provided that it can be described, identified or segregated, and an obligation to treat it in a specific manner is established." 510 P. 2d at 402. JAWA has failed to allege facts to show that Verizon had an obligation to JAWA to treat the funds at issue in a specific manner or even that Verizon had any contractual obligation to pay JAWA. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's conversion claim.

E. Count 5: Unjust Enrichment.

The TAC alleges that Verizon continues to hold approximately $9 million in funds it collected for JAWA's services and that it wrongfully refunded an additional $8 million to Verizon customers. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 125. The TAC alleges that Verizon has been enriched by the money it withheld and that it has been enriched in customer goodwill [*59] for the refunds it wrongfully made using money that should have been paid to JAWA. Id., ¶¶ 126, 127. The TAC also alleges that JAWA has been impoverished by the money withheld from it, by money it paid at Verizon's behest to settle an Illinois judgment, and by the operating costs it expended to offer services for which it has not been compensated. Id., ¶¶ 128, 129. The TAC alleges that in the event it is not granted relief under its other claims to compensation for these funds, it is entitled to an unjust enrichment claim. Id., ¶ 130.

Verizon argues that the TAC fails to allege sufficient facts to show the elements of an unjust enrichment claim, namely: "'(1) an enrichment; (2) an impoverishment; (3) a connection between the enrichment and the impoverishment; (4) the absence of justification for the enrichment and the impoverishment; and (5) the absence of a legal remedy.'" Doc. 235 at 9 (quoting Trustmark Ins. Co. v. Bank One, Arizona, NA, 202 Ariz. 535, 48 P. 3d 485, 491 (Ariz. App. 2002)). The Court does not agree. JAWA has alleged facts to show Verizon's enrichment (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 126, 127) and its own impoverishment (id., ¶¶ 128, 129). The TAC also alleges a causal connection (Verizon's holding [*60] of money owing to JAWA) that it alleges is "unlawful[]," or without justification. See id., ¶ 130. To the extent that JAWA's other claims fail to provide a legal remedy to address Verizon's alleged enrichment at JAWA's expense, the Court finds that JAWA has alleged sufficient facts to state a claim for unjust enrichment.

F. Count 6: Constructive Trust.

The TAC asks the Court to impose a constructive trust on the funds it alleges Verizon has unlawfully withheld from JAWA. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 126. Verizon argues that the TAC fails to allege a sufficient basis for a constructive trust because "[t]here is no 'specific,' identifiable property over which the Court could impose a constructive trust." Doc. 235 at 10. For the reasons already stated above with regard to JAWA's conversion claim, the Court agrees. See Burch & Cracchiolo, P.A. v. Pugliani, 144 Ariz. 281, 697 P. 2d 674, 679 (Ariz. App. 1985) ("A prerequisite to the imposition of a constructive trust is the identification of a specific property belonging to the claimant. . . . A general claim for money damages will not give rise to a constructive trust.") (internal cites omitted). The Court is not persuaded that Turley v. Ethington, 213 Ariz. 640, 146 P. 3d 1282, 1285 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2006), [*61] which JAWA cites for the proposition that courts are not required to use an "unyielding formula" when granting a constructive trust, is to the contrary. See Doc. 242 at 15. Turley dealt with a constructive trust over real property and did not address whether a claim for money damages provides an adequate basis for a constructive trust where the claimant has stated that funds owing to it are traceable but has not identified a secured interest or contractual entitlement to specific funds. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's constructive trust claim.

G. Counts 7 & 8: Antitrust.

The TAC alleges that Verizon violated the Sherman Act and the New Jersey Antitrust Act by orchestrating an illegal boycott of JAWA by the aggregators and other wireless carriers in order to reduce competition in the PSMS market. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 136-185. Verizon argues that the Court should dismiss these claims primarily because JAWA has alleged no facts to support an agreement between the aggregators or to show that Verizon reached an agreement with other wireless providers. Doc. 235 at 11-15. The Court agrees, for the reasons already discussed in relation to JAWA's tortious interference claim, [*62] that the TAC only alleges demands Verizon made to each aggregator, individually, to protect Verizon's interests in ending JAWA's allegedly fraudulent sales practices on its own network. The TAC alleges that an agreement existed between the aggregators not to do business with JAWA (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 142), but the TAC has not alleged facts to support a showing that Verizon took any actions to induce aggregators to operate in concert, according to a "contract, combination, or conspiracy" to restrain trade as required for a claim under Section 1 of the Sherman Act. See Tanaka v. Univ. of S. Cal., 252 F. 3d 1059, 1062 (9th Cir. 2001). Additionally, although the TAC alleges that Verizon communicated with other wireless carriers and "coerced the Carriers to agree to boycott JAWA" (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 158), this allegation is conclusory. See Doc. 235 at 12 ("JAWA does not allege any time or place in which any meeting or communication occurred, nor the individuals who may have communicated or agreed."). The Supreme Court addressed the adequacy of a Sherman Act pleading in Twombly and concluded that "parallel conduct does not suggest conspiracy, and a conclusory allegation of agreement at some unidentified [*63] point does not supply facts adequate to show illegality." 550 U.S. at 557. Because the Court finds that the TAC fails to allege sufficient facts to show an agreement to boycott JAWA, the Court need not address JAWA's allegations based on the "rule of reason" that Verizon's alleged actions reduced competition. See TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 145-55; 170-80. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's Sherman Act claim. Because the New Jersey Antitrust Act mirrors federal antitrust law (See N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:9-18; Inter-City Tire and Auto Ctr., Inc. v. Uniroyal, Inc., 701 F.Supp. 1120 (D. N.J. 1988), aff'd Inter-City Tire and Auto Ctr., Inc. v. Uniroyal, Inc., 888 F.2d 1380 (3d Cir 1989), Uniroyal, Inc. v. Erbesh, 888 F.2d 1382 (3d Cir 1989)), the Court will also dismiss JAWA's New Jersey Antitrust claim.

H. Count 9: Abuse of Process.

The TAC alleges that Verizon used the judicial process for improper purposes including seeking customer goodwill by issuing refunds, seeking to retain profits owing to JAWA, and seeking to put JAWA out of business to enhance its competitive advantage in the same industry. TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 187.

The parties agree that to assert a claim for abuse of process, [*64] a party must allege "(1) a willful act in the use of judicial process; (2) for an ulterior purpose not proper in the regular conduct of the proceedings." See Docs. 235 at 18; 242 at 15 (quoting Crackel v. Allstate Ins. Co., 208 Ariz. 252, 92 P.3d 882, 887 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2004) (quoting Nienstedt v. Wetzel, 133 Ariz. 348, 651 P.2d 876, 881 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1982)). Verizon argues, and the Court agrees, that JAWA has failed to allege facts to support its abuse of process claim. See Doc. 235 at 18. The TAC alleges no particular use of the legal process other than Verizon's filing of the complaint. See TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 59. JAWA argues in its response that Verizon also abused the legal process by requesting injunctive relief. Doc. 242 at 16. Although the TAC alleges that Verizon had "ulterior motives" (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶ 187), its allegations fail to show how Verizon's actions used the legal process "primarily to accomplish a purpose for which the process was not designed." See Nienstedt, 651 P. 2d at 881. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's abuse of process claims.

I. Count 10: RICO.

The TAC alleges that Verizon, together with the aggregators, operated as an enterprise that engaged in a pattern of racketeering [*65] activity in violation of 18 U.S.C. § 1963(c) ("RICO"). TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 190-91. The TAC alleges that the predicate acts of racketeering included mail fraud and wire fraud under 18 U.S.C. §§ 1341, 1343. Id., ¶ 192. In particular, the TAC alleges that Verizon and other members of the enterprise used the U.S. mail and interstate communications to issue sham refunds and to steal and convert approximately $18 million owing to JAWA. Id., ¶ 193.

Verizon argues that JAWA fails to plead key elements necessary for a RICO claim, including what the alleged "enterprise" is and what conduct Verizon engaged in with the aggregators in violation of RICO. Doc. 235 at 19 (citing Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc., 473 U.S. 479, 105 S. Ct. 3275, 87 L. Ed. 2d 346 (1985)). Verizon also argues that JAWA fails adequately to plead the predicate acts of mail and wire fraud because it has pled no facts to show fraudulent misrepresentation and it fails to satisfy the requirement of Federal Rule 9(b) that acts of fraud be pled with particularity, including the time, place, and content of the misrepresentation. Doc. 235 at 19-20.

The Court agrees that the TAC fails to plead acts of fraudulent misrepresentation in relation to Verizon's alleged scheme [*66] to offer sham refunds and to withhold money from JAWA, and that this failure is fatal to its predicate claims of mail and wire fraud. To allege a violation of mail or wire fraud, a plaintiff must show (1) a scheme or artifice to defraud, (2) the use of U.S. mails or wires in furtherance of the scheme, and (3) specific intent to deceive or defraud. See Miller v. Yokohama Tire Corp., 358 F.3d 616, 620 (9th Cir.2004) (mail fraud); Schreiber Dist. Co. v. Serv-Well Furniture Co., 806 F. 2d 1393, 1400 (9th Cir. 1986) (wire fraud). JAWA argues on the basis of Bridge v. Phoenix Bond & Indem. Co., 553 U.S. 639, 648-49, 128 S. Ct. 2131, 170 L. Ed. 2d 1012 (2008), that no allegations of fraud or misrepresentation are required. Doc. 242 at 19. Bridge stated that "[u]sing the mail to execute or attempt to execute a scheme to defraud is indictable as mail fraud, and hence a predicate act of racketeering under RICO, even if no one relied on any misrepresentation." 553 U.S. at 648. Bridge held that mail fraud occurs through an attempt to defraud even if no one relies on the fraudulent misrepresentation, not that mail fraud does not require an attempt to defraud or deceive. See id. at 648-57 (rejecting the argument that fraud claims under [*67] RICO require "first-party reliance."). This distinction does not relieve JAWA of the need to allege specific acts of fraud or attempted fraud to establish the underlying offense. JAWA directs the Court to ¶¶ 194-209 of the TAC to show that it has properly alleged racketeering activity with particularity. Doc. 242 at 19. The only particulars cited in these paragraphs, however, are the letters Verizon sent to aggregators (who, JAWA alleges, are actually part of the racketeering enterprise), demanding that they cut off business with JAWA on Verizon's network and that they indemnify Verizon for its losses (TAC, Doc. 220, ¶¶ 194-95), and the filing of this lawsuit and unspecified solicitations to customers, encouraging them to seek refunds in apparent contradiction of the terms of Verizon's Illinois settlement (id., ¶¶ 202-204). The TAC alleges only that the letters caused the aggregators to be fearful of Verizon, not that they made fraudulent representations. See id., ¶ 197. Moreover, even construing the communications to customers as made with the intent to deceive because they offered refunds in apparent contradiction to the terms of the Illinois settlement, the TAC does not allege with [*68] particularity the content of these communications or how they misrepresented the terms of that settlement. See id., ¶ 204. Having found that the TAC fails to allege with particularity specific acts of fraud to support the alleged underlying RICO offenses, the Court need not address Verizon's other arguments that JAWA has failed to show that Verizon and the aggregators worked in concert as an "enterprise" or that their alleged conduct constituted a pattern of racketeering activity. See Doc. 235 at 19. The Court will grant Verizon's request to dismiss JAWA's RICO claims.

HN1[] Costs & Attorney Fees, Costs

A court has broad discretion to determine whether to overlook a party's failure to comply with local rules. Where equity so requires, the Court will exercise its inherent power to review an award of costs, even if no objections were made to the Clerk before costs were awarded.

HN2[] Judges, Discretionary Powers

Under Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(1), unless a federal statute, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, or a court order provides otherwise, costs — other than attorney's fees — should be allowed to the prevailing party. There is a strong presumption that the prevailing party will be awarded costs under Rule 54(d) — an award against the losing party is the normal rule obtaining in civil litigation, not an exception. It is within the district court's discretion to deny costs for a variety of reasons, including misconduct by the prevailing party, the public importance of the case, the difficulty of the issues, or the losing party's limited financial resources. The losing party shoulders the burden of rebutting the presumption against it and, should a district court decide to deny costs, it must articulate its reasons.

HN3[] Clayton Act, Remedies

There is no statute or rule that supercedes a district court's Fed. R. Civ. P. 54(d)(1) discretion to award or deny costs to a plaintiff who has failed to prevail in an antitrust action. The Clayton Act provides that a party injured by an antitrust violation shall recover the cost of suit. 15 U.S.C.S. § 15(a). It does not alter a court's discretion to award or deny costs to a plaintiff who has failed to prove a violation.

Civil Procedure > ... > Costs & Attorney Fees > Costs > General Overview

HN4[] Costs & Attorney Fees, Costs

In considering an award of costs, a district court should consider the amount of costs, the good faith of the losing party, and the closeness and difficulty of the issues raised by a case. The closeness of a case is judged not by whether one party clearly prevails over another, but by the refinement of perception required to recognize, sift through and organize relevant evidence, and by the difficulty of discerning the law of the case.

MEMORANDUM [*15] AND ORDER

BLOCK, Senior District Judge:

Defendants' motions for summary judgment in this antitrust action were granted and affirmed on appeal. Plaintiffs now move this court to vacate the award of $127,558.55 in costs imposed by the Clerk of the Court pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(d)(1). For the reasons that follow, that motion is granted.

I

Defendant Bayer AG and its subsidiary, Bayer Corporation (collectively "Bayer"), possess the patent for the active ingredient in the antibiotic ciprofloxacin hydrochloride ("Cipro"). The patent was issued in June 1987 and scheduled to expire in December 2003, with an additional six-month period of pediatric exclusivity until June 2004.

In 1991, defendant Barr Laboratories, Inc. ("Barr") filed an Abbreviated New Drug Application ("ANDA") seeking approval to market a generic version of Cipro. Barr included a pre-expiration challenge ("ANDA-IV" certification), through which it sought permission to market the generic drug before Bayer's patent expired on the grounds that the patent was invalid or would not be infringed. See 21 U.S.C. § 355(j)(2)(B). An ANDA-IV certification is an act of infringement, see 35 U.S.C. § 271 (e)(2)(A); Arkansas Carpenters Health and Welfare Fund v. Bayer AG, 604 F.3d 98, 101 (2d Cir. 2010), [*16] and Bayer responded by suing Barr for patent infringement in January 1992 in the Southern District of New York. To fund the litigation, Barr entered into an agreement with defendant The Rugby Group ("Rugby"), then a subsidiary of defendant Hoechst Marion Roussel, Inc. ("HMR"),[1] under which Barr agreed to share its potential profits from the generic drug with Rugby in exchange for Rugby's agreement to finance a portion of the litigation.

In January 1997, Bayer and Barr settled the patent litigation by agreeing to what is known as a "reverse exclusionary payment" — Bayer, the patent holder, payed Barr, the alleged infringer, to stay off the market and end the litigation. Bayer agreed to pay Barr $49.1 million upfront, plus either quarterly payments of $12.5 million to $17.125 million until six months prior to the patent's expiration or a license to sell Bayer-manufactured Cipro, and it gave the generic manufactures permission to sell Cipro at a reduced rate for six months before the patent's expiration.

As a result of this settlement, purchasers of Cipro [*17] filed over 30 antitrust actions in 2000, which were consolidated in the Eastern District of New York before Judge David Trager. In 2005, the court granted defendants' summary judgment motions and held that because the agreements did not restrain competition beyond the scope of the patent they had no anti-competitive effect. See In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litig., 363 F. Supp. 2d 514 (E.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Cipro I"). Plaintiffs appealed.

The Second Circuit retained jurisdiction over the direct purchaser plaintiffs' appeals, but transferred the indirect purchaser plaintiffs' appeal, which included claims arising out of patent law, to the Federal Circuit. The Federal Circuit affirmed, holding that the district court applied an appropriate level of antitrust scrutiny "because any anti-competitive effects . . . were within the exclusionary zone of the patent" and that the state antitrust claims were properly dismissed. In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litigation, 544 F.3d 1323, 1341 (2008) ("Cipro II"). The Second Circuit also affirmed, emphasizing that it was bound by its decision in Joblove v. Barr Labs. Inc., (In re Tamoxifen Citrate Antitrust Litig.), 466 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2006) [*18] ("Tamoxifen"). See Arkansas Carpenters Health and Welfare Fund v. Bayer AG, 604 F.3d 98 (2010) ("Cipro III").

Defendants filed their requests for bills of costs on December 1, 2010. Plaintiffs filed no objections. On May 13, 2011, Magistrate Judge Steven Gold directed the clerk to tax costs in the full amount sought. On May 18, 2011, the Clerk taxed plaintiffs $53,066.80 in favor of Bayer; $36,952.75 in favor of Barr; and $37,539.00 in favor of HMR, Rugby, and Watson. On May 20, 2011, plaintiffs filed the motion to vacate costs now before the Court.

II

a. Timeliness.

[1] Rugby was subsequently sold to defendant Watson Pharmaceuticals, Inc. ("Watson") (collectively, with Barr and HMR, "generic defendants").

Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 54(d)(1) provides that, after a clerk taxes costs, a district court may review the clerk's action "[o]n motion served within the next 7 days." Plaintiffs complied with this rule, as their motion was filed within seven days of the Clerk's entry. Local Rule 54.1(b), however, imposes an additional procedural requirement: "A party objecting to any cost item shall serve objections . . . prior to or at the date and time scheduled for taxation." If no objections are filed, "any item listed may be taxed within the discretion of the Clerk." Local Rule 54.1(b).

Plaintiffs' failure to [*19] object prior to entry of costs thus constitutes a default under the local rules. See Dejesus v. Starr Technical Risks Agency, Inc., No. 03 Civ. 1298, 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 7152, 2005 WL 957389 at *1 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Court finds that plaintiff defaulted under Local Rule 54.1 by not objecting to the bill of costs prior to [date of hearing]."]); Weisbart v. U.S. Dept. of Taxation, No. 97 Civ. 6020, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21937, 2001 WL 1782873 at *4 (E.D.N.Y. 2001) (declining to consider the merits of an objection to the Clerk's award of costs where the losing party failed to comply with Local Rule 54.1(b)). Plaintiffs' explanation for missing the deadline is that their counsel contacted the Clerk's office to inquire when objections were due and was told, inaccurately, that a hearing date would be set and they had until the hearing date to file objections.

HN1[] The Court "has broad discretion to determine whether to overlook a party's failure to comply with local rules." D.H. Blair & Co., Inc. v. Gottdiener, 462 F.3d 95, 109 n.2 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting Holtz v. Rockefeller & Co., Inc., 258 F.3d 62, 73 (2d Cir. 2001)). Where equity so requires, the Court will exercise its "'inherent power' to review an award of costs, even if no objections were made [*20] to the Clerk before costs were awarded." See Weisbart v. U.S. Dept. of Taxation, No. 97 Civ. 6020, 2001 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 21937, 2001 WL 1782873 at *4 (E.D.N.Y. 2001). Here, equity favors review of plaintiffs' motion on the merits.

b. Award of costs.

HN2[] Under Rule 54(d)(1), "[u]nless a federal statute, [the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure], or a court order provides otherwise, costs — other than attorney's fees — should be allowed to the prevailing party." There is a strong presumption that the prevailing party will be awarded costs under Rule 54(d) — "an award against the losing party is the normal rule obtaining in civil litigation, not an exception." See Whitfield v. Scully, 241 F.3d 264, 270 (2d Cir. 2001). It is within the district court's discretion to deny costs for a variety of reasons, including "misconduct by the prevailing party, the public importance of the case, the difficulty of the issues, or the losing party's limited financial resources." Id. at 270; see also McDonnell v. American Leduc Petroleums, Limited, 456 F.2d 1170, 1188 (2d Cir. 1972); see also Ramnarain v. City of New York, 474 F.Supp. 2d 443, 448 (E.D.N.Y. 2007).[2] The losing party shoulders the burden of rebutting the presumption against it [*21] and, should a district court decide to deny costs, it "must articulate its reasons." See Whitfield, 241 F.3d at 270.

Plaintiffs argue that the Court should deny defendants costs here because the litigation was "close, complex and protracted." These are valid reasons to deny defendants costs. See Remington Products, Inc. v. North American Philips, Corp., 763 F. Supp. 683, 687 (D. Conn. 1991); see also Rivera v. City of Chicago, 469 F.3d 631, 635 (7th Cir. 2006) (HN4[] "the district court should consider the amount of costs, the good faith of the losing party, and the closeness and difficulty of the issues raised by a case"); Whitfield, 241 F.3d at 270 (costs may be denied because of "difficulty [*22] of the issues"); White & White, Inc. v. American Hosp. Supply Corp., 786 F.2d 728, 732 (6th Cir. 1986) (affirming denial of costs in "close and difficult" case). "The closeness of a case is judged not by whether one party clearly prevails over another, but by the refinement of perception required to recognize, sift through and organize relevant evidence, and by the difficulty of discerning the law of the case." White & White, Inc., 786 F.2d at 732.

[2] HN3[] There is no statute or rule that supercedes a district court's Rule 54(d)(1) discretion to award or deny costs to a plaintiff who has failed to prevail in an antitrust action. See White & White, Inc. v. American Hosp. Supply Corp., 786 F.2d 728, 731 (6th Cir. 1986). The Clayton Act provides that a party injured by an antitrust violation "shall recover . . . the cost of suit." 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). It does not alter a court's discretion to award or deny costs to a plaintiff who has failed to prove a violation.

The law regarding reverse exclusionary payments was in flux throughout the course of this litigation. At the time plaintiffs' complaint was filed, no circuit court had ruled on the legality of reverse exclusion payment agreements and the Federal Trade Commission viewed such settlements as violations of antitrust law. See Cipro II, 604 F.3d at 104-105. As of 2003, when Judge Trager denied defendants' motions to dismiss, the Second Circuit had not yet decided the question and "courts within other circuits [had] found that agreements between pioneer drug manufacturers and generic manufacturers that filed ANDA IVs seeking to market a generic version of the pioneer drug constitute horizontal market allocations agreements and are, thus, per se [*23] illegal." In re Ciprofloxacin Hydrochloride Antitrust Litigation, 261 F. Supp. 2d 188, 237 (E.D.N.Y. 2003). Judge Trager distinguished these cases and determined that the agreements at issue here were not per se illegal. Id. at 257. This triggered two years of discovery prior to the court's 78-page opinion, in 2005, granting defendants summary judgment.

The Second Circuit panel noted that it was bound by Tamoxifen, which was decided while this case was pending on appeal. Cipro II, 604 F.3d at 105. It pointed to several reasons, however, why en banc reconsideration of the issue would be appropriate. Id. at 108-110. Although the Circuit ultimately denied rehearing en banc, Judge Pooler penned a vigorous dissent. See Arkansas Carpenters Health and Welfare Fund, 625 F.3d 779 (2d Cir. 2010). The Federal Circuit also relied heavily on Tamoxifen, as well as recent Eleventh Circuit case law. See Cipro III, 544 F.3d at 1335-1336.

In short, the law of this case has been difficult to discern, as evidenced by the depth and length of the Judge Trager's analysis, the conflicting circuit court approaches and the development of the issue over the long life of the case. Moreover, there is no suggestion [*24] that plaintiffs brought this action in bad faith. Accordingly, the Court finds that this litigation was sufficiently close, complex and protracted to warrant the parties bearing their own costs.

SO ORDERED.

Opinion

Amalia Corona Lample filed an action on behalf of herself and all others similarly situated alleging California Physicians' Service, doing business as Blue Shield of California (Blue Shield), violated California's unfair competition law (Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200 et seq.) (UCL) by charging certain subscribers to its preferred provider health care service plans premiums that exceed the rate caps identified in Health and Safety Code sections 1399.805 and 1399.811.[1] Lample also asserted a claim for fraudulent concealment based on Blue Shield's failure to disclose its unlawful practice to its subscribers. The trial court sustained Blue Shield's demurrer without leave to amend, concluding Blue Shield's alleged conduct was not prohibited by sections 1399.805 [*2] and 1399.811 as a matter of law and therefore did not violate the UCL. The court also sustained the demurrer to Lample's fraud claim, finding it derivative of the UCL claims. Because Lample's claims under the UCL were not properly dismissed, we reverse.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

1. Pertinent Statutory and Regulatory Environment

a. The federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act

The federal Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act (HIPAA), which became law in 1996, requires every health insurance issuer to offer for sale individual health insurance coverage to individuals who had had group health care coverage prior to the expiration of their federal COBRA[2] benefits and who satisfy certain other criteria. (See 42 U.S.C § 300gg-41.) HIPAA was intended to provide a safety net for those individuals who, due to job loss or change in employer-provided benefits, had lost their group health insurance by guaranteeing those persons "the availability" of health care coverage regardless of otherwise disqualifying factors, including preexisting health conditions. (42 U.S.C § 300gg-41; [*3] see Sen. Rep. No. 104-56, 1st Sess., p. 1 (1995) ["The current health insurance market provides too little protection for individuals and families with significant health problems and makes it too difficult for employers—particularly small employers—to obtain adequate coverage for their employees. [HIPAA] will reduce many of the current barriers to obtaining health coverage by making it easier for people who change jobs or lose their jobs to maintain adequate coverage and by providing increased purchasing power to small businesses and individuals."].)

b. California law on coverage for HIPAA-eligible individuals

In 2000 the California Legislature passed, and the Governor signed, Senate Bill No. 265 (1999-2000 Reg. Sess.), codified in sections 1366.35, 1399.805, 1399.811 and Insurance Code sections 10785, 10900-10902.6, to implement an [*4] "acceptable alternative mechanism to HIPPA." (Stats. 2000, ch. 810, §§ 1-6; see 42 U.S.C. § 300gg-44 [health insurance issuer may comply with HIPAA legislation either by compliance with the federal law or with "an acceptable alternative [state law] mechanism"]; 45 C.F.R. § 148.120(b) [same]; see also Assem. Com. on Health, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 265 (1999-2000, Reg. Sess.), as amended July 6, 2000 [legislation is intended as "acceptable alternative mechanism" to HIPAA].)

California's HIPAA-based legislation combined HIPAA's guarantee of access to available health care coverage with affordability, with the latter component achieved by imposing premium caps on the products California insurers and health care service plans are required to make available to HIPAA-eligible consumers. (See Assem. Com. on Health, Analysis of Sen. Bill No. 265, as introduced at p. 4 ["The purpose of this bill is to combine access with affordability, since insurers and plans already are required under HIPAA to make coverage available to this population. [B]ecause HIPAA does not restrict premium rates, California insurers are charging at least 200 percent of the normal group rates for HIPAA coverage. [¶] This [*5] bill addresses the affordability issue" by imposing rate caps on HIPAA products.]; see also Sen. Bill No. 265 (1999-2000 Reg. Sess.), as amended Aug. 30, 2000 ["high premiums" charged by health care service plans and insurers for HIPAA products are cost prohibitive, "destroy[ing] the federal intent [of HIPPA] to make health care coverage portable when a worker loses employer-based coverage].)

[2] COBRA is an acronym for the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1985, which mandates that certain employees and their dependents be offered the option of paying premiums to continue medical coverage for a limited period after the termination of coverage under a group health plan. (See 29 U.S.C. §§ 1161-1167; 42 U.S.C. §§ 300bb-1 to 300bb-8.)

The statutory rate caps for HIPAA products delivered by health care service plans through preferred provider arrangements (HIPAA PPO plans) are codified in sections 1399.805, subdivision (a)(1)(A) and 1399.811, subdivision (a)(1).[3] Both statutes provide that "in no case" shall the premium charged for any HIPAA PPO plan exceed "the average premium paid by a subscriber of the Major Risk Medical Insurance Program who is of the same age and resides in the same geographic area as the federally eligible individual."

c. The Major Risk Medical Insurance Program

The Major Risk Medical Insurance Program (MRMIP), enacted in 1989 and substantially amended in 1990 (predating HIPAA), is California's state-subsidized health care coverage program for "high risk" individuals who cannot obtain coverage in the individual health insurance market due to, among other things, preexisting health conditions. (See Ins. Code, § 12700, subd. (a) [Legislature "finds [*7] and declares" that "many Californians do not have employer-sponsored group health coverage and are unable to secure adequate health coverage for themselves and their dependents because of preexisting medical conditions, and a number of employer sponsored groups have difficulty obtaining or maintaining their health coverage because some members of the group either have or are viewed as being at risk for having high medical costs"]; see generally Ins. Code, §§ 12700-12739.4 [statutory provisions pertaining to MRMIP].)

The MRMIP is administered by the Managed Risk Medical Insurance Board (the MRMIP Board), which, among other things, has broad authority to determine program eligibility, approve subscriber contributions and premium rates and issue rules and regulations to carry out the purposes of the MRMIP. (See Ins. Code, § 12711 [vesting MRIMIP Board with regulatory authority].) The MRMIP Board determines MRMIP premiums based on risk categories defined by a subscriber's geographic location and age group. (See Ins. Code, § 12737; Cal. Code Regs., tit. 10, § 2698.400, subd. (a)(1) [dividing California into six geographic regions and establishing 12 defined age groups]; see also Cal. Code Regs., tit. 10, § 2698.400, subd. (b) [*8] ["n]o other risk categories are allowed for the purpose of this program"].) These "rating cells"—defined groups based on age group and geographic regions—are then used by the MRMIP Board along with regulatory formulas to determine MRMIP subscriber premiums.

2. The Complaint

In July 2010 Lample, a subscriber to Blue Shield's HIPPA preferred provider program, filed an action on behalf of herself and a putative class of all other similarly situated California residents. The operative second amended complaint alleges that, from 2001 through 2009, Blue Shield charged subscribers to its HIPAA PPO plans, including her, premiums in excess of the average premium paid by a subscriber of the MRMIP who was of the same age and resided in the same geographic area, in violation of sections 1399.805, subdivision (a)(1)(A), and 1399.811, subdivision (a)(1).

[3] California insurance companies and health care service plans are subject to two distinct regulatory schemes. Health care service plans such as Blue Shield are governed by the Knox-Keene Health Care Service Plan Act of 1975 (Knox-Keene Act) (see § 1340 et seq.) and fall under the regulatory [*6] authority of the Department of Managed Health Care. (See Nieto v. Blue Shield of Cal. Life & Health Ins. Co. (2010) 181 Cal.App.4th 60, 84-85, 103 Cal. Rptr. 3d 906.) Other health care issuers, including traditional indemnity health care insurers, are subject to provisions of the Insurance Code and fall under the regulatory authority of the Department of Insurance. (Blue Cross of California, Inc. v. Superior Court (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 1237, 1243, 102 Cal. Rptr. 3d 615; Viola v. California Dept. of Managed Health Care (2005) 133 Cal.App.4th 299, 309, fn. 3, 34 Cal. Rptr. 3d 626.) California's HIPAA-based legislation governs both health insurers and health care service plans. (Compare §§ 1366.35, 1399.805, 1399.811 [health care service plans] with Ins. Code, §§ 10785, 10900-10902.6 [health benefit plans governed by Ins. Code].)

Lample's pleading acknowledges that neither section 1399.805 nor 1399.811 defines the methodology to calculate the "average premium paid" by a subscriber of the MRMIP within a particular risk category. It also recognizes that, at least prior to 2009, the Department of Managed Health Care had not adopted regulations that require use of a particular [*9] formula or calculation method.[4] However, paragraph 22 of the pleading alleges the Department of Managed Health Care and the Department of Insurance decided, soon after sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 were enacted, that the MRMIP Board would calculate and provide both departments with the "average premium paid" by MRMIP subscribers by using a "weighted average by region and age range." The "weight" is based on the number of subscribers enrolled in a particular plan for each rating cell. The use of the weighted mean, rather than a "straight average," prevents a plan with only a few subscribers in a particular cell from having undue significance in the average premium calculation.[5]

According to the complaint, the MRMIP Board annually calculated the average premium paid for MRMIP products in accordance with the weighted mean methodology and, pursuant to their agreement, communicated that information to the Department of Managed Health Care to give to HIPPA PPO providers. Although this information was available to health care service plans on request, Blue Shield did not request it from the Department of Managed Health Care. Instead, using its own methodology, Blue Shield calculated premiums for its HIPAA products based on the average of the rates each provider of HIPAA PPO service plans sought to charge MRMIP subscribers, that is, a straight average of premium rates without regard to the number of subscribers to each plan in a particular rating cell. As a result, Lample alleges, Blue Shield charged its HIPAA eligible subscribers as much as 55 percent more than other health care service preferred provider [*11] plans that had adhered to the Department of Managed Health Care's methodology for calculating the average premium paid.

Lample's putative class action asserts Blue Shield's HIPAA PPO premiums violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 and thus constitute an unlawful business practice under Business and Professions Code section 17200. Lample sought both an injunction prohibiting Blue Shield from continuing to calculate premiums in violation of the statutory rate caps and restitution for herself and all similarly situated Blue Shield subscribers. Lample's pleading also asserts a cause of action for fraud on behalf of herself and the putative class, claiming Blue Shield had a duty to disclose to its subscribers that its rates were in excess of the statutory rate caps.

3. Blue Shield's Demurrer to the Second Amended Complaint

Blue Shield demurred to the second amended complaint, arguing the court could determine it had not violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 as a matter of law. Blue Shield observed that neither section 1399.805 nor 1399.801 nor any formal regulation promulgated by the Department of Managed Health Care defined the phrase "average premium paid" by a subscriber or identified [*12] a particular methodology to calculate the rate caps. The MRMIP Board, Blue Shield argued, is not the regulatory authority for health care service plans—the Department of Managed Health Care is—and the MRMIP Board's methodology was not binding on it. Moreover, Blue Shield argued, the Department of Managed Health Care had approved its methodology, and Blue Shield could not be held liable for its good faith conduct in accordance with that approval.

In support of its demurrer Blue Shield requested the trial court take judicial notice of excerpts of the legislative history of Assembly Bill No. 718 (2009-2010 Reg. Sess.) (AB 718), legislation proposed by the Department of Managed Health Care in January 2009 to specifically define the phrase "average premium paid by a subscriber" used in sections 1399.805 and 1399.811. The Department explained in a position paper in support of the proposed legislation that clarifying language was needed because the statutes did not specify the methodology to be used to calculate the rate caps and the phrase had been interpreted differently by regulators and regulated entities. The Department stated it "never formally adopted a position on the matter, nor has [*13] the current Insurance Commissioner," and "the lack of clear guidance in the statute [has] resulted in health plans selling PPO products using different 'average premium formulas.'"

[4] In late 2009 the Department of Managed Health Care adopted a policy interpreting sections 1399.805 and 1399.811's "average premium paid" language to require application of a formula that uses "weights" based upon the "MRMIP population base of an entire region . . . rather than the population of a single age band . . . within that region." Lample alleges the new policy was adopted without complying with California's Administrative Procedures Act (Gov. Code, § 11340.5) and has separately petitioned for a writ [*10] of mandate to compel the Department to rescind the 2009 policy, alleging it is invalid. (L.A. Sup. Ct. Case No. BC445662.)

[5] Although not specifically alleged in Lample's complaint, it is reasonable to infer that the more expensive plan will have fewer subscribers.

The Department of Managed Health Care's position paper also detailed the methodologies used by various health plans to calculate the "average premium paid" by MRMIP subscribers in a particular rating cell, that is, within a particular age group and geographic region. For example, the Department observed, the MRMIP Board uses "a weighted average of all rates for the MRMIP plans . . . . The 'weight' comes from the number of subscribers in any given rating cell (aka age category, i.e. 30-34)." Blue Shield, in contrast, uses a "straight (unweighted) average of each MRMIP health plan's rates, in any given rating cell, rounded to whole dollars. For instance, if there are five plans participating in MRMIP, Blue Shield would take their rates from a rating cell, add them, then divide by five to get its HIPAA PPO rate for that rate cell."

Lample opposed the demurrer, insisting paragraph 22 of the operative second amended complaint alleges a long-standing interpretation of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 by the Department [*14] of Managed Health Care, made contemporaneously with the legislative enactment, which required use of the MRMIP Board's weighted average formula to calculate the average premium paid in accordance with sections 1399.805 and 1399.811. In addition, Lample objected to Blue Shield's request for judicial notice because AB 718 had been withdrawn by its legislative sponsor, and the truth of the facts described in the material presented to the court was not subject to judicial notice. Finally, Lample argued she had properly pleaded a cause of action for fraudulent nondisclosure because Blue Shield never told its subscribers it was using its own methodology, rather than the rates calculated by the MRMIP Board, to ensure its HIPAA PPO product premiums fell within statutory rate caps.

4. The Trial Court's Order Sustaining Blue Shield's Demurrer Without Leave To Amend

The trial court granted Blue Shield's request for judicial notice of the Department of Managed Health Care's 2009 position paper in support of AB 718 and sustained Blue Shield's demurrer without leave to amend. The court explained, "Although the questions presented are somewhat complex, they are fundamentally a legal question as to [*15] what is the reference point for government-imposed pricing of these policies. The Court agrees with defendant's analysis that they are entitled to use the procedures which have been employed to date and that plaintiff's contrary analysis of how these policies ought to be priced is not legally mandated by the statute. The second cause of action is derivative of the legal theory pled in the first cause of action, so it necessarily falls if the first cause of action falls. [¶] Under the circumstances, there is no reason to drag out this case in the trial court simply to re-posture the same question as a ruling on a motion for summary judgment. Therefore, having agreed with defendant's position, the Court finds no reason to allow leave to amend."

DISCUSSION

1. Standard of Review

On appeal from an order dismissing an action after the sustaining of a demurrer, we independently review the pleading to determine whether the facts alleged state a cause of action under any possible legal theory. (McCall v. PacifiCare of Cal., Inc. (2001) 25 Cal.4th 412, 415, 106 Cal. Rptr. 2d 271, 21 P.3d 1189; Aubry v. Tri-City Hospital Dist. (1992) 2 Cal.4th 962, 967, 9 Cal. Rptr. 2d 92, 831 P.2d 317.) We give the complaint a reasonable interpretation, "treat[ing] the demurrer as [*16] admitting all material facts properly pleaded," but do not "assume the truth of contentions, deductions or conclusions of law." (Aubry, at p. 967; accord, Zelig v. County of Los Angeles (2002) 27 Cal.4th 1112, 1126, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 709, 45 P.3d 1171.) We liberally construe the pleading with a view to substantial justice between the parties. (Code Civ. Proc., § 452; Schifando v. City of Los Angeles (2003) 31 Cal.4th 1074, 1081, 6 Cal. Rptr. 3d 457, 79 P.3d 569.)

"'Where the complaint is defective, "[i]n the furtherance of justice great liberality should be exercised in permitting a plaintiff to amend his complaint, and it ordinarily constitutes an abuse of discretion to sustain a demurrer without leave to amend if there is a reasonable possibility that the defect can be cured by amendment. [Citations.]"' [Citations.] This abuse of discretion is reviewable on appeal 'even in the absence of a request for leave to amend' [citations], and even if the plaintiff does not claim on appeal that the trial court abused its discretion in sustaining a demurrer without leave to amend." (Aubry v. Tri-City Hospital Dist., supra, 2 Cal.4th at pp. 970-971.) We determine whether the plaintiff has shown "in what manner he can amend his complaint and how that amendment will [*17] change the legal effect of his pleading." (Goodman v. Kennedy (1976) 18 Cal.3d 335, 349, 134 Cal. Rptr. 375, 556 P.2d 737.)

2. The UCL—Business and Professions Code Section 17200

Unfair competition under the UCL means "any unlawful, unfair or fraudulent business act or practice and unfair, deceptive, untrue or misleading advertising . . . ." Written in the disjunctive, Business and Professions Code section 17200 establishes "three varieties of unfair competition—acts or practices which are unlawful, unfair, or fraudulent." (Cel-Tech Communications, Inc. v. Los Angeles Cellular Telephone Co. (1999) 20 Cal.4th 163, 180, 83 Cal. Rptr. 2d 548, 973 P.2d 527 (Cel-Tech); accord, Kasky v. Nike, Inc. (2002) 27 Cal.4th 939, 949, 119 Cal. Rptr. 2d 296, 45 P.3d 243.)

The "unlawful" prong of the UCL "'borrows' violations of other laws by making them independently actionable as unfair competitive practices." (Korea Supply Co. v. Lockheed Martin Corp. (2003) 29 Cal.4th 1134, 1143, 131 Cal. Rptr. 2d 29, 63 P.3d 937; accord, Kasky v. Nike, supra, 27 Cal.4th at p. 949; Ticconi v. Blue Shield of California Life & Health Ins. Co. (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 528, 539, 72 Cal. Rptr. 3d 888.) The "unfair" prong authorizes a cause of action under the UCL if the plaintiff can demonstrate the objectionable act, while not unlawful, is "unfair" within the meaning of the UCL. (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 182.)[6]

In this court Lample contends her complaint states a cause of action under the UCL on two distinct theories: (1) Blue Shield violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 of the Knox-Keene Act by charging HIPAA-eligible PPO subscribers more than the average premium paid by a subscriber to the MRMIP in the same age category and geographic region, an unlawful business practice; and (2) Blue Shield's premium charges, even if not unlawful, were an unfair practice within the meaning of Business and Professions Code section 17200.[7]

3. The [*19] Trial Court Erred in Sustaining the Demurrer to the Claim for an Unlawful Business Practice Without Leave To Amend

Lample alleges Blue Shield violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 of the Knox Keene Act—and thus the UCL—by charging her and other similarly situated HIPAA PPO subscribers a premium that exceeded the "average premium paid" by a similar MRMIP subscriber. This allegation has two separate components: First, as her primary contention, Lample asserts Blue Shield violated the Knox-Keene Act by failing to adopt the weighted average formula developed by the MRMIP Board. Second, Lample's pleading, read liberally as we must, contends that Blue Shield has set premiums based on an average of the rates charged by plan providers, rather than the average premium paid by a subscriber to MRMIP, and has therefore violated the Knox-Keene Act.

[6] The [*18] definition of "unfair" within the meaning of the UCL is discussed in part 4 below.

[7] Although Lample did not argue in the trial court that she had stated a viable cause of action under the "unfair" prong of the UCL, we requested letter briefing from the parties on the question whether the complaint states, or can be amended to state, a cause of action for an unfair business practice under Business and Professions Code section 17200. (See generally Aubry v. Tri-City Hospital Dist., supra, 2 Cal.4th at p. 967 [order sustaining demurrer without leave to amend is improper if complaint states, or can be amended to state, cause of action under any possible legal theory].)

a. Even if the statutory language does not expressly require a weighted average of premiums paid by subscribers, Lample can amend her complaint to allege a long-standing administrative interpretation of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 that mandates use of that methodology

Focusing on the allegations relating to the MRMIP Board's weighted average methodology, [*20] Blue Shield argued in its demurrer it was not liable under the UCL as a matter of law because neither section 1399.805 nor 1399.811 expressly requires the use of a weighted average based on a plan's enrollment numbers and neither statute vests the MRMIP Board with the authority to determine the maximum allowable rates to be charged by health care service plans, which are regulated by the Department of Managed Health Care, not the MRMIP Board. Accordingly, its failure to adopt the MRMIP Board's methodology for calculation of premiums is not unlawful.

The interpretation of the phrase "the average premium paid by a subscriber" in sections 1399.805 and 1399.811, like any other issue of statutory construction, is ultimately a question of law for the court. (In re Tobacco II Cases (2009) 46 Cal.4th 298, 311, 93 Cal. Rptr. 3d 559, 207 P.3d 20; People ex rel. Lockyer v. Shamrock Foods Co. (2000) 24 Cal.4th 415, 432, 101 Cal. Rptr. 2d 200, 11 P.3d 956.) In construing those statutes "[o]ur fundamental task . . . is to ascertain the intent of the lawmakers so as to effectuate the purpose of the statute[s]. [Citation.] We begin by examining the statutory language, giving the words their usual and ordinary meaning. [Citation.] If there is no ambiguity, then we presume [*21] the lawmakers meant what they said, and the plain meaning of the language governs. [Citations.] If, however, the statutory terms are ambiguous, then we may resort to extrinsic sources, including the ostensible objects to be achieved and the legislative history. [Citation.] In such circumstances, we '"select the construction that comports most closely with the apparent intent of the Legislature, with a view to promoting rather than defeating the general purpose of the statute, and avoid an interpretation that would lead to absurd consequences."'" (Day v. City of Fontana (2001) 25 Cal.4th 268, 272, 105 Cal. Rptr. 2d 457, 19 P.3d 1196; accord, People v. Lawrence (2000) 24 Cal.4th 219, 230, 99 Cal. Rptr. 2d 570, 6 P.3d 228.)

As Lample acknowledges, the term "average" can have a variety of meanings depending on the context in which it is used; and sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 do not specify how the average premium paid by a similarly situated subscriber to an MRMIP plan is to be calculated. (Cf. Garfield Medical Center v. Belshe (1998) 68 Cal.App.4th 798, 807-808, 80 Cal. Rptr. 2d 527 [the term "mean" as used in federal statute governing payments to hospitals for Medicaid patients is ambiguous; it includes "the arithmetic mean (also known as the arithmetic average), the weighted [*22] mean (also known as weighted average), the geometric mean, and the harmonic mean. The appropriateness of a particular mean as a statistical tool depends upon the purpose.'"].) Lample also concedes the statutes do not expressly vest the MRMIP Board with the authority to determine "the average premium paid by a subscriber."

The legislative history of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 is not particularly helpful as an interpretative tool on this question. (See generally Day v. City of Fontana, supra, 25 Cal.4th at p. 272 [if statutory terms are ambiguous, "then we may resort to extrinsic sources, including the ostensible objects to be achieved and the legislative history"].) As introduced, Senate Bill No. 265 did not tie rate caps to the premiums paid by MRMIP subscribers. However, after it became clear the Legislature intended to impose rate caps on HIPAA PPO products, the California Association of Health Plans and Blue Cross of California urged that the ceiling on premiums be based on MRMIP premiums. (See Assem. Com. on Health, Rep. on Sen. Bill No. 265 (1999-2000 Reg. Sess.), June 29, 1999, at p. 5 ["if a cap must be placed on the premium for [HIPAA-eligible] individuals, a more appropriate [*23] benchmark would be the rates paid in MRMIP"].) The critical language in the bill was thereafter amended several times: Initially, the cap on premiums was to be "the overall average premium paid" by MRMIP subscribers (see Sen. Bill No. 265 (1999-2000 Reg. Sess.), as amended July 8, 1999), then the "actual premium paid" by MRMIP subscribers (id., as amended June 22, 2000), and finally the "average premium paid" by MRMIP subscribers, but with the additional qualifying phrase "who is of the same age and resides in the same geographic region." (Id., as amended Aug. 29, 2000.)

No explanation for these changes or the final choice of wording is contained in the legislative materials. While the intent of the legislation is clear—to make health care service plans available to, and affordable for, HIPAA-eligible subscribers—any inference the Legislature vested the MRMIP Board with making that calculation or required the average premium paid to be calculated using a specific type of weighted average formula would be entirely speculative. (See Campbell v. Regents of University of California (2005) 35 Cal.4th 311, 331, 25 Cal. Rptr. 3d 320, 106 P.3d 976 ["[i]n our view therefore, the legislative history appears unclear"; we may not [*24] read intent into the statute when the legislative history "does not clearly support it"].)

Notwithstanding these obstacles to a single, clear interpretation of the mandatory rate cap provisions in sections 1399.805 and 1399.811, Lample has alleged in paragraph 22 of the second amended complaint that a long-standing interpretation of the these statutes, adopted contemporaneously with the enactment of the legislation by the Department of Managed Health Care, requires calculation of "the average premium paid by a subscriber" by reference to the MRMIP Board's weighted average methodology. In particular, paragraph 22 alleges, "Shortly after sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 were enacted in 2000, "representatives from the MRMI[P Board], the Department of Managed Health Care (DMHC) and the Department of Insurance (DOI) met to work out implementation details—including how to calculate 'the average premium paid.' They discussed what would be the appropriate way for the MRMI[P Board] to provide this data to the DMHC and the DOI. The agreement, pursuant to the requests of the DMHC and the DOI, was that the MRMI[P Board] provide a weighted average by region and age range, i.e., the 'average premium [*25] paid.'"

The policy upon which Lample relies was not enacted as a formal regulation despite the Department's apparent authority to do so. (See § 1399.817 [vesting the director of the Department of Managed Health Care with the discretion to "issue regulations that are necessary to carry out the purposes of this article"].) What significance, therefore, does this alleged agency interpretation of the statutory language have? In Yamaha Corp. of America v. State Bd. of Equalization (1998) 19 Cal.4th 1, 78 Cal. Rptr. 2d 1, 960 P.2d 1031 (Yamaha) the Supreme Court distinguished the level of judicial deference to be accorded an agency's quasi-legislative acts, in which the agency exercises its delegated lawmaking power, from interpretative acts, in which the agency gives its view of the meaning or legal effect of a statute or regulation, "questions lying within the constitutional domain of the courts." (Id. at p. 11.) Although courts are bound by an agency's rulemaking as long as it is authorized by the enabling legislation, the binding effect of an agency's interpretation of a statute or regulation is "fundamentally situational." (Id. at p. 12.) "Its power to persuade is both circumstantial and dependent on the presence or absence [*26] of factors that support the merit of the interpretation." (Id. at p. 7.) Thus, when "the meaning and legal effect of a statute is at issue, the agency's interpretation is one among several tools available to the court. Depending on the context, it may be helpful, enlightening, even convincing. It may sometimes be of little worth." (Id. at pp. 7-8; accord, California Veterinary Medical Association v. City of West Hollywood (2007) 152 Cal.App.4th 536, 555, 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 318.)

The Yamaha Court identified two broad categories of circumstances relevant to a court's assessment of the weight due an agency's interpretation: "In the first category are factors that 'assume the agency has expertise and technical knowledge, especially where the legal text to be interpreted is technical, obscure, complex, open-ended or entwined with issues of fact, policy and discretion.'" (Yamaha, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 13.) The second category includes factors suggesting the agency decision is "likely to be correct." (Ibid.) This second group of factors includes "indications of careful consideration by senior agency officials," as well as evidence that the interpretation was contemporaneous with the enactment and long-standing. [*27] (Ibid.)

Lample argues the complaint alleges a long-standing regulatory interpretation by the Department of Managed Health Care to use the MRMIP weighted calculations to define the phrase "the average premium paid by a subscriber." That interpretation is entitled to deference, she contends, because the Department of Managed Health Care, based on its own substantial expertise in this field, has determined the MRMIP Board was in the best position to calculate the average premium paid by a MRMIP subscriber using the information available to it.

We agree a thoroughly considered, contemporaneous administrative interpretation of the statutory language that requires use of the MRMIP Board's weighted average methodology to calculate the "average premium paid by a subscriber" would be both reasonable and consistent with legislative intent: The weighted average methodology prevents higher premiums paid to a plan with only a few subscribers from having a disproportionate impact in the mean calculation, thus furthering the Legislature's objective of making such health plans more affordable. (See, e.g., Garfield Medical Center v. Belshe, supra, 68 Cal.App.4th at p. 808 [agency's interpretation of "mean" [*28] in statute to require a "weighted mean" to prevent hospitals from being treated "as if they were the same size when, in fact, that is not true" was a reasonable gap-filling interpretation of statute consistent with intent of legislation].) Such an interpretation also eliminates the problem of regulated entities using multiple methodologies to define the average premium paid, a problem that, if left unresolved, would undermine, rather than promote, the purpose of imposing rate caps in the first place.

The legal status, and thus the interpretative significance, of the policy alleged by Lample, however, is far from clear. An administrative interpretation by the Department of Managed Health Care may be entitled to some deference depending on the context in which it was adopted (see Yamaha, supra, 19 Cal.4th at p. 12); an "underground regulation," on the other hand, adopted in violation of the requirements of California's Administrative Procedure Act (APA) (Gov. Code, § 11400 et seq.) receives no deference at all. (See Tidewater Marine Western, Inc. v. Bradshaw (1996) 14 Cal.4th 557, 576, 59 Cal. Rptr. 2d 186, 927 P.2d 296 [administrative interpretations that are not, but should have been, enacted as formal regulations under [*29] the APA are entitled to no deference; to hold otherwise would undermine the APA's purpose of eliminating the use of "underground regulations," that is, rules which only the government knows about]; Yamaha, at pp. 19-20 (conc. opn. of Mosk, J.) [Administrative "interpretations" that are not enacted as formal regulations fall into two categories: "The first is the class of regulations that should have been formally adopted under the APA but were not. In such cases the law is clear that in order to effectuate the policies behind the APA, courts are to give no weight to these interpretive regulations." The second is those interpretations that are not subject to the APA because "they are expressly or implicitly exempted from or outside the scope of APA requirements"].)

Lample indicates she can amend her complaint to allege facts clearly showing the policy is not akin to an underground regulation, but one that, based on the context and circumstances surrounding its adoption, is entitled to judicial deference. At the pleading stage, she is entitled to an opportunity to attempt to do so—that is, to allege facts and circumstances surrounding the adoption of the Department of Managed Health Care's [*30] policy to interpret the maximum rate cap in section 1399.805 and 1399.811 by reference to the MRMIP Board's weighted average methodology for calculating the average premium paid by a subscriber that would justify reliance by a court on that policy to resolve any possible ambiguity in the statutory language. (See Coca-Cola Co. v. State Bd. of Equalization (1945) 25 Cal.2d 918, 921, 156 P.2d 1 ["the contemporaneous administrative construction of the enactment by those charged with its enforcement and interpretation is entitled to great weight, and courts generally will not depart from such construction unless it is clearly erroneous or unauthorized"].)[8]

b. Blue Shield's argument its rates were approved by the Department of Managed Health Care does not support the trial court's order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend Blue Shield opposes affording Lample the opportunity to amend her complaint, asserting her UCL claim fails as a matter of law because the MRMIP Board has no authority to regulate health care service plans. This is true, of course, but immaterial. Lample's contention is not that Blue Shield violated a MRMIP Board regulation but rather that Blue Shield violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 as interpreted by Blue Shield's own regulator, the Department of Managed Health Care.

Indeed, citing Yamaha, supra, 19 Cal.4th 1, Blue Shield has acknowledged an administrative interpretation of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 by the Department of Managed Health Care would be highly significant in determining whether it had violated the statutes' mandatory rate caps, but [*32] argues the Department stated in its 2009 position paper in support of AB 718 that it had not taken any formal position as to which methodology should be used to calculate the average premium paid by a MRMIP subscriber. Whether or not judicial notice of a legislative position paper was proper under Evidence Code section 452, subdivision (c)[9]—an issue the parties vigorously dispute—the Department's statement in 2009 that it had no formal interpretation of the phrase "average premium paid by a subscriber" does no more, at least on demurrer,[10] than highlight a factual dispute regarding Lample's allegation the Department had a consistent and long-standing interpretation prior to 2009 that required use of the MRMIP Board methodology, an allegation supported by information contained in documents judicially noticed by the trial court at Lample's request.

[8] At oral argument Blue Shield insisted the demurrer was properly sustained because it would violate due process to impose civil liability based on an agency interpretation of which it had no notice. Blue Shield's purported lack of notice of the Department of Managed Health Care's interpretation of the governing statutes was not the basis for the court's order, nor would it have been proper for the court to make such a determination on demurrer. A due process violation is not apparent from the face of the complaint; and any analysis of that issue, [*31] which rests on the facts and circumstances surrounding the Department of Managed Health Care's adoption of the interpretation asserted by Lample, cannot properly be made from the limited evidentiary presentation offered in support of Blue Shield's demurrer.

Blue Shield also argues it cannot, as a matter of law, be liable under the UCL for doing something its regulator expressly approved. (See § 1344, subd. (d) ["[n]o provision of this chapter imposing any liability applies to any act done or omitted in good faith in conformity with any rule, form, order or written interpretative opinion of the director"]; see also Puentes v. Wells Fargo Home Mortgage, Inc. (2008) 160 Cal.App.4th 638, 644, 72 Cal. Rptr. 3d 903 [when Legislature has permitted certain conduct, courts may not override that determination by declaring such conduct to be actionable under Bus. & Prof. Code, § 17200].) This argument, which relies, in part, on the truth of statements contained in the Department of Managed Health Care's position paper in support of AB 718, is fundamentally flawed: The Department's position paper simply stated new legislation was necessary to ensure consistency in application [*34] by its regulated entities. Nothing in that paper establishes the Department "approved" Blue Shield's methodology, and no other regulatory approval of Blue Shield's conduct was before the trial court.[11]

Blue Shield [*35] also suggests the UCL action fails as a matter of law because, apart from any express approval, the Department of Managed Health Care implicitly approved its methodology by not bringing an enforcement action against it or otherwise alerting it that it was not, or had not been, in compliance with the statutory rate caps. Contrary to Blue Shield's contention, the absence of an enforcement action does not immunize its allegedly unlawful pricing activities. A UCL action for violations of the Knox-Keene Act is independent of any enforcement action and may be maintained whether or not an enforcement action has been initiated. (Blue Cross of California, Inc. v. Superior Court (2009) 180 Cal.App.4th 1237, 1251, 102 Cal. Rptr. 3d 615 (Blue Cross); cf. Bell v. Blue Cross of California (2005) 131 Cal.App.4th 211, 216-217, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 688 [private individual may bring UCL claim for Knox-Keene Act violation even though statute does not expressly authorize private right of action.)[12]

[10] Even if the document itself may be subject to judicial notice, judicial notice of the truth of the matters stated in the document is improper. [*33] (See Mangini v. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. (1994) 7 Cal.4th 1057, 1063, 31 Cal. Rptr. 2d 358, 875 P.2d 73 ["[w]hile courts may notice official acts and public records, 'we do not take judicial notice of the truth of all matters stated therein'"], overruled on another ground in In re Tobacco Cases II (2007) 41 Cal.4th 1257, 1262, 1276, 63 Cal. Rptr. 3d 418, 163 P.3d 106.)

[11] Asked at oral argument about the basis for Blue Shield's contention its rates had been expressly approved by the Department of Managed Health Care, counsel referred only to a July 27, 2010 letter written by an assistant deputy director of the Department's office of legal services to a dissatisfied insured, which states, "Regulators acknowledge that the statute was open to varying interpretations, and that either a 'straight average' or a 'weighted average' would be permissible absent further clarification." Even were this letter properly subject to judicial notice as part of the legislative history of AB 718—a questionable assumption (see, e.g., Quintano v. Mercury Casualty Co. (1995) 11 Cal.4th 1049, 1062, fn. 5, 48 Cal. Rptr. 2d 1, 906 P.2d 1057)—and apart from the hearsay problem discussed above, the author's invocation of the opinion of undefined "regulators" without any further supporting detail or citation cannot, on demurrer, be construed as approval of Blue Shield's allegedly unlawful pricing practices.

[12] MacKay v. Superior Court (2010) 188 Cal.App.4th 1427, 1435, 115 Cal. Rptr. 3d 893, on which Blue Shield relies, is inapposite. MacKay held that the Department of Insurance's approval of a rate premium immunized the insurer from a civil action challenging the use of that premium. [*36] Citing Insurance Code sections 1860.1 and 1860.2, the Court of Appeal held the Insurance Commissioner has exclusive jurisdiction over issues related to ratemaking; insurance rates could only be challenged under statutes and regulations pertaining to the Insurance Code; and approval of rates by the Department of Insurance means the rate has the "imprimatur" of the Department of Insurance and may not be challenged in a civil action, under the UCL or

c. Lample adequately alleged a cause of action for an unlawful business practice

At an even more basic level, and separate from the question whether any ambiguity [*37] in the statutory language has been resolved by a properly adopted, long-standing administrative interpretation of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811, Lample's claim that Blue Shield has engaged in an unlawful business practice properly survives a demurrer. Even if there is more than one lawful way to set premiums for HIPPA PPO subscribers under sections 1399.805 and 1399.811, Lample has alleged the methodology used by Blue Shield violates the statutory mandate (that is, capping its rates at the average premium paid by a similarly situated MRMIP subscriber). Lample's second amended complaint alleges Blue Shield calculates a straight average of the rates charged by the participating plans in each rating cell and employs that average to set its premiums, rather than using the average of the premiums paid by similar subscribers.[13] Whether that is true and, if so, whether "rates charged" and "premiums paid" are functionally synonymous in this context, is impossible to determine without knowing what Blue Shield actually does. Although it certainly might be more efficient for the trial court not "to drag out this case" by accepting Blue Shield's or the Department of Managed Health Care's description [*38] of "the procedures which have been employed to date," a demurrer tests the sufficiency of a complaint based only on the facts included in the complaint, those subject to judicial notice and those conceded by the plaintiff. (See Evans v. City of Berkeley (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1, 20, 40 Cal. Rptr. 3d 205, 129 P.3d 394.) Any presentation of the details of Blue Shield's computation of HIPPA PPO premiums and the consequent determination whether its methodology violated sections 1399.805 and 1399.811 must await summary judgment or trial. Accordingly, whether or not Lample is ultimately able to prove her allegations, at this nascent stage of the proceedings, she has sufficiently stated a UCL claim based on an unlawful business practice.

4. Lample Should [*39] Be Given the Opportunity To Amend Her Complaint To State a Cause of Action for an Unfair Business Practice

Lample contends the complaint states, or at least can be amended to state, a cause of action for an "unfair" business practice under Business and Professions Code section 17200. (Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 181 [UCL makes actionable practices that are unfair even if not unlawful].) Before the Supreme Court's decision in Cel-Tech, appellate courts had broadly construed the term "unfair" within the meaning of the UCL to mean a business practice that offends "an established public policy or when the practice is immoral, unethical, oppressive, unscrupulous or substantially injurious to consumers." (People v. Casa Blanca Convalescent Homes, Inc. (1984) 159 Cal.App.3d 509, 530, 206 Cal. Rptr. 164.) Determining whether a business practice was unfair required a balancing of "'utility of the defendant's conduct against the gravity of the harm to the alleged victim . . . .'" (State Farm Fire & Casualty Co. v. Superior Court (1996) 45 Cal.App.4th 1093, 1104, 53 Cal. Rptr. 2d 229.)

In Cel-Tech, supra, 20 Cal.4th 163, a case between competitors involving allegations of below-cost sales, the Supreme Court disapproved the broad [*40] sweep to the term "unfair" utilized by the Courts of Appeal. The Cel-Tech Court explained the definitions articulated were "too amorphous" and provided "too little guidance to courts and businesses." (Id. at p. 185; see ibid. ["[a]n undefined standard of what is 'unfair' fails to give business adequate guidelines as to what conduct may be challenged and thus enjoined and may sanction arbitrary or unpredictable decisions about what is fair or unfair," in some cases even leading to the "enjoining or procompetitive conduct and thereby undermin[ing] consumer protection"].) Borrowing from section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act (15 U.S.C., § 45), the Court adopted a new definition of "unfair": "[W]hen a plaintiff who claims to have suffered injury otherwise. (MacKay, at pp. 1442-1444.) Unlike the Department of Insurance, the Department of Managed Health Care is not vested with the authority to determine rates (see § 1367 ["[n]othing in this section shall be construed to permit the director to establish the rates charged subscribers and enrollees for contractual health care services"]); and, as we have explained, nothing in the Knox-Keene Act enforcement provisions or any other statute prohibits a private individual from bringing his or her own UCL action for Knox-Keene Act violations (Blue Cross, supra, 180 Cal.App.4th at p. 1251).

[13] A simple example illustrates the difference as we understand it. If two providers offer HIPAA PPO plans to eligible individuals in a particular rating cell—one at $100/month; the other at $150/month—the average monthly rate charged by the providers is $125 regardless of the number of subscribers to each plan. If there are 90 subscribers to the $100 plan and 10 subscribers to the $150 plan, however, the average monthly premium paid by a subscriber, using a weighted mean, is $105.

from a direct competitor's 'unfair' act or practice invokes [Business and Professions Code] section 17200, the word 'unfair' in that section means conduct that threatens an incipient violation of an antitrust law, or violates the policy or spirit of one of those laws because its effects are comparable to or the same as a violation of the law, or otherwise significantly threatens or harms competition." (Cel-Tech, at p. 187.) The Court made [*41] clear its holding was limited to harm suffered by a competitor, not by a consumer. (Id. at p. 187, fn. 12 ["[w]e also express no view" on the application of this test to consumer injuries].)

Since Cel-Tech, the Courts of Appeal have been divided on the definition of "unfair" applicable to consumer cases. (See, e.g., Progressive West Ins. Co. v. Superior Court (2005) 135 Cal.App.4th 263, 286, 37 Cal. Rptr. 3d 434 ["[w]e conclude that the [pre-Cel-Tech] balancing test should continue to apply in consumer cases"]; Gregory v. Albertson's, Inc. (2002) 104 Cal.App.4th 845, 854, 128 Cal. Rptr. 2d 389 [Cel-Tech requires a more limited definition of "unfair"; "the public policy which is a predicate to the action must be 'tethered' to specific constitutional, statutory, or regulatory provisions"]; Bernardo v. Planned Parenthood Federation of America (2004) 115 Cal.App.4th 322, 353, 9 Cal. Rptr. 3d 197 [same]; see generally Bardin v. DaimlerChrysler Corp. (2006) 136 Cal.App.4th 1255, 1266-1267, 39 Cal. Rptr. 3d 634 [identifying division in appellate courts over which test to apply after Cel-Tech].)

As we recently held in Klein v. Chevron USA (2012) 202 Cal. App. 4th 1342, 137 Cal. Rptr. 3d 293, a case decided just this month, the definition of unfair formulated by our Division Eight colleagues [*42] in Camacho v. Automobile Club of So. Calif. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 1394, 48 Cal. Rptr. 3d 770 is particularly persuasive. As the Camacho court recognized, pre-Cel-Tech definitions of "unfair" are amorphous whether the injury involves a competitor or a consumer. (See Camacho, at p. 1402 ["The question is whether Cel-Tech's definition of 'unfair' overrules appellate court opinions that use other definitions. We think that it does. Definitions that are too amorphous in the context of anticompetitive practices are not converted into satisfactorily precise tests in consumer cases. This squares with the fact that, in disapproving appellate court opinions defining 'unfair' in 'amorphous' terms, the Supreme Court did not hold that the old definitions were appropriate in consumer cases."].) On the other hand, requiring the alleged "unfair" practice to be "tethered" to a specific constitutional, statutory or regulatory provision, as some courts have required after Cel-Tech (see, e.g., Durell v. Sharp Healthcare (2010) 183 Cal.App.4th 1350, 1367, 108 Cal. Rptr. 3d 682; Gregory v. Albertson's, Inc., supra, 104 Cal.App.4th at p. 854), undermines "the broad scope" of Business and Professions Code section 17200's intent to deal with "the innumerable [*43] new schemes that the fertility of man's invention can contrive." (Camacho, at p. 1403, citing Barquis v. Merchants Collection Assn. (1972) 7 Cal. 3d 94, 112, 101 Cal. Rptr. 745, 496 P.2d 817.) In fact, such a limited definition of "unfair" would undermine the UCL's intended breadth by "undercut[ting] the ability of the courts to deal with new situations and new abuses." (Camacho, at pp. 1402-1403.)

Echoing Cel-Tech's reference to section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act in UCL competitor cases, the Camacho court borrowed that section's definition of "unfair" for use in UCL consumer cases, holding a business practice is unfair under Business and Professions Code section 17200 if: (1) the consumer injury is substantial; (2) the injury is not outweighed by any countervailing benefits to consumers or competition; and (3) the injury could not have reasonably been avoided by consumers themselves. (Camacho, supra, 142 Cal.App.4th at p. 1403.) The court explained that definition is "on its face geared to consumers and for that reason appropriate in consumer cases. It is also suitably broad and is therefore in keeping with the 'sweeping' nature of [Business and Professions Code] section 17200." (Ibid.)

Under this well-reasoned [*44] definition of an unfair business practice, the order sustaining the demurrer without leave to amend must be reversed. The complaint alleges Blue Shield disregarded the MRMIP Board's rate cap schedules, which its competitors believed they were required by law to follow, resulting in excessive premiums charged to Blue Shield's HIPAA PPO subscribers. In addition to the allegations previously pleaded, Lample asserts she can amend the complaint to allege the following: Blue Shield's pricing strategy, even if not illegal per se, was intended to drive its HIPAA-eligible consumers to its competitors, thereby reducing Blue Shield's financial losses from providing HIPAA PPO products at prices subject to rate caps. In addition, once the HIPAA eligible person has subscribed to Blue Shield, believing Blue Shield's pricing is subject to the same methodologies as other HIPAA PPO products, he or she is no longer defined as a federally eligible individual and thus must remain with Blue Shield, foreclosed from obtaining HIPAA PPO coverage from a Blue Shield competitor. Taken together, those allegations are sufficient to plead a substantial injury to both consumers and to competition, one that consumers, [*45] unaware of Blue Shield's lack of compliance with MRMIP Board formulas, could not reasonably have avoided.

Blue Shield disputes these allegations, of course; but this only serves to highlight the impropriety of resolving on demurrer whether Blue Shield's conduct was unfair within the meaning of Business and Professions Code section 17200. (See Linear Technology Corp. v. Applied Materials, Inc. (2007) 152 Cal.App.4th 115, 134-135, 61 Cal. Rptr. 3d 221 ["[w]hether a practice is . . . unfair is generally a question of fact which requires 'consideration and weighing of evidence from both sides' and which usually cannot be made on demurrer"]; McKell v. Washington Mutual, Inc. (2006) 142 Cal.App.4th 1457, 1472, 1473, 49 Cal. Rptr. 3d 227 [same].)

In sum, while the trial court's failure to consider this claim in the context of Blue Shield's demurrer is understandable—the UCL claim under the "unfair" prong of the statute was not specifically alleged as such—a demurrer cannot be properly sustained without leave to amend if it states, or can be amended to state, a cause of action under any possible legal theory. (Aubry v. Tri-City Hospital Dist., supra, 2 Cal.4th at p. 967.) Because the operative second amended complaint can be amended to [*46] state a claim for an unfair business practice within the meaning of Business and Professions Code section 17200, leave to amend should be granted.[14]

5. Lample's Fraud Claim Is Insufficient as a Matter of Law

The elements of a cause of action for fraud based on concealment are (1) the defendant concealed or suppressed a material fact; (2) the defendant was under a duty to disclose the fact to the plaintiff; (3) the defendant intentionally concealed or suppressed the fact with the intent to defraud the plaintiff; (4) the plaintiff was unaware of the fact and would not have acted as he or she did if he or she had known of the concealed or suppressed fact; and (5) as a result of the concealment or suppression of the fact, the plaintiff sustained damage. (Kaldenbach v. Mutual of Omaha Life Ins. Co. (2009) 178 Cal.App.4th 830, 850; Levine v. Blue Shield of California (2010) 189 Cal.App.4th 1117, 1126-1127, 117 Cal. Rptr. 3d 262.)

Lample alleges Blue Shield defrauded members of the putative class by failing to disclose in its materials, including rate books supplied to members and prospective members, that its rates were calculated using a methodology different from [*48] that utilized by the MRMIP Board and required by the Department of Managed Health Care's gap-filling interpretation of sections 1399.805 and 1399.811. The duty to disclose, she asserts, arises under section 1399.813, which provides, "In connection with the offering for sale of any plan contract to an individual, each plan shall make a reasonable disclosure as part of its solicitation and sales materials, or all individual contracts."

The fraud claim is without merit. Section 1399.813 simply requires disclosure of all material terms of the contracts, including rates; Blue Shield made those disclosures. Blue Shield had no duty to disclose to its subscribers the methodology it used to derive its rates or their legal ramifications. (See Levine v. Blue Shield of California, supra, 189 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1132-1133 [insurers and health care service plans have no duty to disclose to subscriber internal rate making or pricing procedures]; cf. California Service Station Etc. Assn. v. American Home Assurance

[14] Blue Shield argues for the first time on appeal the court should exercise its discretion and dismiss this UCL case under the judicial abstention doctrine. (See Arce v. Kaiser Foundation Health Plan, Inc. (2010) 181 Cal.App.4th 471, 496, 104 Cal. Rptr. 3d 545 ["[a]s a general matter, a trial court may abstain from adjudicating a suit that seeks equitable remedies if 'granting the requested relief would require a trial court to assume the functions of an administrative agency or to interfere with the functions of an administrative agency'"]; Klein v. Chevron USA, supra, 202 Cal. App. 4th 1342 [same].) Lample argues Blue Shield has forfeited the argument by failing to raise it in the trial court. (Sea & Sage Audubon Society, Inc. v. Planning Com. (1983) 34 Cal.3d 412, 417, 194 Cal. Rptr. 357, 668 P.2d 664 ["'issues not raised in trial court cannot be raised for first time on appeal'"]; In re Marriage of Eben-King & King (2000) 80 Cal.App.4th 92, 117, 95 Cal. Rptr. 2d 113 [same].) In light of our reversal of the judgment and remand to the trial court, Blue Shield will have the opportunity to raise, and the trial court [*47] will be able to consider, that claim in the first instance. (See Arce, at p. 482 [decision whether to dismiss case under doctrine of judicial abstention is matter within trial court's discretion].)

Co. (1998) 62 Cal.App.4th 1166, 1173, 73 Cal. Rptr. 2d 182 [insurer has no duty to disclose information concerning internal business operations]; see also Sweat v. Hollister (1995) 37 Cal.App.4th 603, 608-609, 43 Cal. Rptr. 2d 399 [failure [*49] to disclose legal ramification of a fact is not same as failure to disclose material fact; the former does not state a cause of action for fraud], disapproved on another ground in Santisas v. Goodin (1998) 17 Cal.4th 599, 609, fn. 5, 71 Cal. Rptr. 2d 830, 951 P.2d 399; Bledsoe v. Watson (1973) 30 Cal.App.3d 105, 110, 106 Cal. Rptr. 197 ["misrepresentations of law do not amount to actionable fraud"].) Accordingly, the trial court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to this cause of action without leave to amend.[15]

DISPOSITION

The judgment of dismissal is reversed, and the matter is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. The portion of the order sustaining the demurrer to the fraud claim without leave to amend is affirmed. Lample is to recover her costs on appeal.

End of Document

[15] Lample also alleged Blue Shield materially misrepresented to the Department of Managed Health Care that it was in compliance with sections 1399.805 and 1399.811. Because the alleged misrepresentation was made to the Department, not to Lample, and she does not allege she relied on it, that allegation cannot support her fraud claim.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Temporary Restraining Orders

HN1[] Injunctions, Temporary Restraining Orders

A court may issue a temporary restraining order without notice to the adverse party only if specific facts in an affidavit or a verified complaint clearly show that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the movant before the adverse party can be heard in opposition. Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b)(1)(A). A temporary restraining order without notice is generally granted only when providing notice to the adverse party would jeopardize the objective of the injunction.

A plaintiff seeking a preliminary injunction must show: (1) that he is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) that he is likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief; (3) that the balance of equities tips in his favor; and (4) that an injunction is in the public interest.

Serious questions going to the merits and a hardship balance that tips sharply toward a plaintiff can support issuance of an injunction, assuming the other two elements of the preliminary injunction test are also met.

Civil Procedure > Remedies > Injunctions > Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

HN5[] Injunctions, Preliminary & Temporary Injunctions

A preliminary injunction may be granted if there is a likelihood of irreparable injury to a plaintiff; there are serious questions going to the merits; the balance of hardships tips sharply in favor of the plaintiff; and the injunction is in the public interest.

[*1190] OPINION AND ORDER

SIMON, District Judge.

Retail Imaging Management Group, LLC ("RIMG") brings a federal antitrust lawsuit against its competitor and supplier, Fujifilm North America Corporation ("FUJI"), alleging unlawful monopolization and attempted monopolization in violation of Section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2. RIMG also asserts claims of negligence and intentional interference with economic relations and contract. Before the court is Plaintiffs Motion for Temporary Restraining Order Without Notice; Alternatively, Motion for Preliminary Injunction With Notice (Doc. 36). For the following reasons, Plaintiffs motion and alternative motion are DENIED.

I. MOTION FOR TRO WITHOUT NOTICE

On January 17, 2012, RIMG requested a Temporary Restraining Order Without Notice against FUJI. RIMG asked the court to enjoin FUJI from performing a [*1191] business contract that FUJI recently entered into with [2] a third party, Rite Aid. RIMG alleges that it had been providing certain services to Rite Aid for several years, but will now lose substantial income, and may even go out of business, if FUJI, rather than RIMG, is allowed to perform those services for Rite Aid.

HN1[] A court may issue a temporary restraining order without notice to the adverse party only if "specific facts in an affidavit or a verified complaint clearly show that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the movant before the adverse party can be heard in opposition." Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(b)(1)(A) (emphasis added). A temporary restraining order without notice is generally granted only when providing notice to the adverse party would jeopardize the objective of the injunction. Plaintiffs declarations, testimony, and unverified complaint[1] do not show that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage would result to the movant "before the adverse party can be heard in opposition." Accordingly, Plaintiffs motion for a temporary restraining order without notice is DENIED.

II. ALTERNATIVE MOTION FOR PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

A. Standard

HN2[] A preliminary injunction is an "extraordinary remedy that may only be awarded upon a clear showing that the plaintiff is entitled to such relief." Winter v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 555 U.S. 7, 22, 129 S. Ct. 365, 172 L. Ed. 2d 249 (2008). HN3[] A plaintiff seeking a preliminary injunction must show: (1) that he is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) that he is likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief; (3) that the balance of equities tips in his favor; and (4) that an injunction is in the public interest. Winter, 555 U.S. at 20 (rejecting the Ninth Circuit's earlier rule that the mere "possibility" of irreparable harm, as opposed to its likelihood, was sufficient, in some circumstances, to justify a preliminary injunction).

The Supreme Court's decision in Winter, however, did not disturb the Ninth Circuit's alternative "serious questions" test. Alliance for the Wild Rockies v. Cottrell, 632 F.3d 1127, 1131-32 (9th Cir. 2011) (HN4[] "'serious questions going to the merits' and a hardship balance that tips sharply toward the plaintiff can support issuance of an injunction, assuming [4] the other two elements of the Winter test are also met"). Thus, HN5[] a preliminary injunction may be granted "if there is a likelihood of irreparable injury to the plaintiff; there are serious questions

[1] Although Plaintiffs motion and memorandum each recite that it was supported by a "verified Second Amended Complaint," the complaints [3] filed in this matter were not, in fact, "verified."

going to the merits; the balance of hardships tips sharply in favor of the plaintiff; and the injunction is in the public interest") M.R. v. Dreyfus, 663 F.3d 1100, 1108 (9th Cir. 2011) (citing Alliance).[2]

[*1192] B. Factual Background

Plaintiffs alternative motion for [5] preliminary injunction was heard by the court with an evidentiary hearing held on January 19, 2012. The following factual background is derived from the evidence received and the allegations stated in the Second Amended Complaint.

A "minilab" is a self-contained machine that converts images, stored either digitally or on film, into finished photographs or other similar products. Defendant, FUJI, manufactures minilabs and sells or leases them in competition with minilabs made by other manufacturers. FUJI also offers minilab repair service to retail users who purchase or lease FUJI-brand minilabs. In addition, FUJI sells, or has sold, replacement parts to independent service organizations ("ISOs") that provide repair service for FUJI-brand minilabs. FUJI also provides, or has provided, technical support to such ISOs. Thus, FUJI both competes with ISOs for the provision of repair service for FUJI-brand minilabs and also supplies, or has supplied, ISOs with replacement parts and other technical support used by ISOs in their repair service business.

Plaintiff, RIMG, began business in 2000. RIMG provides repair service for FUJI-brand minilabs to retail users throughout the U.S in competition [6] with FUJI. RIMG also services minilabs made by other manufacturers. RIMG alleges that it is the only ISO that competes with FUJI on a nationwide basis for repair service of FUJI-brand minilabs. RIMG also alleges that FUJI maintains at least a 70 percent share in what RIMG alleges to be a relevant nationwide market of repair service for FUJI-brand minilabs.

From 2001 through 2010, RIMG developed a business relationship and course of conduct with FUJI under which FUJI provided RIMG with access to FUJI-brand minilab replacement parts and other resources necessary for RIMG to service FUJI-brand minilabs. The business relationship between RIMG and FUJI began with "a handshake." Beginning in 2005 and ending in August 2010, RIMG and FUJI entered into several written contracts. Under these contracts, FUJI provided parts and other resources necessary for RIMG to service FUJI-brand minilabs.

RIMG alleges that in 2006, FUJI acquired a 30 percent ownership interest in CES. Before 2006, CES was not a competitor in the servicing of FUJI-brand minilabs. After the acquisition of this 30 percent interest, RIMG alleges, FUJI terminated its own field service personnel used to service minilabs and other [7] FUJI-brand machines. CES hired many former-FUJI personnel, and FUJI then outsourced its retail user minilab service work to CES, according to RIMG. FUJI directed work to CES for FUJI customers on warranty and other service work.

According to RIMG, the FUJI-CES relationship initially had no effect on the FUJI-RIMG relationship. The FUJI-RIMG service agreements were renewed for two successive two-year terms, then for a one-year term, and remained in effect until August 2010, when the then-current agreement expired. Under these written contracts, FUJI provided RIMG with parts and other resources that RIMG needed to service FUJI-brand minilab machines.

In 2006, Noritsu, a FUJI competitor in the manufacture of minilabs, worked with FUJI jointly to develop a digital mini dry lab. This product was introduced into the U.S. market in 2008 as the FUJI DL400 series mini dry lab. FUJI continued to provide RIMG with needed parts and other resources necessary for RIMG to service [*1193] FUJI-brand mini-labs, including the new mini dry lab, the DL400.

[2] The federal antitrust laws allow injunctive relief for private parties, including preliminary injunctive relief Clayton Act, § 16, 15 U.S.C. § 26 ("Any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief.. . against threatened loss or damages by a violation of the antitrust laws .. . when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss or damage is granted by courts of equity, under the rules governing such proceedings, and upon the execution of proper bond against damages for an injunction improvidently granted and a showing that the danger of irreparable loss or damage is immediate, a preliminary injunction may issue.").

According to RIMG, its reputation as a national service company grew, and RIMG became a competitive threat to FUJI minilab service on a nationwide level. In 2009, [8] Sam's Club (a subsidiary of Walmart) approached RIMG about bidding for its photo finishing equipment service contract, the bulk of which included FUJI-brand minilabs that were then being serviced by FUJI. That led to a contract between RIMG and Sam's Club for certain Sam's Club locations beginning in April 2010, with RIMG taking over from FUJI the servicing of all Sam's Club locations by late 2010.

RIMG alleges that FUJI was unhappy with RIMG's competitive success in the national market for servicing FUJI-brand minilabs and, as a result, FUJI became less cooperative with RIMG. In August 2010, the FUJI-RIMG contract came to an end and was not renewed by FUJI. According to RIMG, FUJI then started withholding from RIMG a "jig kit" that is necessary for RIMG to use in the repair of defective print heads in FUJI's DL400 series minilabs. Without this jig kit, RIMG was forced to sub-contract with, or retain, FUJI to repair defective print heads for RIMG's service customers at a cost to RIMG of approximately $16,000 per print head replacement. FUJI has sent invoices to RIMG for this work, which total more than $500,000. RIMG alleges that when a FUJI service customer requires the replacement [9] of a defective print head, FUJI provides the replacement print head and service without charge.

In October 2011, FUJI took over Rite Aid's "bench work" from RIMG.[3] RIMG alleges that FUJI is performing this work for Rite Aid below FUJI's average variable cost. RIMG also alleges that the loss of the Rite Aid revenue from RIMG's bench work will adversely affect RIMG's cash flow and, hence, its ability to compete with FUJI for FUJI-brand minilab service.

RIMG also alleges that on January 16, 2012, FUJI began the process of taking away from RIMG the photo call center support (also known as "telephone help desk support") for all 4,400 Rite Aid locations nationwide. RIMG's chief executive officer Brad Eamon states that this loss of business will cause RIMG to lose "in excess of 30% of total sales" and cause most of RIMG's 100 Portland-based employees "to lose their jobs on March 1, 2012," if FUJI is allowed to take over the photo call center service business for Rite Aid. Declaration of Brad Eamon in Support of Plaintiffs Motion for Temporary Restraining Order.

RIMG contends that FUJI has the intent to [10] suppress RIMG as a service competitor by raising RIMG's costs of operations, crippling or destroying RIMG's reputation and goodwill, and financially handicapping RIMG's ability to compete with FUJI in the FUJI-brand minilab service market. Based on these allegations, RIMG asserts, among other claims, that FUJI has monopolized or attempted to monopolize the nationwide market for FUJI-brand minilab repair service.[4] In its motion for preliminary injunctive relief, RIMG seeks to enjoin FUJI from [*1194] performing under its recently-negotiated minilab repair service contract with Rite Aid.

C. Discussion

1. Likelihood of irreparable injury

HN6[] "Typically, monetary harm does not constitute irreparable harm." California Pharmacists Association v. Maxwell-Jolly, 563 F.3d 847, 851 (9th Cir. 2009); see also Goldie's Bookstore, Inc. v. Superior Court, 739 F.2d 466, 471 (9th Cir. 1984) ("Mere financial injury, however, will not constitute irreparable harm if adequate compensatory [11] relief will be available in the course of litigation."). RIMG argues, however, that its "[l]oss of revenue and people losing their jobs satisfies the irreparable harm test," citing SAC and Fox Nation of Missouri v. LaFaver, 905 F. Supp. 904 (D. Kan. 1995). Plaintiffs Memorandum at 12.

In addition, during the evidentiary hearing RIMG referred the court to Foremost International Tours, Inc. v. Qantas Airways, Ltd., 379 F. Supp. 88 (D. Haw. 1974), aff'd 525 F.2d 281 (9th Cir. 1975), for the proposition that putting a company out of business may be sufficient to warrant a preliminary injunction. In Foremost, the district court noted:

[3] "Bench work" is minilab repair work performed off-site from a service customer's location.

[4] It is unclear from the pleadings whether RIMG alleges that "bench work" and "photo call center" services are part of the defined market for FUJI-brand minilab repair service or whether they are separate relevant markets or sub-markets.

> HN7[] Courts should be particularly concerned with threats to the existence of a moving party's business in the area of antitrust. An award of only money damages in lieu of preserving a competitor disserves the public interest.

Foremost, 379 F. Supp, at 97.

FUJI responds by citing the case of Dollar Rent A Car of Washington, Inc. v. Travelers Indem. Co., 774 F.2d 1371, 1375 (9th Cir. 1985), which FUJI says supports the conclusion that "an assertion that a moving party would go out of business in the absence of a preliminary injunction is insufficient to show irreparable [12] injury." Defendant's Memorandum at 8. Both sides overstate their legal authorities.

In SAC and Fox Nation of Missouri, the district court in Kansas issued a temporary restraining order that challenged the imposition of a motor fuel tax by the Kansas Department of Revenue on sales of gasoline diesel fuel sold on Native American lands. The court found irreparable injury in the fact that the "loss of revenue will result in decreased services and programs to Tribal members and the loss of employment for specific Tribal members" and noted that "such basic services as law enforcement and fire protection may be endangered by this loss of revenue." SAC and Fox Nation, 905 F. Supp, at 907. The Tribes also argued that "the loss of revenue in the interim may so devastate the Tribes that the ability to sustain themselves may be irretrievably lost." Id. In light of this, the court concluded that "[u]nder normal circumstances, monetary loss may be remedied by an award of compensatory damages, and the risk of such loss is therefore not considered irreparable.. .. Here, however, the court considers the consequences of such losses as extremely serious and potentially devastating to the Tribes. Such [13] loss would indeed meet the irreparable harm test." Id. (citation omitted). RIMG's claimed potential losses, while quite serious, do not appear to rise to this level of widespread devastation.

With regard to Foremost, as FUJI correctly points out in its post-hearing supplemental memorandum, the district court in that case reviewed a year-to-year financial comparison for three months, April, May, and June 1973 versus 1974, and found that the plaintiff had lost 67%, 89%, and 95% of its monthly business, respectively. Foremost, 379 F. Supp, at 92; see also Defendant's Post-Hearing Supplemental Memorandum [*1195] at 3 n. 2. This is far greater than RIMG's claimed anticipated loss of 30% of its business resulting from Rite Aid's decision to contract with FUJI rather than with RIMG.[5]

On the other hand, the Ninth Circuit decision in Dollar Rent A Car left open the possibility that, under some circumstances, the irreparable damage requirement may be satisfied with the threatened destruction of a business. In that case, the Ninth Circuit wrote:

> Viking argued to the district court that it would suffer irreparable injury because all of its income is derived from the Travelers-Dollar program and, in the absence of the preliminary injunction, Viking would go out of business. In support thereof, Viking relies upon Janmort Leasing, Inc. v. Econo-Car International, Inc., 475 F. Supp. 1282, 1294 (E.D.N.Y. 1979). In Janmort, however, the ongoing business that was threatened with destruction was an operating car franchise with offices, employees, cars on the road, etc. Viking, on the other hand, is a subsidiary of Dollar located in the Caribbean. No showing was made of the number of Viking employees, its existing good will, or its commitments other than those incurred by the Reinsurance Agreements.

Dollar Rent A Car, 774 F.2d at 1375; [15] see also Hughes Network Systems, Inc. v. Interdigital Communications Corp., 17 F.3d 691, 694 (4th Cir. 1994) (in remanding for further consideration, court noted that even if loss can be compensated by money damages, extraordinary circumstances may give rise to irreparable harm required for preliminary injunction); but see Instant Air Freight Co. v. C.F. Air Freight, Inc., 882 F.2d 797, 801-802 (3d Cir. 1989) (harm was not deemed irreparable even though nature of action involved loss of majority of business revenue).

[5] In the present case, the court is appropriately sensitive to the loss of any jobs by RIMG's employees in Oregon, but an inappropriately granted preliminary injunction may wrongfully cause a comparable loss of jobs to FUJI's employees in another state in this nationwide market. Under constitutional law principles derived from the "dormant commerce clause" doctrine, a court should not prefer the jobs of employees in one [14] state over the jobs of employees in another state. See generally Erwin Chemerinsky, CONSTITUTIONAL LAW: PRINCIPLES AND POLICIES 430-461 (4th ed. 2011).

In conclusion, HN8[] the threatened destruction of a business may, under certain circumstances, be sufficient to satisfy the requirement that a movant show a "likelihood of irreparable injury." The evidence that RIMG has presented, however, does not show a likelihood of irreparable injury. Moreover, for the reasons that follow, RIMG's evidence also does not satisfy its burden of establishing the other requirements needed for a preliminary injunction.

2. Serious questions going to the merits

As stated above, in the Ninth Circuit a party seeking a preliminary injunction need not show a likelihood of success on the merits so long as that party can show "'serious questions going to [16] the merits' and a hardship balance that tips sharply toward the plaintiff," assuming that the other two elements (likelihood of irreparable injury and the public interest favors an injunction) are satisfied. Alliance, 632 F.3d at 1131-32. The Ninth Circuit has also said that, HN9[] as an "'irreducible minimum,' the moving party must demonstrate a fair chance of success on the merits, or questions serious enough to require litigation." Arcamuzi v. Continental Air Lines, Inc., 819 F.2d 935, 937 (9th Cir. 1987).

[*1196] The gravamen of RIMG's antitrust claim, as stated in its Second Amended Complaint, is that FUJI has willfully maintained (or has attempted to obtain and has come dangerously close to obtaining) "monopoly power in the FUJI-brand minilab service market through exclusionary and anticompetitive conduct." Sec. Am. Comp., ¶ 75. RIMG asserts that FUJI has a continuing duty "to make available to RIMG under reasonable terms all replacement parts and necessary tools and resources in accordance with FUJI's continuing course of conduct." Sec. Am. Comp., ¶ 57. RIMG's motion for a preliminary injunction, however, does not seek an order requiring FUJI to continue to make such parts, tools, and resources [17] available to RIMG, pending a final decision on the merits.

RIMG also alleges that "FUJI sells the replacement print heads at a much higher price than when they are offered and sold as part of a bundle" and that when "FUJI offers the replacement print heads with FUJI/CES labor, the labor required to provide the installation is sold below the average variable cost incurred by FUJI to provide such labor." Sec. Am. Comp., ¶ 60. RIMG's motion for a preliminary injunction, however, does not seek an order requiring FUJI to "unbundle" its sales of replacement print heads and labor, pending a final decision on the merits.

RIMG further alleges price discrimination in the sale of print heads and claims that "FUJI favors certain end user customers by selling print heads below the average variable cost FUJI incurs." Sec. Am. Comp., ¶ 62. RIMG's motion for a preliminary injunction, however, does not seek an order prohibiting FUJI from selling print heads at discriminatory prices or below average variable cost, pending a final decision on the merits.

Instead, RIMG seeks a preliminary injunction to prohibit FUJI "from performing Rite Aid's Photo Call Center business." Plaintiffs Memorandum, at 2. That [18] work, however, is not even mentioned in RIMG's Second Amended Complaint, and it is far from clear whether, and if so how, a photo call center business relates to the market for FUJI-brand minilab service, which is the only market that RIMG alleges in its Second Amended Complaint that FUJI has monopolized or attempted to monopolize.[6]

During the January 19th evidentiary hearing, counsel for RIMG indicated that RIMG would soon be seeking leave to file a Third Amended Complaint. On January 26, 2012, RIMG filed an unopposed motion for leave to file a Third Amended Complaint, which the court allowed on January 27, 2012. In its recently amended pleading, RIMG continues to allege that FUJI possesses "monopoly power in the FUJI-brand minilab service market," Third Am. Comp., ¶ 77, which FUJI allegedly maintains through exclusionary or anticompetitive conduct. Id. at ¶ 78.

Also in its Third Amended Complaint, RIMG alleges that "FUJI solicited Rite Aid [19] to include Rite Aid's Call Center Services work as part of a bundle of products and services FUJI would be providing, ultimately taking such work in phases beginning January 16, 2012." Third Am. Comp., ¶ 53. RIMG further alleges: "If the discounts, or other form of monetary or in kind allowance, given to Rite Aid on the bundled products and services were applied to the Call Center Services work, FUJI would be doing said work below its [*1197] average variable cost." Id.; see also Third Am. Comp., ¶ 78(c) ("FUJI has engaged in exclusionary pricing of a bundle product"). This allegation would appear to connect RIMG's antitrust claim to its request for a preliminary injunction to prevent FUJI from commencing performance on its recently agreed-upon contract with Rite Aid. This allegation may also state an antitrust claim of unlawful bundling that is recognized in the Ninth Circuit. See Cascade Health Solutions v. PeaceHealth, 515 F.3d 883, 909-910 (9th Cir. 2008) [20] (HN10[] a bundled price is legal if, when the total discount is attributed only to the product that less diversified competitors are trying to sell separately, the resulting price is above the seller's average variable costs for that product).[7]

[6] To the extent that they are separate markets and RIMG is attempting to allege a theory of "monopoly leveraging," that is not a valid antitrust theory in the Ninth Circuit. See John Doe I v. Abbott Laboratories, 571 F.3d 930, 934 (9th Cir. 2009).

Even if the court ignores, however, the unorthodox timing of RIMG's motion and pleadings (moving for a preliminary injunction first based on a theory that is not contained in the then-most current complaint and later moving to file a further amended complaint that attempts to link the substantive allegations to the preliminary relief requested), merely alleging a fact does not make it so. Neither in RIMG's declarations submitted [21] in support of its motion for a preliminary injunction nor in its submissions at the evidentiary hearing did RIMG offer any admissible evidence tending to show that "FUJI has engaged in exclusionary pricing of a bundle product" by offering to perform call center service work below its average variable cost. In his declaration dated January 17, 2012, RIMG's chief executive officer Brad Eamon asserted: "In effect, FUJI offered Rite Aid a below-cost offer for the call center business that Rite Aid could not refuse." Mr. Eamon, however, offered no admissible evidence in support of this conclusion nor any explanation, again with admissible evidence, of how he would know his competitor's average variable cost structure. Moreover, FUJI'S vice president of Field Operations, Steven N. Pagano, submitted a declaration in opposition to RIMG's motion for preliminary injunction, in which Mr. Pagano stated: "The anticipated revenues for Call Center Services exceeded the anticipated costs associated with the provision of those services and provided FUJI with a margin of profit."[8] Given the current state of the factual record, the court cannot conclude that RIMG has met its burden of making a clear [22] showing of "a fair chance of success on the merits, or questions serious enough to require litigation" on the issue of whether FUJI has engaged in unlawful, below-cost bundling in violation of the antitrust laws.

3. The balance of hardships and the public interest

At this stage of the litigation, only one fact appears to be reasonably well established: RIMG and FUJI are currently engaged in significant and vigorous competition with each other to provide various services (consisting of at least on-site minilab repair service, bench work service, and call center service) to businesses that lease or purchase FUJI-brand minilabs. As [*1198] stated above, in 2010 RIMG took from FUJI the on-site repair service for Sam's Club locations nationwide. In 2011, FUJI took from RIMG the "bench work" business at Rite Aid. And in 2012, it appears that FUJI now may be taking from RIMG the call center service business for Rite Aid. Insufficient evidence has been presented to the court to determine whether this is anything more than simply the competitive forces of the [23] marketplace at work.

In addition, RIMG asserts that FUJI has cut its prices in order to obtain Rite Aid's business for call center services. The Supreme Court, however, has said that "cutting prices in order to increase business often is the very essence of competition." Matsushita Elec. Indus. Co. v. Zenith Radio Corp., 475 U.S. 574, 594, 106 S. Ct. 1348, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538 (1986). Further, HN11[] "[l]ow prices benefit consumers regardless of how those prices are set, and so long as they are above predatory levels, they do not threaten competition." Atlantic Richfield Co., v. USA Petroleum Co., 495 U.S. 328, 340, 110 S. Ct. 1884, 109 L. Ed. 2d 333 (1990).

[7] The court will wait for another day to evaluate the question of whether call center service is a "product that less diversified competitors are trying to sell separately," given that both RIMG and FUJI appear to be selling both repair services and call center services to the same customer. Thus, if RIMG offers both services in a bundle, under what circumstances, if any, should the antitrust laws, under PeaceHealth, restrict FUJI from doing so? There may be a good answer to that question, but that analysis is for another day.

[8] Mr. Pagano, however, did not explain in his declaration whether he was referring to "average variable costs" or to some other measure of cost.

Moreover, it is well established that HN12[] "[t]he antitrust laws .. . were enacted for 'the protection of competition, not competitors.'" Brunswick v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 488, 97 S. Ct. 690, 50 L. Ed. 2d 701 (1977) (quoting Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 320, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)). The Supreme Court has also stated that it should "resist interpretation geared more to the protection of existing competitors than to the stimulation of competition." Volvo Trucks North America, Inc. v. Reeder-Simco GMC, 546 U.S. 164, 168, 126 S. Ct. 860, 163 L. Ed. 2d 663 (2006) (emphasis in original). Finally, HN13[] "'false positive' mistaken inferences that chill the very conduct the antitrust [24] laws are designed to protect" are especially costly. Verizon Communications Inc. v. Law Offices of Curtis V. Trinko, LLP, 540 U.S. 398, 399-400, 124 S. Ct. 872, 157 L. Ed. 2d 823 (2004) (quoting Matsushita, 475 U.S. at 594).

On the basis of the evidence presented, the court cannot conclude that the public interest favors granting the preliminary injunction sought by RIMG. Moreover, the preliminary injunction, if granted, may result in FUJI being in breach its contract with Rite Aid.[9] Thus, the court also cannot conclude that the balance of hardships tips "sharply" in favor of RIMG. Accordingly, based on the evidence presented the court declines, at this preliminary stage of the litigation, to place the substantial power of the federal courts on the side of one competitor against another as they compete for business in the commercial marketplace.

III. CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, Plaintiffs motion for temporary restraining order without notice and alternative motion for preliminary injunction (Doc. 36) are DENIED.

IT IS [25] SO ORDERED.

HN1[ ] Federal Arbitration Act, Arbitration Agreements

Section 2 of the Federal Arbitration Act makes agreements to arbitrate valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract. 9 U.S.C.S. § 2. Section 2 reflects the liberal federal policy favoring arbitration. This policy extends to agreements to arbitrate certain statutory claims. However, by agreeing to arbitrate a statutory claim, a party does not forgo the substantive rights afforded by the statute; it only submits to their resolution in an arbitral forum. Thus, where the parties have agreed to arbitrate statutory claims, and where Congress has not manifested an intent that such claims should not be arbitrated, the agreement will be enforced, so long as the prospective litigant effectively may vindicate his or her statutory cause of action in the arbitral forum.

The party resisting arbitration on the ground that the terms of an arbitration agreement interfere with the effective vindication of statutory rights bears the burden of showing the likelihood of such interference, and second, that this burden cannot be carried by "mere speculation" about how an arbitrator "might" interpret or apply the agreement.

If a plaintiff can adequately demonstrate that the provisions of an arbitration agreement would effectively preclude any action seeking to vindicate the statutory rights asserted by the plaintiff, the arbitration agreement may be unenforceable.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

HN5[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

In analyzing a given vindication of statutory rights claim, a court must first decide who the proper decision maker is for such a claim: an arbitrator or a court. Questions of arbitrability are presumptively for the court, not the arbitrator, unless the parties have "clearly and unmistakably" agreed otherwise. Two categories of disputes constitute clear questions of arbitrability. The first category includes disputes about whether the parties are bound by a given arbitration clause. The second category encompasses disagreements about whether an arbitration clause in a concededly binding contract applies to a particular type of controversy. These "questions of arbitrability" are left to the court because they refer to the kind of narrow circumstances where contracting parties would likely have expected a court to have decided the gateway matter, where they are not likely to have thought that they had agreed that an arbitrator would do so, and, consequently, where reference of the gateway dispute to the court avoids the risk of forcing parties to arbitrate a matter that they may well not have agreed to arbitrate.

Where a plaintiff contends that an arbitration provision prohibits him or her from vindicating statutory rights, the plaintiffs' argument may raise a question of arbitrability for a court to decide, even if the question does not fall into one of the clear questions of arbitrability under Howsam v. HN13[] Contract Conditions & Provisions, Waivers

Generally and excepting instances where there would be transgressions of public policy, all rights and privileges to which one is legally entitled, Ex contractu or Ex debito justitiae, may be waived. Notably, courts in New York have permitted plaintiffs to waive their right to treble damages under *N.Y. Gen. Bus. A statutory right conferred on a private party, but affecting the public interest, may not be waived or released if said waiver or release contravenes the statutory policy.

[*596] MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

Richard J. Holwell, District Judge:

Before the Court is a motion, pursuant to sections 3 and 4 of the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), 9 U.S.C. §§ 1 et seq., by plaintiffs Kristen Schatz ("Schatz") and Patrick Witty ("Witty," and, together, the "plaintiffs") to compel defendant Cellco Partnership d/b/a Verizon Wireless ("Verizon") to arbitrate. The plaintiffs ask the Court (1) to order Verizon to arbitrate a claim, pursuant to the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act, N.J.S.A. §§ 56:8-1 et seq., or, alternatively, the New York General Business Law § 349, [2] for "general injunctive relief" benefitting all Verizon customers currently being charged $99.99 per month for Verizon's Nationwide Unlimited Plan ("NUP"), and (2) to declare invalid a provision in the parties' arbitration agreement that purports to limit the arbitrators' power to award such relief. Since the Court already has referred all claims in this action to arbitration, and since the question of the availability of "general injunctive relief" must be left to the arbitrators in the first instance, the plaintiffs' motion is denied without prejudice to plaintiffs' right to move to vacate any future arbitration award.

BACKGROUND

Plaintiff Schatz was a customer of Verizon. (Amended Complaint ("AC") ¶ 27.) Pursuant to a two-year contract with Verizon, Schatz obtained cell-phone service from Verizon under its Nationwide Unlimited Plan ("NUP"). (Id.) Schatz paid $99.99 per month for this service. (Id.) On January 18, 2010, Verizon lowered the price of its NUP from $99.99 per month to $69.99 per month. (Id. ¶ 30.) Verizon, however, did not notify Schatz of this change and did not reduce her monthly payments. (See id. ¶¶ 30-31.) In April 2010, when Schatz learned of Verizon's decision to [3] reduce the price of the NUP, she called Verizon and requested that she be charged the lower amount. (Id. ¶ 31.) Verizon agreed without objection, but refused to refund Schatz the excess she had paid between the time Verizon enacted the price decrease and the time Schatz requested it. (Id.) Schatz alleges that Verizon's conduct amounts to a breach of its obligations under a Customer Agreement to which Schatz agreed as part of her contract with Verizon. (See id. ¶ 36.) [*597] Schatz represents that the Customer Agreement requires Verizon to notify its customers of any changes in the NUP and that customers agree to the terms of any change by continuing to use the NUP after such notice is given. (See id. ¶ 29.) Schatz also alleges that Verizon's conduct violates the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act, or, alternatively, the New York General Business Law § 349. (See id. ¶ 42-43.)

In July 2010, Schatz filed this putative class action "on behalf of all Verizon wireless telephone customers with the individual Nationwide Unlimited Plan ('NUP') as of January 18, 2010 who were charged amounts in excess of the $69.99 monthly price that became effective for the NUP on January 18, 2010." (Id. ¶ 19.) The plaintiffs [4] sought relief on behalf of the class to require, among other things, "Verizon to specifically perform its Customer Agreement with all customers entitled to but not yet being charged the $69.99 price for their NUP." (Id., "Prayer for Relief" ¶ D.) On November 1, 2010, Verizon moved to compel arbitration of Schatz's individual claim based on an arbitration provision in the Customer Agreement that provides,

> You and Verizon Wireless both agree to resolve disputes only by arbitration or in small claims court. There's no judge or jury in arbitration, and the procedures may be different, but an arbitrator can award the same damages and relief, and must honor the same terms in this agreement, as a court would. If the law allows for an award of attorneys' fees, an arbitrator can award them too. We also both agree that:
> (1) The Federal Arbitration Act applies to this agreement. Except for small claims court cases that qualify, any dispute that results from this agreement or from the Services you receive from us (or from any advertising for any products or Services) will be resolved by one or more neutral arbitrators before the American Arbitration Association ("AAA") or Better Business Bureau [5] ("BBB").

(Customer Agreement 12-13.[1]) Section 3 of the Customer Agreement's arbitration provision provides, "This agreement doesn't allow class arbitrations even if the AAA or BBB procedures or rules would. The arbitrator may award money or injunctive relief only in favor of the individual party and only to the extent necessary to provide relief warranted by that party's individual claim." (Id.) The plaintiffs' current motion seeks to declare invalid the second sentence of section 3.

The plaintiffs originally opposed Verizon's motion on the ground that the provision barring class arbitration (the "class waiver") was unenforceable. Then, on April 27, 2011, the Supreme Court decided AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740, 179 L. Ed. 2d 742 (2011), and held that a California state-law rule that rendered class waivers unenforceable under California's law of unconscionability was preempted by the FAA. Id. at 1753. This Court then directed the parties to address the effect of Concepcion on Verizon's motion to compel arbitration. In a letter dated May 11, 2011, the plaintiffs informed the Court that they [6] "have determined not to challenge the applicability to Verizon's motion to compel arbitration of the majority's holding in Concepcion—that states are preempted under the [FAA] from holding class action waivers in arbitration agreements to be unconscionable and unenforceable." (Letter from William [*598] R. Weinstein, May 11, 2011, at 1.[2]) Because the Concepcion issue "was the sole focus," (id.), of Verizon's motion, the Court granted Verizon's motion to compel arbitration. (See Order, May 13, 2011, Docket No. 23.) The Court also granted the plaintiffs' request for leave to file their current motion, which seeks an order (1) compelling Verizon to arbitrate the plaintiffs' claims under the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act, or, alternatively, the New York General Business Law § 349,[3] and (2) declaring invalid the second sentence of section 3 of the parties' arbitration agreement, which purports to limit the scope of remedies the arbitrators may award.

LEGAL STANDARD

HN1[] Section 2 of the FAA [7] makes agreements to arbitrate "valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract." 9 U.S.C. § 2. Section 2 reflects the "'liberal federal policy favoring arbitration.'" Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. at 1745 (quoting Moses H. Cone Mem'l Hosp. v. Mercury Constr. Corp., 460 U.S. 1, 24, 103 S. Ct. 927, 74 L. Ed. 2d 765 (1983)). This policy extends to agreements to arbitrate certain statutory claims. See, e.g., 14 Penn Plaza LLC v. Pyett, 556 U.S. 247, 129 S. Ct. 1456, 1474, 173 L. Ed. 2d 398 (2009); Green Tree Financial Corp.-Ala. v. Randolph, 531 U.S. 79, 89, 121 S. Ct. 513, 148 L. Ed. 2d 373 (2000). However, "[b]y agreeing to arbitrate a statutory claim, a party does not forgo the substantive rights afforded by the statute; it only submits to their resolution in an arbitral forum." Preston v. Ferrer, 552 U.S. 346, 359, 128 S. Ct. 978, 169 L. Ed. 2d 917 (2008) (quoting Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc., 473 U.S. 614, 628, 105 S. Ct. 3346, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444 (1985)). Thus, where the parties have agreed to arbitrate statutory claims, and where Congress has not manifested an intent that such claims should not be arbitrated, the agreement will be enforced, "so long as the prospective litigant effectively may vindicate [his or her] statutory cause of action in the arbitral [8] forum." Mitsubishi, 473 U.S. at 637.

The Supreme Court, in Green Tree Financial Corp.-Alabama v. Randolph, 531 U.S. 79, 121 S. Ct. 513, 148 L. Ed. 2d 373 (2000), addressed an argument that an arbitration agreement would interfere with the plaintiff's ability to vindicate her rights under the federal Truth in Lending Act ("TILA") because the arbitration agreement was silent on the issue of attorneys' fees and costs. The plaintiff argued that the agreement's silence on the issue could render arbitration prohibitively expensive and thus deprive her of the ability to assert her statutory claim. The Supreme Court rejected this argument. It stated that "HN2[] where, as here, a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs." Id. at 92. For the plaintiff in Randolph, "[t]he 'risk' that [she would] be saddled with prohibitive costs [was] too speculative to justify the invalidation of an arbitration agreement." Id. at 91.

In PacifiCare Health Systems, Inc. v. Book, 538 U.S. 401, 123 S. Ct. 1531, 155 L. Ed. 2d 578 (2003), the Supreme Court considered an argument that a claim under [*599] the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations [9] Act ("RICO"), 18 U.S.C. §§ 1961 et seq., could not be subject to arbitration because the parties' arbitration agreement prohibited punitive damages, while RICO allowed treble damages. The Court declined to determine in the first instance whether the contract's ban on punitive damages in fact prohibited treble damages. See id. at 406-07. The Court held, "[W]e should not, on the basis of 'mere speculation' that an arbitrator might interpret these ambiguous agreements in a manner that casts their enforceability into doubt, take upon ourselves the authority to decide the antecedent question of how the ambiguity is to be resolved." Id. at 406-07 (quoting Vimar Seguros y Reaseguros, S.A. v. M/V Sky Reefer, 515 U.S. 528, 541, 115 S. Ct. 2322, 132 L. Ed. 2d 462 (1995)). The Court continued, "[S]ince we do not know how the arbitrator will construe the remedial limitations, the questions whether they render the parties' agreements unenforceable and whether it is for courts or arbitrators to decide enforceability in the first instance are unusually abstract. [Accordingly,] the proper course is to compel arbitration." Id. at 407.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit has taken from these cases two propositions:

> [F]irst, [10] that HN3[] the party resisting arbitration on the ground that the terms of an arbitration agreement interfere with the effective vindication of statutory rights bears the burden of showing the likelihood of such interference, and second, that this burden cannot be carried by "mere speculation" about how an arbitrator "might" interpret or apply the agreement.

Booker v. Robert Half Int'l, Inc., 413 F.3d 77, 81, 367 U.S. App. D.C. 77 (D.C. Cir. 2005) (emphasis in original).

In addition, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals recently has applied these principles, in the context of an antitrust action, to hold that HN4[] if a plaintiff can "adequately demonstrate[]" that the provisions of an arbitration agreement "would effectively preclude any action seeking to vindicate the statutory rights asserted by the plaintiff[]," the arbitration agreement may be unenforceable. See In re Am. Express Merchant's Litig., 554 F.3d 300, 304 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Am. Express I") (finding a class waiver in an arbitration agreement unenforceable where the plaintiffs made a "substantial demonstration" that "they would incur prohibitive costs if compelled to arbitrate under the class action waiver," such that "an inability to pursue arbitration on [11] a class basis would be tantamount to an inability to assert their claims at all"), vacated sub nom. Am. Express Co. v. Italian Colors Rest., 130 S. Ct. 2401, 176 L. Ed. 2d 920 (2010), reaff'd, 634 F.3d. 187 (2d Cir. 2011) ("Am. Express II").[4] In the American Express cases, the Second Circuit relied on the "federal substantive law of arbitrability," Am. Express II, 634 F.3d at 194, and its reasoning has not been overruled expressly by the Supreme Court's decision in Concepcion. Indeed, the Second Circuit reaffirmed the holdings of its American Express decisions in light of Concepcion, see In re American Express Merchants' Litigation, No. 06-1871-cv, 667 F.3d 204, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 1871 (2d Cir. Feb. 1, 2012) ("Am. Express III"), and those decisions today remain the law in this Circuit.[5]

[*600] DISCUSSION

In arbitration, the plaintiffs wish to seek what they call "general injunctive relief" under either the New York or New Jersey consumer-protection statute. This means the plaintiffs wish to obtain an injunction requiring Verizon to lower the monthly price of its NUP for all customers who still are being charged the higher rate of $99.99 per month. In addition, if the plaintiffs' amended complaint is any indication, in arbitration they [13] also will seek compensatory damages, punitive damages, a declaration that Verizon's conduct violates the consumer protection statutes and the Customer Agreement, and attorneys' fees.

The underlying relief plaintiffs seek in this motion is an order declaring unenforceable the second sentence of section 3 of the arbitration agreement—which limits the relief an arbitrator may award to "money or injunctive relief only in favor of the individual party and only to the extent necessary to provide relief warranted by that party's individual claim" (Customer Agreement at 13)—on the ground that it prevents plaintiffs from vindicating their asserted statutory rights under the applicable consumer-protection statute.

HN5[] "In analyzing a given vindication of statutory rights claim, [the Court] must first decide who the proper decision maker is for such a claim: an arbitrator or a court." Kristian v. Comcast Corp., 446 F.3d 25, 37 (1st Cir. 2006).

In Howsam v. Dean Witter Reynolds, Inc., 537 U.S. 79, 123 S. Ct. 588, 154 L. Ed. 2d 491 (2002), the Supreme Court reiterated that "question[s] of arbitrability" are presumptively for the court, not the arbitrator, unless the parties have "clearly and unmistakably" agreed otherwise. Id. at 83. The [14] Court in Howsam recognized two categories of disputes that constitute clear questions of arbitrability. The first category includes "dispute[s] about whether the parties are bound by a given arbitration clause." Id. at 84. The second category encompasses "disagreement[s] about whether an arbitration clause in a concededly binding contract applies to a particular type of controversy." Id. These "question[s] of arbitrability" are left to the court because they refer to [4] On February 1, 2012, the Second Circuit, after sua sponte considering the effect of Concepcion on its American Express decisions, reaffirmed the holdings of those cases. See In re Am. Express Merchants' Litig., No. 06-1871-cv, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 1871 (2d Cir. Feb. 1, 2012) ("Am. Express III"). American Express III does not alter the analysis of this Memorandum Opinion and Order.

[5] In light of Concepcion, there is some reason to question the applicability of this framework to claims, [12] like plaintiffs', that are based on state, rather than federal, law because Concepcion itself "involved the vindication of state, not federal, rights." Raniere v. Citigroup, Inc., 827 F. Supp. 2d 294, 310, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135393, 2011 WL 5881926, at * 13 (S.D.N.Y. 2011). Accordingly, it is possible to read Concepcion "broadly to acquiesce to the enforcement of an arbitral agreement that as a practical matter would prevent the vindication of state rights in the name of furthering the strong federal policy favoring arbitration." Id. (dicta). However, because, as discussed below, the question of the availability of "general injunctive relief" must be left to the arbitrators in the first instance, the Court need not address the question here.

> the kind of narrow circumstance[s] where contracting parties would likely have expected a court to have decided the gateway matter, where they are not likely to have thought that they had agreed that an arbitrator would do so, and, consequently, where reference of the gateway dispute to the court avoids the risk of forcing parties to arbitrate a matter that they may well not have agreed to arbitrate.

Id. at 83-84.

The parties here agree that this dispute does not fall into Howsam's first category of "question[s] of arbitrability"—whether the parties are bound by a given arbitration clause. Both parties agree that they are bound, in the sense that the Customer Agreement, which includes the arbitration agreement, "establishes [15] a valid contractual [*601] relationship between [Verizon] and each of its subscribers," Kristian, 446 F.3d at 42. There is some dispute, however, over whether the plaintiffs' motion involves the question of whether a particular dispute falls within the scope of a given arbitration clause. The answer to this question turns largely on how one defines the parties' underlying dispute.

As relevant to this motion, that dispute involves two questions: (1) whether Verizon has committed a deceptive business practice in violation of the applicable consumer-protection statute by failing to lower the price of the NUP for existing customers, and (2) if so, whether plaintiffs, proceeding on an individual basis, may obtain in arbitration an award requiring Verizon to lower the price to all customers still being charged the higher rate. Plaintiffs contend that these two issues together constitute the "claim," and that the Court must decide whether it falls within or outside the scope of the parties' arbitration agreement. In other words, plaintiffs characterize the issue as whether their claim for "general injunctive relief" falls within the scope of the arbitration clause. On the merits of that issue, plaintiffs [16] contend that their "general injunctive relief" claim falls outside the scope of the arbitration agreement because while the arbitration agreement provides that "any dispute that results from this agreement or from Services you receive from us . . . will be resolved by one or more neutral arbitrators," it also limits the relief an arbitrator may award to "money or injunctive relief only in favor of the individual party seeking relief and only to the extent necessary to provide relief warranted by that party's individual claim."[6] (Customer Agreement at 13.)

Verizon, on the other hand, contends that the only "question[] of arbitrability" for the Court to decide is whether the first issue—i.e. whether Verizon violated the consumer-protection statute—falls within the scope of the arbitration agreement. The second issue—i.e. the availability of general injunctive relief—says Verizon, should be left to the arbitrators to decide in the event plaintiffs prevail on the first issue. With regard to the first issue, both parties agree that [18] a consumer protection claim falls within the scope of the arbitration agreement in the sense that the arbitration agreement is broad enough to encompass claims for alleged violations of the consumer-protection statutes.

Plaintiffs seek support for their position in a recent line of cases arising out of the proposed merger between AT&T Mobility (ATTM) and T-Mobile USA, Inc. See *AT&T Mobility LLC v. Fisher, 11 [602] Civ. 2245, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124839, 2011 WL 5169349 (D. Md. Oct. 28, 2011); AT&T Mobility LLC v. Bernardi, 11 Civ. 03992, 11 Civ. 04412, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, 2011 WL 5079549 (N.D. Cal. Oct. 26, 2011); AT&T Mobility LLC v. Gonnello, 11 Civ. 5636, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116420, 2011 WL 4716617 (S.D.N.Y. Oct. 7, 2011); AT&T Mobility

[6] It seems rather odd that plaintiffs, as the party seeking to compel arbitration, argue that their claim falls outside the scope of the arbitration agreement. One ordinarily would expect that the party opposing arbitration would argue that the dispute falls outside the arbitration agreement. The plaintiffs, however, appear to make the following argument: A claim for general injunctive relief falls outside the scope of the arbitration agreement because the agreement only permits the arbitrator to award relief in favor of an individual, and general injunctive relief does not qualify as such. The arbitration agreement, however, also requires [17] that all claims between the parties be submitted to arbitration. Therefore, the arbitration agreement purports to require an individual to waive any claims for general injunctive relief he or she might have. The applicable consumer-protection statute, however, provides an individual with the right to seek general injunctive relief. Accordingly, the argument continues, because an individual cannot be compelled to waive his or her statutory rights through an arbitration agreement, the provision limiting the scope of relief an arbitrator may award is unenforceable. Plaintiffs then presumably would argue that the offending provision is severable and that the remainder of the arbitration agreement should be enforced.

LLC v. Smith, 11 Civ. 5157, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460 (E.D. Pa. Oct. 7, 2011); AT&T Mobility LLC v. Bushman, 11 Civ. 80922, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139113, 2011 WL 5924666, at *3 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 23, 2011). After the merger was announced, over one thousand individual customers of ATTM (all represented by the same law firm) filed separate arbitration demands seeking to enjoin the merger pursuant to section 16 of the Clayton Act, or, alternatively, to impose a variety of conditions on the merger's completion. See, e.g., Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460, at *1. In response, ATTM filed [19] various actions in United States District Courts throughout the country seeking to preliminarily enjoin those arbitrations on the ground that the customers' claims fell outside the scope of the arbitration agreement. ATTM's arbitration agreement is similar to the arbitration agreement here. It provides,

> The arbitrator may award declaratory or injunctive relief only in favor of the individual party seeking relief and only to the extent necessary to provide relief warranted by that party's individual claim. YOU AND AT&T AGREE THAT EACH MAY BRING CLAIMS AGAINST THE OTHER ONLY IN YOUR OR ITS INDIVIDUAL CAPACITY, AND NOT AS A PLAINTIFF OR CLASS MEMBER IN ANY PURPORTED CLASS OR REPRESENTATIVE PROCEEDING.

E.g., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at *3. ATTM's arbitration agreement also provides, "AT&T and you agree to arbitrate all disputes and claims between us. This agreement is intended to be broadly interpreted." Id.

In the ATTM cases, the parties purported to agree that the issue of the scope of the arbitration agreement was a question for the courts to decide.[7] However, "the parties differ[ed] on what constitutes a 'scope' determination." Fisher, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124839, 2011 WL 5169349, at *2. The customers argued, like Verizon does here, [20] that the "scope" determination was limited to the question of whether a Clayton Act claim fell within the scope of the broad arbitration clause. 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124839, [WL] at *2-3; Bernardi, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, 2011 WL 5079549, at *4-5, *9. The question of the relief available under the agreement, the customers argued, was a question for the arbitrator to decide in the first instance. Two courts expressly disagreed. In Bernardi, the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California described the customers' argument as "too narrow a reading of the Court's power." Bernardi, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, 2011 WL 5079549, at *4. The scope question was "not simply limited to whether the Clayton Act claim is arbitrable on its face, but looks to the 'dispute' as a whole to determine if it is arbitrable." 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, [WL] at *5. Thus, since "the only relief sought by the individual defendants [i.e. an injunction against the merger or the imposition of conditions upon it] is relief that is foreclosed by the language of the arbitration provision, the demand for arbitration is beyond the scope of disputes that the parties have contractually agreed to arbitrate." 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, [WL] at *9. The District Court for the District of Maryland agreed. See Fisher, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124839, 2011 WL 5169349, at *3 & n.4; [21] see also Gonnello, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116420, 2011 WL 4716617, at *4.

A third court took a different view. The U.S. District Court for the Eastern District [*603] of Pennsylvania read ATTM's arbitration agreement to mean that "claims brought in an 'individual capacity' are arbitrable, while claims brought in any 'class or representative proceeding' are prohibited." Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460, at *4. With respect to the clause in the arbitration agreement that limited the arbitrator's remedial powers, the court stated, > Fairly read, this clause addresses the remedies an arbitrator may award, not whether a particular dispute may be properly arbitrated in the first instance. Stated differently, the aforementioned clause, by its terms, does not constrain the nature of relief an individual party may seek, but rather limits what relief an arbitrator ultimately awards.

> Here, Smith's arbitration seeks to enjoin the AT&T/T-Mobile merger or, in the alternative, seeks divestitures and other remedies [22] as may be appropriate to preserve competition in the relevant markets. (Doc. No. 28, at 14). The arbitration agreement does not prohibit Smith from seeking such remedies (assuming, of > course, she brought the action in her "individual capacity" and not as part of any "class or representative proceeding"), although the agreement may prohibit the arbitrator from awarding the requested relief. This is not a "question of arbitrability" properly before the court at this time, so we do not resolve it.

Id. The court in Smith went on to find that the customers' claims nonetheless fell outside the scope of the arbitration clause because they amounted, in substance, to claims brought in a "class or representative proceeding." *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at 6-7. The court in Smith, as well as the other ATTM courts, found that the consumers' arbitrations bore "all the hallmarks of 'class arbitration' laid out in Concepcion." *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at 7; see *Bushman, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139113, 2011 WL 5924666, at 2; *Bernardi, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, 2011 WL 5079549, at 4. First, each consumer represented "but one of over 1,000 people who, represented by the same firm, filed essentially identical arbitration demands, all seeking the same, non-individualized relief." *Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460, at 6. [23] Second, "the multiple, functionally identical arbitrations . . . would likely result in 'procedural morass,' not 'final judgment," and so would "sacrifice the principal advantage of arbitration—its informality." Id. (quoting Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. at 1751). Third, the consumers' arbitrations may not have provided adequate protection to absent third parties, such as T-Mobile, cellular technology companies, public interest groups, and "the numerous government bodies that are also evaluating the merger." Id. Finally, the arbitrations implicated the concern that arbitration is poorly suited to the "higher stakes of class litigation." *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at 7 ("The immense magnitude of the risk, i.e., the fate of a $39 billion merger, may pressure ATTM to settle claims that it believes to be meritless."). The consumers' arbitration demands thus implicated the precise concerns about class arbitration that at least in part animated the Concepcion decision. This led all of the ATTM courts to conclude that the consumers were seeking to arbitrate on a "class or representative" basis and that ATTM therefore was "likely to succeed on the merits" of its claim that the customers' arbitration demands fell outside [24] the scope of the arbitration clause. *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at 5-7; see *Bushman, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139113, 2011 WL 5924666, at 2-3; *Gonnello, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116420, 2011 WL 4716617, at 4; *Bernardi, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124084, 2011 WL 5079549, at 4; *Fisher, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 124839, 2011 WL 5169349, at 7.

The situation here is in some ways similar. Most significantly, like the consumers in the ATTM cases, the plaintiffs here seek broad injunctive relief under a statute, and the arbitration agreement purports to prohibit the arbitrator [*604] from awarding any relief that extends beyond the individual plaintiffs. But unlike the consumers (and like ATTM), the plaintiffs argue that the "dispute" sought to be arbitrated—and thus the question for the Court at this stage—includes the question of whether the particular relief sought is permitted under the agreement. In this regard, Smith's reading of the remedial limitation provision is most persuasive: "Fairly read, this clause addresses the remedies an arbitrator may award, not whether a particular dispute may be properly arbitrated in the first instance. . . . This is not a 'question of arbitrability' properly before the court at this time." *Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460, at 4. Accordingly, the fact that the arbitration agreement purports to limit the type of relief [25] an arbitrator may award is not enough to warrant the conclusion that plaintiffs' consumer-protection act claims fall outside the scope of the arbitration agreement. This is especially true here given that the plaintiffs are likely to seek a variety of relief in arbitration, and neither party has argued that such relief (aside from "general injunctive relief") is prohibited by the agreement. Thus, the situation here is different than in the ATTM cases, where the only relief the consumers sought was barred by the arbitration agreement. See *Gonnello, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116420, 2011 WL 4716617, at 3 (consumers were seeking "as [their] sole relief an injunction against the announced merger or, alternatively, a host of conditions on the merger—none of which are tailored to the individual claimant. . . . Thus, there is nothing to arbitrate which is not foreclosed by the contractual limitation on the relief that may be awarded."). Looking at the parties' dispute and the agreement as a whole, it reasonably appears that the parties intended to arbitrate plaintiffs' consumer-protection claims, even though the agreement may prohibit a type of relief plaintiffs desire.

In addition, unlike the consumers' arbitrations in the [26] ATTM cases, plaintiffs' claims do not fall outside the scope of the arbitration clause as de facto "class arbitrations." To be sure, plaintiffs seek general injunctive relief on behalf of other Verizon customers, but their claim for such relief does not "bear[] all the hallmarks of 'class arbitration' laid out in Concepcion," *Smith, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, 2011 WL 5924460, at 7. First, there is no indication that plaintiffs plan to file multiple, identical arbitrations. Thus, there is little reason to believe that the plaintiffs' claims will result in "'procedural morass,' not 'final judgment,'" id. (quoting Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. at 1751)). Second, absent parties are unlikely to be inadequately protected. The only absent parties that potentially would be affected by plaintiffs' claim for general injunctive relief are existing Verizon customers still being charged the higher monthly rate for the NUP, and their interests with respect to the "general injunctive relief" claim are straightforward and directly in line with the plaintiffs' interests. Compare 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125367, [WL] at *6 (noting that in an individual arbitration to enjoin the ATTM merger, T-Mobile, cellular technology consumers, public interest groups, and government [27] bodies that both oppose and support the merger would lack protection). Moreover, as the complaint indicates, Verizon willingly lowers the price of the NUP upon a customer's request. Thus, even an adverse decision on plaintiffs' "general injunctive relief" claim would not appear to preclude the absent customers' from obtaining the lower price on the NUP.[8] Accordingly, there [*605] is little risk that the absent customers' interests may be prejudiced by plaintiffs' seeking "general injunctive relief" on their behalf. Finally, given that Verizon willingly lowers the price charged to a customer upon the customer's request, there seems little risk of plaintiffs pressuring Verizon to settle claims it believes are meritless. See id.

Accordingly, the question of whether a particular form of relief is available under the parties' arbitration agreement is not, under these circumstances, a question of whether a particular [29] dispute falls within the scope of the parties' arbitration agreement. Thus, the plaintiffs' motion does not present one of Howsam's "clear questions of arbitrability" for the Court to decide. See Kristian, 446 F.3d at 42 (where plaintiffs claimed that an arbitration agreement prevented them from vindicating their statutory rights (by, for example, prohibiting punitive damages), plaintiffs' argument did not involve the question of whether their claims fell within the scope of the arbitration provision, but rather the question of whether "arbitration subject to the provisions at issue shields [the defendant] from antitrust liability, and hence conflicts with the statutes providing for such liability"); see also Am. Express I, 554 F.3d at 309 (vindication-of-statutory-rights claim did not involve question of whether arbitration agreement was broad enough to cover plaintiffs' antitrust claims).

This does not mean, however, that the plaintiffs' motion necessarily fails to raise a question of arbitrability at all. Indeed, HN6[] where a plaintiff contends that an arbitration provision prohibits him or her from vindicating statutory rights, the plaintiffs' argument may raise a question of arbitrability [30] for a court to decide, even if the question does not fall into one of Howsam's "clear questions of arbitrability." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 42. For example, in Randolph, the Supreme Court "assume[d] that the issue of arbitration costs raises a question of arbitrability." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 51; accord Am. Express II, 634 F.3d at 197.

The Supreme Court's decision in PacifiCare is particularly relevant here. In PacifiCare, the Supreme Court declined to decide in the first instance whether an arbitration provision that prohibited punitive damages was unenforceable on the ground that it prevented a plaintiff from obtaining statutorily authorized treble damages. PacifiCare, 538 U.S. at 407. The Court found ambiguity in the issue of whether the agreement's prohibition on punitive damages in fact prohibited [*606] treble damages and stated, "[S]ince we do not know how the arbitrator will construe the remedial limitations, the questions whether they render the parties' agreements unenforceable and whether it is for courts or [8] While a prior arbitration may serve under certain circumstances as a basis to foreclose later proceedings, see Boguslavsky v. Kaplan, 159 F.3d 715, 720 (2d Cir. 1998) ("[C]ollateral estoppel can be predicated on arbitration proceedings"), the absent Verizon customers, as non-parties to an individual arbitration, are unlikely to be precluded by the plaintiffs' arbitration from later asserting their own claims against Verizon. See Parklane Hosiery Co. v. Shore, 439 U.S. 322, 326 n.5, 99 S. Ct. 645, 58 L. Ed. 2d 552 (1979) [28] ("Under the doctrine of res judicata, a judgment on the merits in a prior suit bars a second suit involving the same parties or their privies based on the same cause of action." (emphasis added)); see also Taylor v. Sturgell, 553 U.S. 880, 892, 128 S. Ct. 2161, 171 L. Ed. 2d 155 (2008) ("A person who was not a party to a suit generally has not had a 'full and fair opportunity to litigate' the claims and issues settled in that suit."). It is true that in certain circumstances a nonparty to a prior suit may be precluded from litigating issues decided in the prior suit where the nonparty was "'adequately represented by someone with the same interests'" who was a party, Taylor, 553 U.S. at 894 (quoting Richards v. Jefferson County, 517 U.S. 793, 798, 116 S. Ct. 1761, 135 L. Ed. 2d 76 (1996)), but even if that were the case here with respect to plaintiffs' claim for "general injunctive relief," the complaint suggests that Verizon still would prospectively lower the price for the absent customers upon their request, even if plaintiffs' claim for "general injunctive relief" failed.

arbitrators to decide enforceability in the first instance are unusually abstract. [Accordingly,] the proper course is to compel arbitration." Id. at 407.

"Implicit in the PacifiCare [31] analysis is the proposition that if the remedies limitation in the arbitration agreement posed a clear conflict with the remedies available in the RICO statute, that clear conflict would pose a question of [*607] arbitrability." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 46 (emphasis added). In Kristian, the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit found such a clear conflict. There, the parties' arbitration agreement explicitly prohibited treble damages,[9] while both the federal and Massachusetts antitrust laws under which the plaintiffs brought suit provided for them. Id. at 44-45. That alone, however, did not necessarily indicate a "clear conflict" between the statutory remedies and the arbitration agreement because, if the right to obtain treble damages under the statutes could be waived, the conflict would be resolved. See id. at 46-50. Thus, before determining whether the ostensible conflict posed a question of arbitrability for the court, the First Circuit examined the waiver issue.

With [32] respect to the right to treble damages under the federal antitrust laws, the court found the right unwaivable. The court noted,

> There is no Supreme Court precedent that speaks directly to the question of whether treble damages under federal antitrust law may be waived by contract. However, in Mitsubishi, the Court noted in dicta that if provisions in the arbitration agreement at issue had operated "as a prospective waiver of a party's right to pursue statutory remedies for antitrust violations, we would have little hesitation in condemning the agreement as against public policy."

Id. at 47 (quoting Mitsubishi, 473 U.S. at 637 n.19). Accordingly, the First Circuit found the question of whether the ban on treble damages rendered the arbitration agreement unenforceable to be a question of arbitrability for the court to decide. Id.[10]

With respect to the state [33] antitrust claims (which were brought by different plaintiffs in a separate complaint), the First Circuit found ambiguity on the waiver issue, and, relying on PacifiCare, left the question of enforceability to the arbitrators in the first instance. See id. at 50. The court read a case from the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts as "hinting that waiver of statutory remedies will not be allowed in situations involving a consumer plaintiff and/or antitrust claims." Id. And because the plaintiffs in Kristian were consumers asserting antitrust claims, the First Circuit found the waiver issue "ambiguous at best." Id. Accordingly, "Plaintiffs' vindication of statutory rights claim, based on the conflict between the arbitration agreements and Massachusetts antitrust law, does not raise a question of arbitrability." Id. (emphasis in original) ("HN7[] When there is an underlying legal ambiguity, . . . an arbitrator must decide the underlying legal question in the first instance so that the federal policy in favor of arbitration is not frustrated.").

The Kristian court's application of PacifiCare is persuasive, and the Court is aware of no Second Circuit decision that similarly addresses the analysis [34] to be undertaken when a plaintiff challenges the validity of a remedial limitation contained in an arbitration agreement.[11] Cf. Disc. Trophy & Co. v. Plastic Dress-Up Co., 03 Civ. 2167,

[9] The arbitration agreement in Kristian provided, "IN NO EVENT SHALL WE OR OUR EMPLOYEES OR AGENTS HAVE ANY LIABILITY FOR PUNITIVE, TREBLE, EXEMPLARY, SPECIAL, INDIRECT, INCIDENTAL OR CONSEQUENTIAL DAMAGES." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 44.

[10] The court found that the damages waiver did not render the arbitration agreement unenforceable because of a "savings clause" that provided in substance, "If the law does not permit waiver of a remedy, a plaintiff will still have that remedy, the [arbitration agreement's] liability limitation notwithstanding." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 48.

[11] The question of who should decide the enforceability of a class waiver—which the Second Circuit has held to be a question for the court, see Am. Express II, 634 F.3d at 191; [35] accord Kristian, 446 F.3d at 55—is not the same. Questions of arbitrability are those "'challeng[ing] specifically the validity of the agreement to arbitrate.'" Rent-A-Center, West, Inc. v. Jackson, 130 S. Ct. 2772, 2778, 177 L. Ed. 2d 403 (2010) (quoting Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 U.S. 440, 444, 126 S. Ct. 1204, 163 L. Ed. 2d 1038 (2006)). And an arbitration agreement may be invalid if some term or terms in it renders the arbitral forum

2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 2659, 2004 WL 350477, at *6-7 (D. Conn. Feb. 19, 2004) (offering a similar interpretation of PacifiCare). Thus, the Court will apply the principles of PacifiCare (as interpreted by Kristian) to the plaintiffs' motion. In that regard, a number of issues require attention. To conclude that this dispute presents a question of arbitrability, the Court must find a clear conflict between the parties' arbitration agreement and the statutorily authorized remedies. In this context, that means (1) the consumer protection statutes must authorize the "general injunctive relief" the plaintiffs seek, (2) the arbitration agreement must prohibit it, and (3) the right to obtain such relief under the statute must not be subject to waiver. Ambiguity in those issues will render the question of the clause's enforceability for the arbitrators to resolve in the first instance.

A. The Consumer Protection Statutes

The private right of action under New York General Business Law § 349(h) provides:

> HN9[] In addition to the right of action granted to the attorney [37] general pursuant to this section, any person who has been injured [*608] by reason of any violation of this section may bring an action in his own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice, an action to recover his actual damages or fifty dollars, whichever is greater, or both such actions. The court may, in its discretion, increase the award of damages to an amount not to exceed three times the actual damages up to one thousand dollars, if the court finds the defendant willfully or knowingly violated this section. The court may award reasonable attorney's fees to a prevailing plaintiff.

N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 349(h). Similarly, the private right of action under the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act provides:

> HN10[] Any person who suffers any ascertainable loss of moneys or property, real or personal, as a result of the use or employment by another person of any method, act, or practice declared unlawful under this act . . . may bring an action or assert a counterclaim therefor in any court of competent jurisdiction. In any action under this section the court shall, in addition to any other appropriate legal or equitable relief, award threefold the damages sustained by any person in interest. In all [38] actions under this section, including those brought by the Attorney General, the court shall also award reasonable attorneys' fees, filing fees and reasonable costs of suit.

N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:8-19.

Plaintiffs concede that their arbitrations may not proceed on a class basis. Nonetheless, plaintiffs contend that under these statutes an individual may obtain injunctive relief effectively on behalf of others, even if a class device inadequate by preventing a plaintiff from effectively vindicating his or her statutory rights. See Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc., 473 U.S. 614, 637, 105 S. Ct. 3346, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444 (1985). Here, plaintiffs contest the validity of the arbitration agreement's remedial limitation on the ground that it renders the arbitral forum inadequate by preventing plaintiffs from obtaining a specific statutory right (i.e. "general injunctive relief"). Implicit in this argument is the notion that HN8[] the arbitral forum is inadequate only if the conflict between the statutory right and the arbitration agreement is clear. If the conflict is ambiguous (whether because of contractual or legal ambiguity with respect to the specific statutory right, see Kristian, 446 F.3d at 46 n.15, 50), the alleged inadequacy of the [36] arbitral forum (and thus the alleged invalidity of the arbitration agreement) is speculative, and the strong federal policy favoring arbitration requires that the arbitrator resolve the ambiguity in the first instance. That is the crux of PacifiCare.

By contrast, a class action/arbitration ban, if clear, implicates the adequacy of the arbitral forum (and thus the validity of the arbitration agreement) from the outset because it affects the manner in which a plaintiff may pursue his or her statutory rights in the first instance. As such, the adequacy of the arbitral forum (and thus the validity of the arbitration agreement) is implicated whenever there is a question of whether an inability to pursue statutory claims as a class amounts to an inability to pursue statutory claims at all. See Kristian, 446 F.3d at 54-55. This is a question for the court because, if left to the arbitrators in the first instance, it may never be addressed if indeed the class waiver effectively prevents the plaintiff from arbitrating at all.

is not used. Verizon, on the other hand, argues that a class proceeding is necessary to obtain the relief that the plaintiffs desire.

The starting point for this analysis is the language of the statutes. The New York consumer-protection statute provides, "In addition to the right of action granted to the attorney general pursuant to this section, any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of this section may bring an action in his own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice." N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 349(h). The right of action granted to the attorney general similarly provides, "[The attorney general] may bring an action in the name and on behalf of the people of the state of New York to enjoin such unlawful acts or practices." Id. § 349(b). [39] On one hand, the language contained in the attorney general's right of action ("in the name and on behalf of the people") provides at least some suggestion that the injunctive relief the attorney general may obtain is broader than the injunctive relief available to an individual suing "in his own name" (and not "on behalf of" anybody). The language also may suggest that in order for an individual suing in his own name to obtain the same scope of injunctive relief as the attorney general, the individual must act "on behalf of" others, which plaintiffs here acknowledge they cannot do (at least in terms of proceeding as a class).

On the other hand, both the attorney general's right of action and the private right of action permit the plaintiff "to enjoin such unlawful act[s] or practice[s]." Nothing in the private right of action purports to limit the scope of injunctive relief an individual suing "in his own name" may obtain, as long as the individual "has been injured by reason of any violation of this section." In addition, the language at the beginning of the private right of action ("In addition to the right of action granted to the attorney general") suggests some level of equivalence [40] between the scope of injunctive relief obtainable by an individual suing in his own name and that obtainable by the attorney general on behalf of the [*609] people of New York. Indeed, one of the purposes of the act is "to supplement the activities of the New York State Attorney General in prosecuting consumer fraud complaints." McDonald v. North Shore Yacht Sales, Inc., 134 Misc. 2d 910, 513 N.Y.S.2d 590, 594 (Sup. Ct. 1987). Thus, the statute itself does not provide a clear answer to the question whether plaintiffs would be entitled to obtain their "general injunctive relief" absent a class proceeding.[12]

Verizon contends that plaintiffs' position is meritless because all of the cases plaintiffs cite for the proposition that an individual may obtain "general injunctive [41] relief" are either class actions or suits by individual parties seeking relief that benefits only themselves. See Weinberg v. Sprint Corp., 173 N.J. 233, 801 A.2d 281, 291 (N.J. 2002) (class action); Oswego Laborers Local 214 Pension Fund v. Marine Midland Bank, N.A., 85 N.Y.2d 20, 647 N.E.2d 741, 623 N.Y.S.2d 529 (1995) (pension funds brought suit on their own behalf); Goldman v. Simon Property Group, Inc., 58 A.D.3d 208, 869 N.Y.S.2d 125 (N.Y. 2d Dep't 2008) (class action). For example, plaintiff relies on Goldman v. Simon Property Group, Inc., 58 A.D.3d 208 (N.Y. 2d Dep't 2008). In Goldman, the plaintiff sued the defendant under the New York consumer-protection statute for selling gift cards that were subject to a "dormancy fee" of $2.50 per month after seven months, without proper notice to the purchasers or cardholders. Id. at 211. The plaintiff sought an injunction against the practice, including an order prohibiting the defendant from continuing to deduct the fee from certain cards that remained outstanding. See id. at 212, 218. The New York Supreme Court, Appellate Division, held that the trial court should not have dismissed plaintiff's claim for injunctive relief. Id. at 218. The plaintiffs here contend that Goldman was brought by an individual [42] and not as a class action. But Goldman clearly states, "The plaintiff filed an amended class action complaint." Id. at 212. Accordingly, Goldman does little to help plaintiffs.

[12] The language of the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act is similarly unclear on the issue. With respect to remedies available, the statute states that a court must award treble damages and attorneys' fees, and may award "any other appropriate legal or equitable relief." N.J. Stat. Ann. § 56:8-19. There is little in the statutory language to determine whether "appropriate" equitable relief for an individual may include relief on behalf of absent parties.

The Court, however, has identified at least one case in which an individual plaintiff was able to obtain a preliminary injunction against false advertising under New York General Business Law § § 350-e.[13] In McDonald v. North Shore Yacht Sales, Inc., 134 Misc. 2d 910, 513 N.Y.S.2d 590 (Sup. Ct. 1987), the plaintiff (acting only individually) sought a preliminary injunction against advertising by a yacht manufacturer that did not make clear that certain representations in its ads were subject to change without notice. See id. at 592-94. The court granted the preliminary injunction, which prohibited the yacht manufacturer from conducting "any advertising in New York State which fails to state that the equipment and/or accessories on Hunter Boats may be subject to change by Hunter without notice." Id. at 595. With [*610] respect to the irreparable harm prong of the preliminary injunction analysis, the court held:

> Given the aforecited purpose of the statute, to encourage private enforcement of consumer protection, to strongly deter deceptive [43] business practices, and to supplement the activities of the New York State Attorney General in prosecuting consumer fraud complaints, I hold that the Legislature intended the irreparable injury at issue to be irreparable injury to the public at large, not just to one consumer.

Id. at 593-94. The court made no mention of the fact that the plaintiff had brought suit individually, and not as a class action. Thus, there is authority to support the plaintiffs' position that an individual may seek an injunction for the benefit of the public under New York's consumer-protection statutes.

An injunction against false advertising, however, more clearly amounts to relief sought to benefit the "public at large," id. at 594, than would an order directing Verizon to lower the price of its NUP for a definable class [44] of existing customers. A false advertisement potentially may impact any member of the public that utilizes the channels of communication through which the advertisement is broadcast. By contrast, the alleged illegal conduct that plaintiffs seek to enjoin impacts only a distinct group of existing customers. In that sense, plaintiffs' claim for "general injunctive relief" is less like an injunction in favor of "the public at large," id., and more like a claim simply asserting the rights of others to receive lower prices. So viewed, plaintiffs' general injunctive relief claim would contravene the notion that "one does not, as a general rule, have standing to assert claims on behalf of another." Caprer v. Nussbaum, 36 A.D.3d 176, 825 N.Y.S.2d 55, 62 (App. Div. 2d Dep't 2006) (citing Soc'y of Plastics Indus. v. County of Suffolk, 77 N.Y.2d 761, 573 N.E.2d 1034, 570 N.Y.S.2d 778 (1991); Matter of Hebel v. West, 25 A.D.3d 172, 803 N.Y.S.2d 242 (App. Div. 3d Dep't 2005)); see also Jersey Shore Med. Ctr.-Fitkin Hosp. v. Baum's Estate, 84 N.J. 137, 417 A.2d 1003, 1007 (N.J. 1980) ("Ordinarily, a litigant may not claim standing to assert the rights of a third party.").

Of course, there is a sensible public policy argument supporting the ability of an individual consumer [45] to seek an injunction against a defendant's allegedly fraudulent consumer practices. To the extent the consumer protection acts authorize individuals to act as private attorneys general, it is sensible to interpret the acts to permit an individual to obtain broad injunctive relief. Moreover, as a practical matter, it would make little sense to require thousands of individual consumers to bring individual consumer protection act claims to stop a practice after one consumer has succeeded in showing that the practice is fraudulent. Without resolving the conflicting policies, the Court simply points out that the language of the statute is open to varying interpretations, which suggests that the issue should be left to the arbitrators to decide in the first instance.

B. The Arbitration Agreement

The parties' arbitration agreement provides, on the one hand, that the arbitrators may "award the same damages and relief . . . as a court would." (Customer Agreement 12.) This presumably would include the "general injunctive relief" the plaintiffs here seek, provided such relief in fact were available to an individual plaintiff under the consumer protection statutes. On the other hand, the arbitration [46] agreement purports to limit the arbitrators'

[13] Section 350-e contains a private right of action materially identical to the private right of action in section 349(h). Section 350-e provides, "Any person who has been injured by reason of any violation of section three hundred fifty or three hundred fifty-a of this article may bring an action in his or her own name to enjoin such unlawful act or practice." N.Y. Gen. Bus. Law § 350-e.

remedial powers. The agreement provides, "[T]he arbitrator may award money or injunctive relief only in favor of the individual party [*611] seeking relief and only to the extent necessary to provide relief warranted by that party's individual claim." (Id. at 13.) This clause would seem to prohibit the arbitrator from ordering Verizon to lower the prices being charged to a group of customers based on the claim of an individual customer.

While these provisions at first glance might suggest that there is some ambiguity in the agreement, a closer inspection reveals otherwise. HN11[] A contract is ambiguous where it "could suggest more than one meaning when viewed objectively by a reasonably intelligent person who has examined the context of the entire integrated agreement and who is cognizant of the customs, practices, usages and terminology as generally understood in the particular trade or business." Bank of N.Y. v. First Millennium, Inc., 607 F.3d 905, 914 (2d Cir. 2010) (internal quotation marks omitted).

Here, the provision stating that an arbitrator may award the same relief as a court is contained in a sentence that provides in full, "There's no judge [47] or jury in arbitration, and the procedures may be different, but an arbitrator can award the same damages and relief, and must honor the same terms in this agreement, as a court would." (Customer Agreement at 12.) This provision is best considered a "description of the arbitration process and how it operates." *Gonnello, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 116420, 2011 WL 4716617, at * 4*. As such, it "does not supplant the specific limitations . . . regarding the type of declaratory or injunctive relief that may be awarded." Id.; see *Bushman, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 139113, 2011 WL 5924666, at 3 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 23, 2011) (construing a materially similar arbitration clause); see also County of Suffolk v. Alcorn, 266 F.3d 131, 139 (2d Cir. 2001) ("It is axiomatic that courts construing contracts must give 'specific terms and exact terms . . . greater weight than general language.'" (quoting Aramony v. United Way, 254 F.3d 403, 413 (2d Cir. 2001))). Accordingly, it is clear that the arbitration agreement would prohibit an arbitrator from awarding the "general injunctive relief" that the plaintiffs desire.

C. Waiver

HN12[] Although the arbitration agreement may prohibit plaintiffs from obtaining the relief they desire, that prohibition may not raise a question of arbitrability [48] if the law is ambiguous on the plaintiffs' ability to waive the right (if any) to such relief. See Kristian, 446 F.3d at 49-50 (where arbitration agreement prohibited treble damages, and where state statute permitted them, no question of arbitrability was raised where the waiver issue was ambiguous). In that regard, the New York Court of Appeals has held, "HN13[] Generally and excepting instances where there would be transgressions of public policy, all rights and privileges to which one is legally entitled, Ex contractu or Ex debito justitiae, may be waived." Hadden v. Consol. Edison Co. of N.Y., Inc., 45 N.Y.2d 466, 382 N.E.2d 1136, 1138, 410 N.Y.S.2d 274 (N.Y. 1978); see also Midland Funding, L.L.C. v. Giambanco, 422 N.J. Super. 301, 28 A.3d 831, 837 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 2011) ("We first begin our discussion by reiterating the well-settled principle that parties, by agreement, may waive statutory and constitutional rights." (citations omitted)). Notably, courts in New York have permitted plaintiffs to waive their right to treble damages under New York General Business Law section 349(h) in order to allow the plaintiffs to bring their claims as class actions. See Leider v. Ralfe, 387 F. Supp. 2d 283, 292-93 (S.D.N.Y. 2005); Super Glue Corp. v. Avis Rent A Car Sys., Inc., 132 A.D.2d 604, 517 N.Y.S.2d 764, 767 [*612] (App. Div. 2d Dep't 1987).[14] [49] However, the ability to waive a statutory right is not unlimited. See Berkovich v. Mostovaya, 22 Misc. 3d 91, 875 N.Y.S.2d 741, 744 (App. Term 2009) ("'[A] statutory right conferred on a private party, but affecting the public interest, may not be waived or released if said waiver or release contravenes the statutory policy.'" (quoting Estro Chem. Co. v. Falk, 303 N.Y. 83, 100 N.E.2d 146, 148 (N.Y. 1951))).

[14] Such a waiver is necessary to allow a class action under section 349(h) because N.Y. C.P.L.R. section 901(b), which sets out the prerequisites for a class action suit, prohibits a plaintiff from bringing a class action "to recover a penalty or minimum measure of recovery created or imposed by statute," unless the statute "specifically authorizes the recovery thereof in a class action." Because section 349(h) does not specifically authorize class actions and because under New York law treble damages are considered a penalty, see Leider, 387 F. Supp. 2d at 288, the waiver allows plaintiffs to comply with C.P.L.R. section 901(b).

There is a credible argument, then, that a waiver of an individual's right to seek an injunction to protect the public at large contravenes the statutory policy behind section 349(h). [50] Indeed, in discussing the statute, the New York Court of Appeals has noted, "'The power to obtain injunctions against any and all deceptive and fraudulent practices will be an important new weapon in New York State's long standing efforts to protect people from consumer frauds.'" Oswego Laborers' Local 214, 85 N.Y.2d at 25 (quoting Mem. of Governor Rockefeller, 1970 N.Y. Legis. Ann., at 472). But the "new weapon" referred to by the Court of Appeals was the right of action afforded to the attorney general. And, of course, an "arbitration agreement[] [in a consumer contract] will not preclude the [attorney general] from bringing actions seeking class-wide and equitable relief." Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20, 32, 111 S. Ct. 1647, 114 L. Ed. 2d 26 (1991).[15] But whether an arbitration agreement permissibly may preclude a private action seeking "general injunctive relief" is less clear. Thus, the purpose of the private right of action under the New York statute appears to be just as much about allowing individual consumers to address individual wrongs as it is about permitting an individual to obtain injunctive relief that benefits both himself and others.[16] *See Watts v. Jackson Hewitt [613] Tax Serv. Inc., 579 F. Supp. 2d 334, 346 (E.D.N.Y. 2008) [51] ("Section 349 is 'meant to empower consumers,' especially 'the disadvantaged' and to even the playing field of their disputes with better funded and superiorly situated fraudulent businesses.").

The same is true with respect to the New Jersey statute. The New Jersey Supreme Court, in discussing the purposes of the private right of action under the consumer-protection law, noted that the private right of action > created an efficient mechanism to: (1) compensate the victim for his or her actual [54] loss; (2) punish the wrongdoer through the award of treble damages; and (3) attract competent counsel to counteract the "community scourge" of fraud by providing an incentive for an attorney to take a case involving a minor loss to the individual.

[15] The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has rejected reading Gilmer essentially as an endorsement that class action waivers are not a ground for refusing to enforce an arbitration agreement when the plaintiff contends that the waiver interferes with his vindication of statutory rights. See Am Express II, 634 F.3d at 194-96. But this disfavored reading of Gilmer is not squarely implicated in this Court's suggestion that the attorney general's ability to seek relief that plaintiffs cannot is at least relevant in assessing whether New York law would permit plaintiffs to waive the right to seek that relief in the first instance.

[16] In that regard, the consumer-protection statutes at issue here are somewhat different from statutes like California's Private Attorneys General Act (PAGA), "the purpose of which 'is not to recover damages or restitution, but to create a means of "deputizing" citizens as private attorneys general to enforce the Labor Code.'" *Nelson v. AT&T Mobility, Inc., 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 92290, 2011 WL 3651153, at 3 (N.D. Cal. Aug. 18, 2011) [52] (quoting *Brown v. Ralphs Grocery Co., 197 Cal. App. 4th 489, 128 Cal. Rptr. 3d 854, 2011 WL 2685959, at 6 (Cal. Ct. App. 2011)). PAGA permits "representative" actions (which need not meet class action requirements), in which an individual sues on behalf of himself and other similarly situated employees seeking civil penalties against the employer for violations of the California Labor Code. *Urbino v. Orkin Servs. of Calif., Inc., __ F. Supp. 2d __, __, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114746, 2011 WL 4595249, at 3-4 (C.D. Cal. Oct. 5, 2011). "Under PAGA, of the civil penalties recovered by the aggrieved employees, 75 percent is allotted to the Labor and Workforce Development Agency ('LWDA') while 25 percent goes to the aggrieved employees." *2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114746, [WL] at 3. Accordingly, a waiver of the ability to proceed collectively under a statute like PAGA would seem more disruptive to the underlying public purpose of the statute than would a waiver of the right to obtain injunctive relief on behalf of others pursuant to a statute like New York General Business Law section 349(h) or the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act, whose underlying purpose is both to provide relief to aggrieved individual consumers, as well as to provide a mechanism to stop consumer fraud. [53] It bears noting that in light of Concepcion, a number of federal district courts in California have enforced arbitration agreements with class and representative action waivers even though those waivers would prevent an individual from asserting representative PAGA claims. *See Grabowski v. Robinson, 817 F. Supp. 2d 1159, 1180, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 105680, 2011 WL 4353998, at 19-20 (S.D. Cal. 2011); *Quevedo v. Macy's, Inc., 798 F. Supp. 2d 1122, 2011 WL 3135052, at 17 (C.D. Cal. 2011) ("[T]he Court concludes that Quevedo's PAGA claim is arbitrable, and that the arbitration agreement's provision barring him from bringing that claim on behalf of other employees is enforceable."). *But see Urbino, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114746, 2011 WL 4595249, at 11 ("Because the PAGA arbitration waiver in the Agreement is unconscionable, and the waiver taints the entirety of the Agreement with illegality, the Court deems the Agreement unenforceable.").

Weinberg, 801 A.2d at 291. The court said little about the need to allow an individual plaintiff to obtain an injunction in favor of a group of individuals in order to vindicate the private right of action provided in the statute. Thus, it is not clear that the remedial limitation in the parties' arbitration agreement would not amount to a lawful waiver of their right to seek injunctive relief on behalf of others.

D. Conclusion

In sum, although the arbitration agreement prohibits the plaintiffs from obtaining "general injunctive relief," it is not clear whether (1) the state consumer statutes would authorize an individual to obtain such relief in the absence of a class action, and (2) even if such relief were available under the statutes, whether it lawfully could be waived. "In the presence of this ambiguity, PacifiCare is dispositive. When there is an underlying legal ambiguity, . . . an arbitrator must decide the underlying legal question [55] in the first instance so that the federal policy in favor of arbitration is not frustrated." Kristian, 446 F.3d at 50. Accordingly, plaintiffs' motion does not raise a question of arbitrability, and the arbitrators must decide in the first instance whether plaintiffs are entitled to "general injunctive relief."

In any event, even if the issue posed a question of arbitrability for the Court, under these circumstances the Court would be hard-pressed to say that the plaintiffs' inability to obtain "general injunctive relief" on behalf of others would render the arbitral forum inadequate such that plaintiffs no longer "effectively may vindicate [their] statutory cause of action in the arbitral forum." Mitsubishi, 473 U.S. at 637. Plaintiffs have already [*614] received the relief they wish to seek on behalf of others (i.e. the lower price on Verizon's NUP), and they still may obtain actual damages, punitive damages, declaratory relief, and attorneys' fees in arbitration. Plaintiffs may make (but have not) an argument that given the small size of any individual monetary recovery in this case (approximately $97 in actual losses for plaintiff Schatz plus at most three times that amount in punitive [56] damages), the deterrent effect of the consumer protection statutes will be diminished significantly if plaintiffs are denied the ability to obtain injunctive relief on behalf of other customers. But any force that argument otherwise might have is substantially weakened in light of the uncertainty about whether an individual properly may obtain injunctive relief of this sort in the absence of a class action or class arbitration proceeding. Given this uncertainty, along with the other remedies available to plaintiffs, plaintiffs have not made a "substantial demonstration," Am Express I, 554 F.3d at 304, that the remedial limitation renders the arbitral forum inadequate such that the consumer protection statutes will fail "to serve both [their] remedial and deterrent function." Mitsubishi, 473 U.S. at 637; see DeGaetano v. Smith Barney, Inc., 983 F. Supp. 459, 466 (S.D.N.Y. 1997) (finding, even in light of the "unavailability of injunctive relief under the Smith Barney Arbitration Policy," that plaintiff "could still 'effectively . . . vindicate' her Title VII claims through arbitration, even though the arbitral forum might not 'afford [her] the full panoply of remedies otherwise available [57] in a court of law'" (alteration in original)).

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, plaintiffs' motion to compel arbitration [24] is DENIED to the extent it seeks a declaration that a clause of the arbitration agreement is invalid. To the extent it seeks an order compelling arbitration of the plaintiffs' statutory claims, it is DENIED as moot because the Court already has ordered the parties to proceed with arbitration. Antitrust & Trade Law > ... > Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade > Tying Arrangements > General Overview

HN1[] Price Fixing & Restraints of Trade, Tying Arrangements

In a definition that has become classic, the U.S. Supreme Court has defined a tying arrangement as an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier. A tying arrangement will violate 15 U.S.C.S. § 1 of the Sherman Act if the seller has appreciable economic power in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce in the tied market.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

HN2[] Federal Arbitration Act, Arbitration Agreements

Under Green Tree, when a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

HN3[] Federal Arbitration Act, Arbitration Agreements

Arbitration is simply a matter of contract between the parties. A party may not be compelled under the Federal Arbitration Act, 9 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., to submit to class arbitration unless there is a contractual basis for concluding that the party agreed to do so.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

HN7[] Arbitration, Federal Arbitration Act

Concepcion and Stolt-Nielsen, taken together, stand squarely for the principle that parties cannot be forced to arbitrate disputes in a class-action arbitration unless the parties agree to class action arbitration. Class arbitration, to the extent it is manufactured by state law rather than consensual, is inconsistent with the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), 9 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq. A party may not be compelled under the FAA to submit to class arbitration unless there is a contractual basis for concluding that the party agreed to do so. A court cannot order the parties to participate in class arbitration.

The U.S. Supreme Court has on numerous occasions held that proof of Congress' intent may also be discovered in the history or purpose of the statute in question.

What Stolt-Nielsen and Concepcion do not do is require that all class-action waivers be deemed per se enforceable.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > General Overview

HN10[] Special Proceedings, Class Actions

Class action lawsuits are suitable as a vehicle for vindicating statutory rights. U.S. Supreme Court precedent recognizes that the class action device is the only economically rational alternative when a large group of individuals or entities has suffered an alleged wrong, but the damages due to any single individual or entity are too small to justify bringing an individual action.

Civil Procedure > Special Proceedings > Class Actions > General Overview

HN11[] Special Proceedings, Class Actions

The policy at the very core of the class action mechanism is to overcome the problem that small recoveries do not provide the incentive for any individual to bring a solo action prosecuting his or her rights.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Private Actions > General Overview

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Civil Procedure > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > General Overview

HN12[] Regulated Practices, Private Actions

Arbitration is recognized as an effective vehicle for vindicating statutory rights, but only so long as the prospective litigant may effectively vindicate its statutory cause of action in the arbitral forum. Indeed, in dicta the Mitsubishi Court noted that should clauses in a contract operate as a prospective waiver of a party's right to pursue statutory remedies for antitrust violations, courts would have little hesitation in condemning the agreement as against public policy. While dicta, it is dicta based on a firm principle of antitrust law that an agreement which in practice acts as a waiver of future liability under the federal antitrust statutes is void as a matter of public policy. More than a half-century ago, the U.S. Supreme Court stated that in view of the public interest in vigilant enforcement of the antitrust laws through the instrumentality of the private treble-damage action, an agreement which confers even a partial immunity from civil liability for future violations of the antitrust laws is inconsistent with the public interest.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Scope

HN13[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

Because it is by now clear that statutory claims may be the subject of an arbitration agreement, an arbitration clause is enforceable unless Congress itself has evinced an intention to preclude a waiver of judicial remedies for the statutory rights at issue.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Scope

HN14[] Arbitration, Federal Arbitration Act

Arbitrators do have the power to fashion equitable relief.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Scope

HN15[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

The party resisting arbitration bears the burden of proving that the claims at issue are unsuitable for arbitration. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit has held that the party seeking to avoid arbitration bears the burden of establishing that Congress intended to preclude arbitration of the statutory claims at issue. Similarly, where a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Scope

HN16[] Arbitration, Federal Arbitration Act

Gilmer reaffirms the presumption in favor of enforcing agreements to arbitrate in the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), 9 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., even where those agreements cover statutory claims. This presumption is not without limits. Arbitration of statutory claims works because potential litigants have an adequate forum in which to resolve their statutory claims and because the broader social purposes behind the statute are adhered to. This supposition falls apart, however, if the terms of an arbitration agreement actually prevent an individual from effectively vindicating his or her statutory rights.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Scope

HN17[] Federal Arbitration Act, Arbitration Agreements

The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit does not read Gilmer as mandating enforcement of all mandatory agreements to arbitrate statutory claims; rather it reads Gilmer as requiring the enforcement of arbitration agreements that do not undermine the relevant statutory scheme.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

HN18[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

When a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs.

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Alternative Dispute Resolution > Arbitration > Arbitrability

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

Business & Corporate Compliance > ... > Arbitration > Federal Arbitration Act > Arbitration Agreements

HN19[] Arbitration, Arbitrability

When a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs. Since there is no indication in Stolt-Nielsen or Concepcion that the U.S. Supreme Court intended to overturn either Green Tree or Mitsubishi, both cases retain their binding authority.

Governments > Courts > Judicial Precedent

HN20[] Courts, Judicial Precedent

If U.S. Supreme Court precedent has direct application in a case, yet appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, the Court of Appeals should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to the Supreme Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.

Antitrust & Trade Law > Regulated Practices > Monopolies & Monopolization > General Overview

HN22[] Federal Arbitration Act, Arbitration Agreements

Each class action waiver in an arbitration agreement must be considered on its own merits, based on its own record, and governed with a healthy regard for the fact that the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA), 9 U.S.C.S. § 1 et seq., is a congressional declaration of a liberal federal policy favoring arbitration agreements.

[*206] POOLER, Circuit Judge:

We turn to this case for the third time, as the Supreme Court released its latest views on class arbitration waivers in AT&T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740, 179 L. Ed. 2d 742 (2011), just weeks after we issued our decision in In re American Express Merchants' Litigation, 634 F.3d 187 (2d Cir. 2011) ("Amex II"). Amex II returned to us from the Supreme Court, after defendants American Express Company and American Express Travel Related Services Co. (together, "Amex") sought review from the Supreme Court following our decision in In re American Express Merchants Litigation, 554 F.3d 300 (2d Cir. 2009) ("Amex I"). In Amex I, we considered the enforcement of a mandatory arbitration clause in a commercial [3] contract also containing a "class action waiver," that is, a provision which forbids the parties to the contract from pursuing anything other than individual claims in the arbitral forum. We found the class action waiver unenforceable, "because enforcement of the clause would effectively preclude any action seeking to vindicate the statutory rights asserted by the plaintiffs." Amex I, 554 F.3d at 304.

The Supreme Court granted Amex's petition for a writ for certiorari, then vacated and remanded for reconsideration in light of its decision in Stolt-Nielsen S.A. v. AnimalFeeds Int'l Corp., 130 S. Ct. 1758, 176 L. Ed. 2d 605 (2010). Finding our original analysis unaffected by Stolt-Nielsen, we again reversed the district court's decision and remanded for further proceedings. Amex II, 634 F.3d at 199-200. On April 11, 2011, we placed a hold on the mandate in Amex II in order for Amex to file a petition seeking a writ of certiorari. While the mandate was on hold, the Supreme Court issued its decision in Concepcion, 131 S. Ct. 1740, 179 L. Ed. 2d 742 (2011). The Concepcion Court held that the Federal Arbitration Act preempted a California law barring the enforcement of class action waivers in consumer contracts. Id. at 1750-51. [4] The parties submitted supplemental briefing discussing the impact, if any, of Concepcion on our previous decisions, and we find oral argument unnecessary. As discussed below, Concepcion does not alter our analysis, and we again reverse the district court's decision and remand for further proceedings.

[*207] BACKGROUND

Because the only issue before us is the narrow question of whether the class action waiver provision contained in the contract between the parties should be enforced, we provide but a brief recitation of the facts.

A. Procedural Posture.

The plaintiffs appealed from the March 20, 2006 judgment of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, which granted Amex's motion to compel arbitration pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA") and Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b). See In re Am. Express Merchs. Litig., No. 03 CV 9592, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, 2006 WL 662341 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 16, 2006) (Daniels, J.).

B. The Parties.

The amended complaint alleges that Amex "is the leading issuer of general purpose and corporate charge cards to consumers and businesses in the United States and throughout the world. It is also the leading provider of charge card services to merchants." The [5] named plaintiffs are: (1) California and New York corporations which operate businesses which have contracted with Amex and (2) the National Supermarkets` Association, Inc. ("NSA"), "a voluntary membership-based trade association that represents the interests of independently owned supermarkets."

The named plaintiffs seek to represent the following class:

> all merchants that have accepted American Express charge cards (including the American Express corporate card), and have thus been forced to agree to accept American Express credit and debit cards, during the longest period of time permitted by the applicable statute of limitations . . . throughout the United States. . . .

C. The Plaintiffs' Substantive Claims.

The plaintiffs' dispute with Amex rests upon the distinction between "charge cards" and "credit cards."[3] The district court explained the distinction:

> A charge card requires its holder to pay the full outstanding balance at the end of a standard billing cycle. A credit card, by contrast, allows the cardholder to pay a portion of the amount owing at the close of a billing cycle, subject to interest charges. In plain terms, the credit card is a means of financing purchases, the charge [6] card is a method of payment.

*In re Am. Express Merchs., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, 2006 WL 662341, at * 1, n. 6*.

According to the plaintiffs, Amex had until recent years centered its business on the issuance of corporate and personal charge cards to corporate clients and affluent consumers. The plaintiffs further assert that "[h]olders of charge cards are more affluent than credit cardholders, and a vastly higher percentage of charge cards than credit cards are held by businesses and used for business travel and other corporate purposes." In fact, the plaintiffs allege that Amex itself contends that "the average purchase on an American Express card is 17% higher than the average purchase made on a credit card." Thus, the holder of a charge card is likely to be "a higher class of customer" and, as such, is particularly attractive to merchants such as the plaintiffs.

---

[3] Plaintiffs bring claims pursuant to both the Sherman and Clayton Acts, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq., which bar certain anticompetitive conduct in trade.

[*208] As a result of this distinction, Amex has traditionally been able to charge high "merchant discount fees," which are the fees a card issuer withholds as a percentage of each purchase made with its card at the [7] merchant's establishment. These fees, the plaintiffs aver, "are at least 35% higher than competitive rates" applicable to mass-market credit cards such as Visa, MasterCard, and Discover. Over the last decade, the plaintiffs allege, Amex's "business in the markets for credit card issuance and credit card services has grown dramatically." By leveraging its market power in corporate and personal charge cards, however, plaintiffs allege that American Express was able to compel merchants to accept "its new revolving credit card product[s] at the same elevated discount rate, which vastly exceeded the rate for comparable Visa, MasterCard or Discover products."

According to the plaintiffs, the vehicle of this compulsion is the "Honor All Cards" provision contained in the Card Acceptance Agreement. Under the Agreement, a merchant does not contract to accept any one Amex product as a form of payment. Rather, the Agreement applies:

> to your acceptance of American Express(C) Cards . . . . American Express Card(s)... shall mean any card or other account access device issued by American Express Travel Related Services Company, Inc., or its subsidiaries or affiliates or its or their licensees bearing [8] the American Express name or an American Express trademark, service mark or logo.

The plaintiffs assert that, by means of the "Honor All Cards" provision, merchants are faced with the choice of paying supracompetitive merchant discount fees (i.e., fees above competitive levels) on Amex's new mass-market products or "inevitably los[ing] a significant portion of the sales they receive from businesses, travelers, affluent consumers, and others" who are the traditional users of Amex charge cards. This, the plaintiffs claim, amounts to an illegal "tying arrangement," in violation of Section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1.[4]

D. The Card Acceptance Agreement.

The basic contractual relationship between Amex and the plaintiffs was set forth in an affidavit of an Amex executive:

> American Express issues card products to its cardmembers, which cardmembers then use in making purchases from participating merchants. Participating merchants with annual charge volume expected to be less than $10 million agree that, by submitting charges for payment by American Express, their relationship will be governed by the "Terms and Conditions for American Express(C) Card Acceptance" ("the Card Acceptance Agreement").

The Card Acceptance Agreement is a standard form contract issued by Amex. It may be terminated by either party "at any time by sending written notice to the other party." Further, Amex reserves the right:

> [*209] to change this Agreement at any time. We will notify you of any change in writing at least ten (10) calendar days in advance. If the changes are unacceptable to you, you may terminate this Agreement as described in the section entitled "TERMINATING THIS AGREEMENT."

According to Amex, the Card [10] Acceptance Agreement has "expressly permitted amendments upon notice" for more than twenty-five years. The Card Acceptance Agreement also contains a choice of law provision designating New York law as governing and, as Amex states, there is no dispute that the agreement "has always" contained this provision.

[4] HN1[] In a definition that has become classic, the Supreme Court has defined a tying arrangement as "an agreement by a party to sell one product but only on the condition that the buyer also purchases a different (or tied) product, or at least agrees that he will not purchase that product from any other supplier." Northern Pac. Ry. Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-6, 78 S. Ct. 514, 2 L. Ed. 2d 545 (1958). A tying arrangement will violate Section 1 of the Sherman Act if "the seller has appreciable economic power in the tying product market and if the arrangement affects a substantial volume of commerce [9] in the tied market." Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., 504 U.S. 451, 462, 112 S. Ct. 2072, 119 L. Ed. 2d 265 (1992) (internal quotation marks omitted).

By contrast, it is only since 1999 that the Card Acceptance Agreement has contained a mandatory arbitration clause:

> For the purpose of this Agreement, Claim means any assertion of a right, dispute or controversy between you and us arising from or relating to this Agreement and/or the relationship resulting from this Agreement. Claim includes claims of every kind and nature including, but not limited to, initial claims, counterclaims, cross-claims and third-party claims and claims based upon contract, tort, intentional tort, statutes, regulations, common law and equity. We shall not elect to use arbitration under this arbitration provision for any individual Claim that you properly file and pursue in a small claims court of your state or municipality so long as the Claim is pending only in that court.
> Any Claim shall be resolved upon the election by you or us, by arbitration pursuant [11] to this arbitration provision and the code of procedure of the national arbitration organization to which the Claim is referred in effect at the time the Claim is filed. Claims shall be referred to the National Arbitration Forum (NAF), JAMS/Endispute (JAMS), or the American Arbitration Association (AAA), as selected by the party electing to use arbitration. If a selection by us of one of these organizations is unacceptable to you, you shall have the right within thirty (30) days after you receive notice of our election to select one of the other organizations listed to serve as arbitrator administrator.

At the heart of the instant appeal is the following provision contained in the Agreement:

> IF [12] ARBITRATION IS CHOSEN BY ANY PARTY WITH RESPECT TO A CLAIM, NEITHER YOU NOR WE WILL HAVE THE RIGHT TO LITIGATE THAT CLAIM IN COURT OR HAVE A JURY TRIAL ON THAT CLAIM. . . . FURTHER, YOU WILL NOT HAVE THE RIGHT TO PARTICIPATE IN A REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY OR AS A MEMBER OF ANY CLASS OF CLAIMANTS PERTAINING TO ANY CLAIM SUBJECT TO ARBITRATION. THE ARBITRATOR'S DECISION WILL BE FINAL AND BINDING. NOTE THAT OTHER RIGHTS THAT YOU WOULD HAVE IF YOU WENT TO COURT MAY ALSO NOT BE AVAILABLE IN ARBITRATION.
> There shall be no right or authority for any Claims to be arbitrated on a class action basis or on any basis involving Claims brought in a purported representative capacity on behalf of the general public, other establishments which accept the Card (Service Establishments), or other persons or entities similarly situated. Furthermore, Claims brought by or against a Service Establishment may not be joined or consolidated in the arbitration with Claims brought by or against any other Service Establishment(s), [*210] unless otherwise agreed to in writing by all parties.

(emphasis in the original). The Card Acceptance Agreement thus not only precludes a merchant from bringing a class action lawsuit, it [13] also precludes the signatory from having any claim arbitrated on anything other than an individual basis.

E. The District Court's Decision.

Amex moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the terms of the Card Acceptance Agreement. In its March 16, 2006 opinion, the district court granted Amex's motion, first holding that the arbitration clause in the Agreement was "a paradigmatically broad clause" which was certainly applicable to the dispute between the parties. *In re Am. Express Merchs. Litig., 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, 2006 WL 662341, at 4. The district court also held that "[t]he enforceability of the collective action waivers is a claim for the arbitrator to resolve. Issues relating to the enforceability of the contract and its specific provisions are for the arbitrator, once arbitrability is established." *2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, [WL] at 6. Thus, the district court concluded that all of the plaintiffs' substantive antitrust claims, as well the question of whether or not the class action waivers were enforceable, were subject to arbitration. Having so decided, the district court dismissed plaintiffs' cases against Amex. *2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, [WL] at 10.

F. Our Original Decision, Amex I.

The plaintiffs filed a timely appeal. We first decided that the issue [14] of the class action waiver's enforceability was a matter for the court, not the arbitrator. Amex I, 554 F.3d at 310. Neither party takes issue with that holding, which we find survives Stolt-Nielsen and Concepion.

Turning to the question of whether the class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement was enforceable, we found that Green Tree Financial Corp.-Alabama v. Randolph, 531 U.S. 79, 121 S. Ct. 513, 148 L. Ed. 2d 373 (2000), controlled our analysis:

> HN2[] to the extent that [Green Tree] holds that when "a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs." 531 U.S. at 92, 121 S. Ct. 513. We find that the district court erred in ruling that the plaintiffs had failed to bear this burden because they had "ignore[d] the statutory protections provided by the Clayton Act." *In re American Express Merchants Litigation, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 11742, 2006 WL 662341, at 5. On the contrary, the record abundantly supports the plaintiffs' argument that they would incur prohibitive costs if compelled to arbitrate under the class action waiver. The Card Acceptance Agreement therefore entails more than a speculative [15] risk that enforcement of the ban will deprive them of substantive rights under the federal antitrust statutes.

Amex I, 554 F.3d at 315-16. Based in part on plaintiffs' submission of an affidavit from an economist detailing the fiscal impracticality of pursuing individual claims, we concluded that:

> [since] Amex has brought no serious challenge to the plaintiffs' demonstration that their claims cannot reasonably be pursued as individual actions, whether in federal court or in arbitration, we find ourselves in agreement with the plaintiffs' contention that enforcement of the class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement "flatly ensures that no small merchant may challenge American Express's tying arrangements under the federal antitrust laws." The effective negation of a private suit under the antitrust laws is troubling because such "private suits provide a significant supplement [*211] to the limited resources available to the Department of Justice for enforcing the antitrust laws and deterring violations." Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 344, 99 S.Ct. 2326, 60 L.Ed.2d 931 (1979).

Id. at 319. Thus, we held that:

> the class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement cannot be [16] enforced in this case because to do so would grant Amex de facto immunity from antitrust liability by removing the plaintiffs' only reasonably feasible means of recovery. As already set forth, Section 2 of the [Federal Arbitration Act], 9 U.S.C. § 2, provides that an agreement to arbitrate "shall be valid, irrevocable, and enforceable, save upon such grounds as exist at law or in equity for the revocation of any contract." Given that we believe that a valid ground exists for the revocation of the class action waiver, it cannot be enforced under the FAA.

Id. at 320. Amex timely filed a petition for a writ of certiorari. Am. Express Co. v. Italian Colors Rest., 130 S. Ct. 2401, 176 L. Ed. 2d 920 (2010). The Supreme Court granted Amex's petition, vacated our original decision, and remanded for further consideration in light of its holding in Stolt-Nielsen.

G. The Stolt-Nielsen Decision.

In Stolt-Nielsen, petitioners were shipping companies. See 130 S. Ct. at 1764. The charter party — a maritime contract governing the relationship between the parties — provided, in relevant part > Arbitration. Any dispute arising from the making, performance or termination of this Charter Party shall be settled in New York, Owner [17] and Charterer each appointing an arbitrator, who shall be a merchant, > broker or individual experienced in the shipping business; the two thus chosen, if they cannot agree, shall nominate a third arbitrator who shall be an Admiralty lawyer. Such arbitration shall be conducted in conformity with the provisions and procedure of the United States Arbitration Act [i.e., the FAA], and a judgment of the Court shall be entered upon any award made by said arbitrator.

Id. at 1765. Respondent AnimalFeeds, along with other charterers, sued Stolt-Nielsen, alleging price fixing, and eventually served a demand for class arbitration. Id. The parties agreed to have an arbitration panel decide the threshold issue of whether the charter party permitted class arbitration, and stipulated before the panel that the arbitration clause was silent on the issue of class arbitration. Id. at 1765-66. The panel concluded that the expert testimony offered did not demonstrate an "inten[t] to preclude class arbitration." Id. (alteration in original). After finding that the issue was controlled by the Supreme Court's decision in Green Tree Fin. Corp. v. Bazzle, 539 U.S. 444, 123 S. Ct. 2402, 156 L. Ed. 2d 414, (2003), the panel concluded Bazzle and policy [18] considerations dictated finding the clause permitted class arbitration. Id.

The Supreme Court found that the arbitration panel "imposed its own policy choice," rather than "identifying and applying a rule of decision derived from the FAA or either maritime or New York law," and "thus exceeded its powers." 130 S. Ct. at 1770. Tackling the issue itself, the Court found the FAA controlling, id. at 1773, and reaffirmed that HN3[] "arbitration is simply a matter of contract between the parties." Id. at 1774 (alterations omitted). The Court concluded that "a party may not be compelled under the FAA to submit to class arbitration unless there is a contractual basis for concluding that the party agreed to do so." Id. at 1775 (emphasis in the original).

[*212] H. Our Decision in Amex II.

On remand from the Supreme Court, we found Stolt-Nielsen did not require us to depart from our original analysis. The key issue, we concluded, was whether the mandatory class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement is enforceable even if the plaintiffs are able to demonstrate that the practical effect of enforcement of the waiver would be to preclude their bringing Sherman Act claims against Amex. In re American Express Merchants' Litigation, 634 F.3d 187, 196 (2d Cir. 2011). [19] We concluded enforcement of the class action waiver would indeed bar plaintiffs from pursuing their statutory claims because the "record evidence before us establishe[d], as a matter of law, that the cost of plaintiffs' individually arbitrating their dispute with Amex would be prohibitive, effectively depriving plaintiffs of the statutory protections of the antitrust laws." Id. at 197-98.

We relied on detailed testimony from Gary L. French, Ph.D., an economist associated with Nathan Associates Inc., a financial consulting firm retained by the plaintiffs. Dr. French submitted a detailed affidavit to the district court, in which he opined, inter alia, that "[i]n my experience, even a relatively small economic antitrust study will cost at least several hundred thousand dollars, while a larger study can easily exceed $1 million . . . . after reviewing the complaint and doing some preliminary research in this case, it is my opinion that . . . the cost for this case will fall in the middle of the range . . . ." (Joint Appendix at p. 362-63, ¶ 4). Dr. French then opined that it was not economically rational to pursue an individual action against Amex in light of these substantial expert witness [20] costs. (Joint Appendix at p. 365, ¶10-11). Amex II, 634 F.3d at 198. We found that "Dr. French's affidavit demonstrates that the only economically feasible means for enforcing their statutory rights is via a class action," and remanded the case to the district court. Id.

ANALYSIS

Shortly after we issued our opinion in Amex II, the Supreme Court handed down its opinion in Concepcion, 131 S.Ct. at 1740. In Concepcion, the Supreme Court held that the FAA preempted California common law deeming most class-action arbitration waivers in consumer contracts unconscionable. Id. at 1746. Amex argues that Concepcion applies a fortiori here, requiring reversal of our holding in Amex II. It is tempting to give both Concepcion and Stolt-Nielsen such a facile reading, and find that the cases render class action arbitration waivers per se enforceable. But a careful reading of the cases demonstrates that neither one addresses the issue presented here: whether a class-action arbitration waiver clause is enforceable even if the plaintiffs are able to demonstrate that the practical effect of enforcement would be to preclude their ability to vindicate their federal statutory rights.

The specific preemption [21] question addressed by the Supreme Court in Concepcion was "whether the FAA prohibits States from conditioning the enforceability of certain arbitration agreements on the availability of classwide arbitration procedures." Id. at 1744. Under California's common law, class action waivers contained in arbitration clauses were regularly found unconscionable, especially in consumer contracts. Id. at 1746. The Supreme Court began its analysis by reaffirming the HN4[] "liberal federal policy favoring arbitration agreements, notwithstanding any state substantive or procedural policies to the contrary." Id. at 1749 (internal quotation marks). By requiring [*213] the "availability of classwide arbitration," the Court held, the California rule "interfere[d] with fundamental attributes of arbitration and thus create[d] a scheme inconsistent with the FAA." Id. at 1748. In response to the dissent's discussion of the benefits of class-arbitration as a means of addressing multiple small claims, the majority concluded that HN5[] "[s]tates cannot require a procedure that is inconsistent with the FAA, even if it is desirable for unrelated reasons." Id. at 1753.

HN6[] Concepcion plainly offers a path for analyzing whether a state [22] contract law is preempted by the FAA. Here, however, our holding rests squarely on "a vindication of statutory rights analysis, which is part of the federal substantive law of arbitrability." Amex I, 554 F.3d at 320; see also Kristian v. Comcast Corp., 446 F.3d 25, 47-48 (1st Cir. 2006) (severing as unenforceable provision of arbitration agreement limiting availability of treble damages under antitrust statute); Hadnot v. Bay, Ltd., 344 F.3d 474, 478 n.14 (5th Cir. 2003) (severing restriction on available remedies from arbitration agreement after finding that "ban on punitive and exemplary damages is unenforceable in a Title VII case"); Paladino v. Avnet Computer Techs., Inc., 134 F.3d 1054, 1062 (11th Cir. 1998) (holding that "[w]hen an arbitration clause has provisions that defeat the remedial purpose of the statute . . . the arbitration clause is not enforceable" and language insulating employer from damages and equitable relief rendered clause unenforceable).

HN7[] Concepcion and Stolt-Nielsen, taken together, stand squarely for the principle that parties cannot be forced to arbitrate disputes in a class-action arbitration unless the parties agree to class action arbitration. Concepcion, 131 S.Ct. at 1750-51 [23] ("class arbitration, to the extent it is manufactured by [state law] rather than consensual, is inconsistent with the FAA")[5]; Stolt-Nielsen, 130 S.Ct. at 1775 ("a party may not be compelled under the FAA to submit to class arbitration unless there is a contractual basis for concluding that the party agreed to do so."). We plainly acknowledged in Amex II that we could not, and thus were not, ordering the parties to participate in class arbitration. 634 F.3d at 200 ("Stolt-Nielsen plainly precludes us from ordering class-wide arbitration.").

[*214] HN9[] What Stolt-Nielsen and Concepcion do not do is require that all class-action waivers be deemed per se enforceable. That leaves open the question presented on this appeal: whether a mandatory class action

[5] In Compucredit Corp. v. Greenwood, 132 S.Ct. 665, 181 L. Ed. 2d 586, 2012 WL 43517 (2012), the Supreme Court addressed whether the Credit Repair Organizations Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1679, et seq., precluded enforcement of an arbitration agreement. The Court concluded that because the Act is silent on whether claims brought under the Act can be arbitrated, the FAA requires that the arbitration agreement be enforced according to its terms. *181 L. Ed. 2d 586, Id. at 4 - 6*. To support its analysis, the Court cited to a number of statutes that "restrict[] the use of arbitration. Id. Plaintiffs here do not allege that the Sherman Act expressly precludes arbitration or that it [24] expressly provides a right to bring collective or class actions, but instead argue that enforcement of the class arbitration waiver would effectively deprive them of their ability to vindicate their statutory rights.

As aptly noted by Justice Sotomayor's concurrence in Compucredit, the majority's opinion does not "hold that Congress must speak so explicitly in order to convey its intent to preclude arbitration of statutory claims." *181 L. Ed. 2d 586, Id. at 8. Indeed, HN8[] the Supreme Court has "on numerous occasions . . . held that proof of Congress' intent may also be discovered in the history or purpose of the statute in question." *181 L. Ed. 2d 586, Id. at 8. Although the Sherman Act does not provide plaintiffs with an express right to bring their claims as a class in court, forcing plaintiffs to bring their claims individually here would make it impossible to enforce their rights under the Sherman Act and thus conflict with congressional purposes manifested in the provision of a private right of action in the statute.

[25] waiver clause is enforceable even if the plaintiffs are able to demonstrate that the practical effect of enforcement would be to preclude their ability to bring federal antitrust claims. While we cannot rely on Concepcion or Stolt-Nielsen to answer the question before us, we continue to find useful guidance in other Supreme Court decisions addressing the issue of vindicating federal statutory rights via arbitration.

We begin our analysis with the well-settled rule that HN10[] class action lawsuits are suitable as a vehicle for vindicating statutory rights. Supreme Court precedent recognizes that the class action device is the only economically rational alternative when a large group of individuals or entities has suffered an alleged wrong, but the damages due to any single individual or entity are too small to justify bringing an individual action. The Court made the point forcefully more than thirty years ago in the context of an antitrust action:

> A critical fact in this litigation is that petitioner's individual stake in the damages award he seeks is only $70. No competent attorney would undertake this complex antitrust action to recover so inconsequential an amount. Economic reality dictates [26] that petitioner's suit proceed as a class action or not at all.

Eisen v. Carlisle & Jacquelin, 417 U.S. 156, 161, 94 S. Ct. 2140, 40 L. Ed. 2d 732 (1974). As the Court later opinedHN11[] , "'[t]he policy at the very core of the class action mechanism is to overcome the problem that small recoveries do not provide the incentive for any individual to bring a solo action prosecuting his or her rights.'" Amchem Prods., Inc. v. Windsor, 521 U.S. 591, 617, 117 S. Ct. 2231, 138 L. Ed. 2d 689 (1997) (quoting Mace v. Van Ru Credit Corp., 109 F.3d 338, 344 (7th Cir. 1997)); see also Deposit Guar. Nat'l Bank v. Roper, 445 U.S. 326, 338, 100 S. Ct. 1166, 63 L. Ed. 2d 427 (1980) ("[A class action] may motivate [plaintiffs] to bring cases that for economic reasons might not be brought otherwise . . . [,thereby] vindicating the rights of individuals who otherwise might not consider it worth the candle to embark on litigation in which the optimum result might be more than consumed by the cost.") (footnote omitted); Carnegie v. Household Int'l, Inc., 376 F.3d 656, 661 (7th Cir. 2004) ("[T]he realistic alternative to a class action is not 17 million individual suits, but zero individual suits, as only a lunatic or a fanatic sues for $30." (emphasis omitted)).

HN12[] Arbitration is also recognized as an effective vehicle [27] for vindicating statutory rights, but only "so long as the prospective litigant may effectively vindicate its statutory cause of action in the arbitral forum." Mitsubishi Motors Corp. v. Soler Chrysler-Plymouth, Inc., 473 U.S. 614, 632, 105 S. Ct. 3346, 87 L. Ed. 2d 444 (1985) (emphasis added). Indeed, in dicta the Mitsubishi Court noted that should clauses in a contract operate "as a prospective waiver of a party's right to pursue statutory remedies for antitrust violations, we would have little hesitation in condemning the agreement as against public policy." Id. at 637, n.19. As we observed in Amex II:

> While dicta, it is dicta based on a firm principle of antitrust law that an agreement which in practice acts as a waiver of future liability under the federal antitrust statutes is void as a matter of public policy. More than a half-century ago, the Supreme Court stated that "in view of the public interest in vigilant enforcement of the antitrust laws through the instrumentality of the [*215] private treble-damage action," an agreement which confers even "a partial immunity from civil liability for future violations" of the antitrust laws is inconsistent with the public interest. Lawlor v. Nat'l Screen Serv. Corp., 349 U.S. 322, 329, 75 S. Ct. 865, 99 L. Ed. 1122 (1955); [28] see also *Minnesota Mining and Mfg. Co. v. Graham-Field, Inc., No. 96 cv 3839, 1997 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 4457, 1997 WL 166497, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 9, 1997) ("GFI could not have waived [its antitrust] claim in the releases because a prospective waiver of an antitrust claim violates public policy.").

634 F.3d at 197.

Applying its rule regarding the arbitrability of federal statutory claims from Mitsubishi, in Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20, 111 S. Ct. 1647, 114 L. Ed. 2d 26 (1991), the Supreme Court permitted the arbitration, rather than litigation, of a plaintiff's Age Discrimination in Employment Act claim. Id. at 28 (quoting Mitsubishi Motors, 473 U.S. at 637). In Gilmer, the Court concluded that the plaintiff in that case could effectively vindicate his asserted rights in the arbitral forum. The plaintiff, a manager at a brokerage firm, asserted that he had been terminated by the firm in violation of the ADEA. Id. at 23. After the plaintiff filed suit in federal district court, the defendant firm moved to compel arbitration pursuant to a mandatory arbitration provision contained in the rule of the New York Stock Exchange ("NYSE"), to which the plaintiff had agreed to be bound when he became a registered securities representative. [29] Id. at 23-24. The Gilmer Court held that HN13[] because "[i]t is by now clear that statutory claims may be the subject of an arbitration agreement," the arbitration clause was enforceable "unless Congress itself has evinced an intention to preclude a waiver of judicial remedies for the statutory rights at issue." Id. at 26 (quoting Mitsubishi, 473 U.S. at 628).

The Court rejected plaintiff's contention that "arbitration procedures cannot further the purposes of the ADEA because they do not provide for broad equitable relief and class actions." Id. at 32. Rather, the Court found that:

> HN14[] arbitrators do have the power to fashion equitable relief. Indeed, the NYSE rules applicable here do not restrict the types of relief an arbitrator may award, but merely refer to "damages and/or other relief." The NYSE rules also provide for collective proceedings. But even if the arbitration could not go forward as a class action or class relief could not be granted by the arbitrator, the fact that the ADEA provides for the possibility of bringing a collective action does not mean that individual attempts at conciliation were intended to be barred.

Id. (citations, internal quotation marks, and brackets omitted).[6]

Gilmer's conclusion that where the plaintiff's statutory rights could effectively be vindicated through arbitration does not affect the case before us, because here plaintiffs have demonstrated that their statutory rights cannot be vindicated [*216] through individual arbitrations. Nearly a decade after Gilmer, in Green Tree Financial Corp.-Alabama v. Randolph, the Supreme Court acknowledged in dicta "that the existence of large arbitration costs could preclude a litigant . . . from effectively vindicating her federal statutory rights in the arbitral forum." 531 U.S. 79, 90, 121 S. Ct. 513, 148 L. Ed. 2d 373 (2000). Among the costs [31] at issue were "payment of filing fees, arbitrators' costs, and other arbitration expenses." Id. at 84. In the end, the Green Tree Court found plaintiff failed to submit sufficient evidence to demonstrate the costs of arbitration would effectively prohibit her from vindicating her statutory rights, dooming her attempt to have the arbitration clause declared unenforceable:

> It would also conflict with our prior holdings that HN15[] the party resisting arbitration bears the burden of proving that the claims at issue are unsuitable for arbitration. We have held that the party seeking to avoid arbitration bears the burden of establishing that Congress intended to preclude arbitration of the statutory claims at issue. Similarly, we believe that where, as here, a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs. Randolph did not meet that burden. How detailed the showing of prohibitive expense must be before the party seeking arbitration must come forward with contrary evidence is a matter we need not discuss; for in this case neither during discovery nor [32] when the case was presented on the merits was there any timely showing at all on the point.

Id. at 91-92.

As the Tenth Circuit explained:

> Thus, HN16[] Gilmer reaffirmed the Arbitration Act's presumption in favor of enforcing agreements to arbitrate-even where those agreements cover statutory claims. While we recognize this presumption, we conclude that it is not without limits. As Gilmer emphasized, arbitration of statutory claims works because potential litigants have an adequate forum in which to resolve their statutory claims and because the broader social purposes behind the statute are adhered to. This supposition[] falls apart, however, if the terms of an arbitration agreement actually prevent an individual from effectively vindicating his or her statutory rights.

[6] The [30] Amex plaintiffs do not proffer the argument rejected in Gilmer — namely, that the class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement is enforceable because the relevant statute allows class actions. "Rather, the conundrum presented by the instant appeal is more nuanced: whether the mandatory class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement is enforceable even if the plaintiffs are able to demonstrate that the practical effect of enforcement of the waiver would be to preclude their bringing Sherman Act claims against Amex in either an individual or collective capacity." Amex II, 634 F.3d at 196.

Shankle v. B-G Maint. Mgmt. of Colo., Inc., 163 F.3d 1230, 1234 (10th Cir. 1990) (citations omitted); see also Paladino v. Avnet Computer Techs., Inc., 134 F.3d 1054, 1060 (11th Cir. 1998) (holding that arbitration agreement which proscribed award of Title VII damages was unenforceable because it was fundamentally at odds with the purposes of Title VII); Cole v. Burns Int'l Sec. Servs.,105 F.3d 1465, 1468, 323 U.S. App. D.C. 133 (D.C. Cir. 1997) (HN17[] "We [33] do not read Gilmer as mandating enforcement of all mandatory agreements to arbitrate statutory claims; rather we read Gilmer as requiring the enforcement of arbitration agreements that do not undermine the relevant statutory scheme.")

Neither Stolt-Nielsen nor Concepcion overrules Mitsubishi, and neither makes mention of Green Tree. We continue to find Green Tree "controlling here to the extent that it holds that HN18[] when 'a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs.'" Amex II, 634 F.3d at 197 (quoting Green Tree, 531 U.S. at 92). Other Circuits permit [*217] plaintiffs to challenge class-action waivers on the grounds that prosecuting such claims on an individual basis would be a cost prohibitive method of enforcing a statutory right. See, e.g., In re Cotton Yarn Antitrust Litig., 505 F.3d 274, 285 (4th Cir. 2007) ("[I]f a party could demonstrate that the prohibition on class actions likely would make arbitration prohibitively expensive, such a showing could invalidate an agreement.") (citation omitted); Livingston v. Assocs. Fin., Inc., 339 F.3d 553, 557 (7th Cir. 2003) [34] ("In the present case, the [plaintiffs] have not offered any specific evidence of arbitration costs that they may face in this litigation, prohibitive or otherwise, and have failed to provide any evidence of their inability to pay such costs . . . ."); Adkins v. Labor Ready, Inc., 303 F.3d 496, 503 (4th Cir. 2002) ("[Lead plaintiff] makes no showing of the specific financial status of any of the plaintiffs at the time this action was brought. He provides no basis for a serious estimation of how much money is at stake for each individual plaintiff."). In each of these cases, plaintiffs' attempts to avoid the waiver clause failed because plaintiffs were unable to demonstrate the class-action waivers barred them from vindicating their statutory rights. Their failures speak to the quality of the evidence presented, not the viability of the legal theory. The fact that plaintiffs so often fail in their attempts to overturn such waivers demonstrates that the evidentiary record necessary to avoid a class-action arbitration waiver is not easily assembled, and that the courts are capable of the scrutiny such arguments require.

Thus, we continue to find Green Tree "controlling here to the extent [35] that it holds that HN19[] when 'a party seeks to invalidate an arbitration agreement on the ground that arbitration would be prohibitively expensive, that party bears the burden of showing the likelihood of incurring such costs.'" Amex I, 554 F.3d at 315 (quoting Green Tree, 531 U.S. at 92). Since there is no indication in Stolt-Nielsen or Concepcion that the Supreme Court intended to overturn either Green Tree or Mitsubishi, both cases retain their binding authority. Rodriguez de Quijas v. Shearson/Am. Express, Inc., 490 U.S. 477, 484, 109 S. Ct. 1917, 104 L. Ed. 2d 526 (1989) (HN20[] "If a precedent of this Court has direct application in a case, yet appears to rest on reasons rejected in some other line of decisions, the Court of Appeals should follow the case which directly controls, leaving to this Court the prerogative of overruling its own decisions.").

The evidence presented by plaintiffs here establishes, as a matter of law, that the cost of plaintiffs' individually arbitrating their dispute with Amex would be prohibitive, effectively depriving plaintiffs of the statutory protections of the antitrust laws. Dr. French stated that the purpose of his affidavit was "to provide an expert opinion concerning the likely costs and [36] complexity of an expert economic study concerning the liability and damages" relating to this action, and to "provide my opinion as to whether it would be economically rational for such a merchant to pursue recovery of damages given the likely out-of-pocket costs of the arbitration or litigation proceeding." (Joint Appendix, at p. 362, ¶ 4)

Dr. French continued:

> In summary, the cost of [Nathan Associates'] expert assistance in individual plaintiff antitrust cases has ranged from about $300 thousand to more than $2 million. However, after reviewing the complaint and doing some preliminary research in this case, it is my opinion that . . . the cost for this case will fall in the middle of the range of [Nathan Associates'] experience.

[*218] (Joint Appendix at p. 362-63, ¶ 4) Dr. French then considered the economic rationality of bringing an individual action against Amex in light of these substantial expert witness costs:

> The median volume merchant, with half of the named plaintiffs having more and half having less American Express charge volume, and having reported $230,343 American Express Card volume in 2003, might expect four-year damages of $1,751, or $5,252 when trebled.... The largest volume [37] named plaintiff merchant, with reported American Express Card volume of $1,690,749 in 2003, might expect four-year damages of $12,850, or $38,549 when trebled.
> In my opinion as a professional economist ... it would not be worthwhile for an individual plaintiff ... to pursue individual arbitration or litigation where the out-of-pocket costs, just for the expert economic study and services, would be at least several hundred thousand dollars, and might exceed $1 million.

(Joint Appendix at p. 365, ¶ 10-11)

Dr. French's affidavit demonstrates that the only economically feasible means for plaintiffs enforcing their statutory rights is via a class action. As discussed in our earlier opinion, the district court did not directly address Dr. French's affidavit, focusing instead on the damages provision of the Clayton Act, 15 U.S.C. § 15(a). See Amex I, 554 F.3d at 317. We found that while the Clayton Act does provide for treble awards along with the recovery of attorneys' fees and expenses, that was unlikely to assist plaintiffs where, as here, "the trebling of a small individual damages award is not going to pay for the expert fees Dr. French has estimated will be necessary to make an individual [38] plaintiff's case." Id. We also found the Clayton Act's fee-shifting provisions inadequate to alleviate our concerns given the low expert witness reimbursement rate. Id. at 318. "Even with respect to reasonable attorney's fees, which are shifted under Section 4 of the Clayton Act, the plaintiffs must include the risk of losing, and thereby not recovering any fees, in their evaluation of their suit's potential costs." Id.

We again find "Amex has brought no serious challenge to the plaintiffs' demonstration that their claims cannot reasonably be pursued as individual actions, whether in federal court or in arbitration." Amex I, 554 F.3d at 319. The "enforcement of the class action waiver in the Card Acceptance Agreement 'flatly ensures that no small merchant may challenge American Express[s tying arrangements under the federal antitrust laws.'" Id. Eradicating the private enforcement component from our antitrust law scheme cannot be what Congress intended when it included strong private enforcement mechanisms and incentives in the antitrust statutes. See Reiter v. Sonotone Corp., 442 U.S. 330, 344, 99 S. Ct. 2326, 60 L. Ed. 2d 931 (1979) (HN21[] "[P]rivate suits provide a significant supplement to the limited resources available [39] to the Department of Justice for enforcing the antitrust laws and deterring violations."); see also Dando B. Cellini, An Overview of Antitrust Class Actions, 49 Antitrust L.J. 1501, 1506 (1980) (discussing private, class action antitrust lawsuits and observing that "it is obvious from the experience over the last fifteen years since the 1966 amendments to Rule 23 were adopted that linking an antitrust claim with a class action allegation can be devastatingly effective.").

Thus, as the class action waiver in this case precludes plaintiffs from enforcing their statutory rights, we find the arbitration provision unenforceable. We again emphasize our holding comes with caveats. See Amex I, 554 F.3d at 320 ("We emphasize two important limitations upon our [*219] holding.") Our decision in no way relies upon the status of plaintiffs as "small" merchants. We rely instead on the need for plaintiffs to have the opportunity to vindicate their statutory rights. See, e.g., *Raniere v. Citigroup, Inc., No. 11 Civ. 2448, 827 F. Supp. 2d 294, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 135393, 2011 WL 5881926, at 13 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 22, 2011) ("even if AT & T is read broadly to acquiesce to the enforcement of an arbitral agreement that as a practical matter would prevent the vindication [40] of state rights in the name of furthering the strong federal policy favoring arbitration, that would not alter the validity of the federal statutory rights analysis articulated in Mitsubishi, Green Tree [and] American Express"); *Chen-Oster v. Goldman, Sachs & Co., No. 10 CIV 6950, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 73200, 2011 WL 2671813, at 2-5 (S.D.N.Y. July 7, 2011) (declining to apply Concepcion where the question before the court involved the plaintiff's ability to vindicate a federal statutory right); Sutherland v. Ernst & Young, LLP, 768 F. Supp. 2d 547, 550-54 (S.D.N.Y. 2011)(finding Amex I "retains its persuasive force" following Stolt-Nielsen).

We do not hold today that class action waivers in arbitration agreements are per se unenforceable, or even that they are per se unenforceable in the context of antitrust actions. Rather, as demonstrated by the different outcomes in our sister Circuits, we hold that HN22[] each waiver must be considered on its own merits, based on its own record, and governed with a healthy regard for the fact that the FAA "is a congressional declaration of a liberal federal policy favoring arbitration agreements." Moses H. Cone Mem'l Hosp., 460 U.S. at 24.

Our earlier opinion refrained from ordering [41] the parties to submit to class arbitration, instead permitting Amex the choice between arbitration and litigation. Amex I, 554 F.3d at 321. HN23[] Stolt-Nielsen plainly precludes any court from compelling the parties to submit to class-wide arbitration where the arbitration clause is silent as to class-wide arbitration. 130 S.Ct. at 1775 (HN24[] a party does not agree "to submit to class arbitration unless there is a contractual basis for concluding that a party agreed to do so").

Which leads to the issue of how to proceed from here. As detailed above, we are persuaded by the record before us that if plaintiffs cannot pursue their allegations of antitrust law violations as a class, it is financially impossible for the plaintiffs to seek to vindicate their federal statutory rights. Since the plaintiffs cannot pursue these claims as class arbitration, either they can pursue them as judicial class action or not at all. If they are not permitted to proceed in a judicial class action, then, they will have been effectively deprived of the protection of the federal antitrust-law. The defendant will thus have immunized itself against all such antitrust liability by the expedient of including in its contracts [42] of adhesion an arbitration clause that does not permit class arbitration, irrespective of whether or not the provision explicitly prohibits class arbitration.

Therefore, in light of the fact that the arbitration provision at issue here does not allow for class arbitration, under Stolt-Nielsen and by its terms, if the provision were enforced it would strip the plaintiffs of rights accorded them by statute. We conclude that this arbitration clause is unenforceable. We remand to the district court with the instruction to deny the defendant's motion to compel arbitration.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons given above, the decision of the district court is reversed. We [*220] remand to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

HN1[] Civil Procedure, Discovery & Disclosure

Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(g)(1) requires an attorney of record to sign every discovery request, response or objection. By signing, an attorney certifies that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief formed after a reasonable inquiry that a discovery request, response or objection is: (i) consistent with these rules and warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law, or for establishing new law; (ii) not interposed for any improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary delay, or needlessly increase the cost of litigation; and (iii) neither unreasonable nor unduly burdensome or expensive, considering the needs of the case, prior discovery in the case, the amount in controversy, and the importance of the issues at stake in the action. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(g)(1)(B). The comments to subsection (g)(1) clarify that Rule 26(g) broadly imposes an affirmative duty to engage in pretrial discovery in a responsible manner that is consistent with the spirit and purposes of Rules 26 through 37. This broad duty is satisfied when an attorney makes a reasonable inquiry into the factual basis of his response, request, or objection. Specifically, the attorney's investigation and conclusions drawn therefrom must be reasonable under the circumstances.

An individual's discovery conduct should be found substantially justified under Rule 37 if it is a response to a genuine dispute, or if reasonable people could differ as to the appropriateness of the contested action. A discovery mistake is harmless if it is honest, and is coupled with the other party having sufficient knowledge that the material has not been produced. Exclusion, however, is not mandatory. Rule 37(c)(1) provides that in addition to or instead of excluding the late-produced information, the court may order a party to pay the reasonable expenses caused by its failure; inform the jury of the party's failure; or impose other appropriate sanctions, including those listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(iv).

[*1337] ORDER

The case is before the Court on Plaintiffs' motion to reopen discovery and for a new case schedule as to Defendants Delta Air Lines and AirTran Holdings, Inc., and for sanctions against Delta [294]. [1]

I. The Gist of the Case

On December 5, 2008, Delta and AirTran started charging passengers $15 to [*1338] check their first bag. Within six months lawsuits were filed across the country asserting that the two airlines had conspired to impose the first-bag fee, which would be a violation of § 1 of the Sherman Act. [2] A total of thirteen cases have been filed, and they have been consolidated into this multi-district litigation.

In addition to this litigation, on February 2, 2009, the United States Department of Justice Antitrust Division (the "DOJ") served a Civil Investigative Demand ("CID") upon Delta, seeking information regarding its decision to adopt the first-bag fee. The CID required Delta to produce documents relating to any actual or contemplated changes in Delta's policies or practices relating to fees charged for checked baggage.

II. The Subject Matter of the Current Motion: Delta's Document Production

On February 9, 2010, the Plaintiffs served document requests upon both Defendants, seeking all documents related to their decisions to impose a first-bag fee. In a brief May 13, 2010 telephone conference, the Court ordered that all such documents be produced to Plaintiffs by June 30, 2010.

On November 8, 2010, Plaintiffs filed a motion for spoliation sanctions against Delta relating to Delta's noncompliance with the DOJ's bag-fee CID. To understand the basis for this motion, it is necessary to explain Delta's email retention policy.

Delta creates and maintains daily and monthly back-up tapes for disaster-recovery [7] purposes. It contracts with IBM to perform these backup services.

With respect to the daily tapes, every day the data on each of Delta's exchange servers, which contain data such as employees' emails, calendar entries and contacts, is copied on a series of seven rotating tapes. When the last tape is full, the first tape in the set is reused. This process provides two weeks of daily backup tapes for each server.

With respect to the monthly tapes, on or about the first Saturday of each month, a back-up tape is created for each server. Each such tape contains a "snap-shot" of the data on the server on the particular date upon which it is backed up. Monthly back-up tapes are retained for three months and then reused, similar to the reusing of the weekly back-up tapes. Thus, at the time Delta received the CID on February 2, 2009, it should have had monthly back-up tapes for at least November and December 2008 and January 2009 for each server.

Delta also has an email policy that manages employees' emails. Copies of outgoing emails are stored in a sent-items folder. If an employee reads an email but does not manually delete or move it to another folder, after sixty days the email is automatically [8] moved to a deleted-items folder, and approximately sixty days thereafter it is permanently deleted. An employee who wants to retain a copy of an email for a longer period of time can do so by moving the email to a personal folder, where the email is retained until the employee chooses to delete it. Under

---

[1] As directed in the Court's Instructions to Parties and Counsel [49], on July 25, 2011, Plaintiffs emailed the Court a letter explaining the matters in dispute. Both Delta and AirTran responded via email letters. The letters (without exhibits) were filed on February 3, 2012 [294-301]. The Court notes that although the parties have stamped every document associated with this case "Confidential," there is nothing truly confidential about the contents of counsel's letters to the Court.

[2] For more details about Plaintiffs' [6] claims, see In re Delta/AirTran Baggage Fee Antitrust Litigation, 733 F. Supp. 2d 1348 (N.D. Ga. 2010).

Delta's document-retention policy, users are instructed to create custom personal folders for emails and other electronic files when there is a business need to retain them.

Delta received the CID on February 2, 2009. It imposed two important implicit if not explicit requirements upon Delta. First, Delta was to identify each person [*1339] responsible for analyzing, recommending or approving changes in its policies relating to fees for checked baggage. Second, Delta was to produce all documents relating to any actual or contemplated changes in its policies or practices related to bag fees. Based on Delta's response to the CID, it is apparent that Delta interpreted the CID's instructions as requiring it to copy all files on the computers of its employees that might contain any of the requested documents and suspend its standard electronic-document-destruction policy, i.e., Delta knew that it [9] needed to cease and desist its practice of overwriting both daily and monthly back-up tapes.

Consequently, on February 3, Scott McClain, Delta's assistant general counsel, emailed a document-preservation and litigation-hold notice to each of the twenty-two persons ("custodians") whose computers Delta believed might contain documents responsive to the CID. McClain's notice was also sent to the administrative assistants for each member of Delta's corporate leadership team.

Pursuant to McClain's notice, each recipient was informed that the DOJ had requested all documents related to any actual or contemplated changes in the checked-bag-fee policies of Delta or any other airline at any time since January 1, 2008. The notice also directed each recipient to search for, preserve and refrain from deleting or destroying any potentially responsive documents, including emails, other electronic documents, and paper documents. Over the course of the next few weeks, Delta collected paper and electronic documents, including emails, from the custodians and produced them to the DOJ. Thus, Delta did take steps to preserve responsive documents.

However, the problem (as perceived at the time Plaintiffs filed [10] their spoliation motion) was not that Delta had failed to comply with the CID, but rather that it had waited several months before complying completely. Specifically, although Delta received the CID on February 2, 2009, it waited over three months—until May 13, 2009—to copy all files on the custodians' computers and suspend the employee email-destruction policy. Moreover, Delta waited even longer—until sometime between May 19 and June 5, 2009—to instruct IBM to stop overwriting its daily and monthly back-up tapes. As a result, Plaintiffs contended, voluminous, highly relevant emails and documents going back to the crucial time period of July through November 2008, when Delta and AirTran announced that they would impose the first-bag fees, were lost. [3]

On February 22, 2011, the Court denied Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation [11] sanctions, for three reasons. First, the Court rejected Plaintiffs' contention that Delta owed Plaintiffs—and not just the DOJ—a duty to comply with the CID and that Delta could therefore be sanctioned in this case for failing to comply with the CID. Second, Plaintiffs had not shown prejudice, i.e., that critical evidence existed and was destroyed, or that Delta had acted in bad faith. Finally, the Court was influenced by Delta's myriad emphatic and unqualified assurances that it had produced absolutely every document in its possession, custody or control that Plaintiffs had requested. It is worth pausing at this point [*1340] to consider the nature and number of those important assurances:

During the November 8, 2010 status conference, Delta's counsel stated:

> So, there's no reason to think that we didn't do a good job. We did a good job in collecting the documents. And as the record would indicate, all of the documents that we had that covered the bag fee issues have been produced. (Tr. at 57.)
> . . . .
> So I think, Your Honor, when you peel away the onion on this, what you'll see is we undertook certainly reasonable steps to preserve the evidence at the time we received the CID. (Tr. at 58.)

---

[3] As discussed in the February 22 order on Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions, if Delta had imposed a litigation hold the day it received the DOJ's bag fee CID (February 2, 2009), the oldest back-up tape in its possession would have been from November 2008. See In re Delta/AirTran Baggage Fee Antitrust Litigation, 770 F. Supp. 2d 1299, 1306 (N.D. Ga. 2011).

> . [12] . . .
> So, the—all of the decisions that we're talking about, all the discussions and the analysis we're talking about, took place at Delta. We've produced everything that we have with regard to that. So, there is nothing with regard to the adoption of a bag fee between Delta and Northwest. (Tr. at 66.)

In its brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions, Delta stated:

> There is no evidence that any document regarding Delta's decision to adopt a first bag fee in 2008 has not been produced by Delta to Plaintiffs. (Br. at 16.)
> . . . .
> Again, there are no missing or destroyed documents. (Br. at 24.)
> . . . .
> There is no basis to believe, much less evidence to suggest, that there are missing documents. (Br. at 24.)
> . . . .
> Plaintiffs also claim that relevant emails from Gail Grimmett have been lost or destroyed. This ignores her testimony on that subject . . . . Thus, there is no reason to believe that any relevant emails still existed in February 2009. (Br. at 27 n.22.)

In its surreply brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions, Delta stated:

> Delta established in its original response . . . that the steps it took to preserve documents in response to the [13] CID were reasonable, that there is no evidence any material documents have been lost. (Br. at 2.)
> . . . .
> There is thus no basis for speculation about lost or destroyed emails, much less about any emails material to Delta's decision to adopt a first bag fee. (Br. at 4.)
> . . . .
> The same is true with respect to allegedly 'missing' emails from Gail Grimmett. In light of Ms. Grimmett's personal email retention practices, there is still no basis for believing any relevant emails from her files existed in February 2009. (Br. at 4 n.2.)

Finally, during the January 27, 2011 hearing on the motion for spoliation sanctions, Delta's counsel stated:

> And as the Court is keenly aware, all of those documents have been preserved and indeed presented to the plaintiff. (Tr. at 41.)
> . . . .
> Well, all of the emails and electronic information that we're aware of that related to Delta's consideration of the adoption of the first bag fee were preserved and were produced in this case. (Tr. at 42-43.)
> . . . .
> I want to walk you through that decision-making process for you and what documents do exist and why the documents that do exist give you—give the [*1341] Court, should give the plaintiffs, no reason to worry that some [14] documents—some documents were misplaced. (Tr. at 45.)
> . . . .
> There's no reason to believe that any documents relevant to this decision-making process were lost or destroyed. (Tr. at 45.)
> . . . .
> They don't reflect any—there's nothing in them to indicate or to insinuate that there's some missing piece in Delta's documents. (Tr. at 48.)
> . . . .
> I don't think there's any suggestion that there were notes taken that are lost. (Tr. at 61.)
> . . . .
> So, there's no reason to think that in February of 2009, there was any document on backup tapes or otherwise of Ms. Grimmett's to find. (Tr. at 62.)
> . . . .
> One more thing about the—the—the files that we do have and what we do know and what ought to give comfort that the plaintiffs have a full and complete record. (Tr. at 63.)

> . . . .
> There's nothing in those documents to suggest there's something missing somewhere else. It gives—it gives a full and complete and, frankly, I think, hopefully to the Court comforting view that everything exactly as I just walked you through, everything is there, there is no collection of documents missing. (Tr. at 64.)

Basically, it would be impossible for Delta to have been more forceful in its assurances that it had fully complied [15] with Plaintiffs' document requests and the DOJ's CID.

III. Delta's Failure to Produce 60,000 Pages of Responsive Documents

A. Recently Discovered Hard Drives

While the DOJ's bag-fee investigation was pending, the DOJ was also conducting an unrelated investigation of Delta regarding its proposed swap of airport landing slots with U.S. Airways at Washington and New York area airports. In connection with that investigation, the DOJ received from Delta several documents relevant to the DOJ's bag-fee investigation that Delta had not produced in response to the bag-fee CID. On February 17, 2011, the DOJ sent Delta a letter asking why Delta had failed to produce those documents in response to the CID issued in the bag-fee investigation.

On March 1, Delta's counsel informed the Court that it had recently become aware of additional "potential issues" with its document production in this case.

By letters dated March 8, 2011, Delta explained to both the DOJ and Plaintiffs that the slots-swap investigation documents were collected and produced by a different law firm not involved in the bag-fee investigation or this case, meaning that the slots-swap investigation documents were not readily available [16] to Delta's counsel in this case. Delta then stated that a preliminary review of the slots-swap investigation documents— approximately two terabytes of data—showed that these documents contained some "additional documents responsive to Plaintiffs' discovery requests in this case." Delta promised that it would search the slots-swap investigation documents and produce all such additional documents.

As of March 8, 2011, Delta still did not know how relevant documents could have been produced in the slots-swap investigation but not in response to the DOJ's bag-fee CID or Plaintiffs' discovery requests. [*1342] However, Delta's investigation would show that it failed to (1) upload all of the data from the relevant custodians' hard drives and (2) discover additional back-up tapes containing documents relevant to this case.

On March 17, 2011, Delta informed the Court that it had retained PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP ("PwC") to investigate what happened, and as a result of that investigation Delta discovered the existence of about 60,000 pages of documents responsive to Plaintiffs' document requests that had not been produced. The 60,000 pages included (1) documents found on the previously un-checked individual [17] hard drives, and (2) documents located on recently discovered back-up tapes, which are discussed infra at 15-17.

Delta offers the following explanation of how it could have been as wrong as it was dogmatic in its assertions that it had fully complied with the DOJ's CID and Plaintiffs' document requests.

Delta uses a computer software program called Clearwell to help manage its electronically stored information. Clearwell enables Delta to search its computer files, such as emails, letters, and memoranda, using key terms or phrases (e.g., "bag fee"). Files containing the key terms or phrases can then be copied to other computer storage media and/or printed.

In May 2009, Delta copied and saved data from numerous hard drives of various custodians as part of its efforts to respond to the DOJ's bag-fee CID. However, the contents of some of the hard drives were not uploaded to Clearwell, but Delta's legal team did not discover this fact until nearly two years later, in March 2011. Consequently, when Delta searched its electronic documents in 2009, only Delta's active email servers or shared network servers were searched; files located on the custodians' hard drives, including archived emails [18] on the hard drives but not on the shared servers, were not searched and thus not produced. Apparently, at some point the data on those hard drives was uploaded to Clearwell in connection with the slots-swap investigation. As a result, Delta produced documents to the DOJ in connection with the slots-swap investigation. The DOJ noticed that some of those documents were responsive to the DOJ's bag-fee CID, yet were not produced by Delta in response to the bag-fee CID. As previously indicated, on February 17, 2011, the DOJ sent Delta a letter asking why the documents responsive to both CIDs were not produced in response to the bag-fee CID.

Delta's explanation is that it failed to upload all of the data on the hard drives to Clearwell for the bag-fee investigation due to a misunderstanding between its counsel in this case and its internal technology department, CSIRT. [4] Back on May 13, 2009, Delta's counsel instructed CSIRT to copy and save the hard drives and shared server files of the relevant custodians. Nine days later CSIRT informed counsel that it had almost finished copying and saving the data on the custodians' hard drives, and it needed to know whether all of that data should be [19] uploaded to Delta's then-new search tool, Clearwell. Delta's in-house counsel replied in the affirmative. Two weeks later counsel followed-up to make sure that all of the data collected from the custodians' individual hard drives had been uploaded to Clearwell. Nevertheless (according to PwC in March 2011), CSIRT had not in fact uploaded to Clearwell all of the data from the custodians' hard drives. Significantly, Delta offers no explanation for this failure.

[*1343] B. Recently Discovered Back-Up Tapes

In addition to discovering that it failed to produce documents because it did not search several individual hard drives for documents as required, Delta also discovered in March 2011 the existence of additional back-up tapes in a CSIRT evidence locker. [5] Delta offers the following explanation for why it did not discover and could not have discovered these tapes before March 2011.

As stated above, sometime between May 19 and June 5, 2009, Delta instructed IBM to suspend the [20] overwriting of Delta's daily and monthly back-up tapes. Based on conversations at that time between Delta's counsel and both CSIRT and IBM, Delta then believed that (1) its oldest back-up tapes were from April 2009, and (2) those tapes were stored by CSIRT in CSIRT's "evidence locker." Delta contends that CSIRT stores only those back-up tapes that have been collected in connection with litigation or investigations, whereas IBM is the custodian of Delta's other, routine backup tapes.

In August 2010, Delta's counsel contacted CSIRT to confirm that the April 2009 back-up tapes were being stored, which CSIRT confirmed. CSIRT also informed Delta's counsel that it was storing a set of back-up tapes delivered by IBM to CSIRT sometime in September or October 2009. [6] CSIRT did not mention that it was also storing a set of back-up tapes predating April 2009—the "recently discovered back-up tapes."

Not until March 2011, when Delta's counsel met with representatives of CSIRT and PwC at CSIRT's offices, were the recently discovered back-up tapes found. [21] At that time, Delta's counsel asked to see the April 2009 back-up tapes, and for the first time CSIRT showed counsel an unmarked box of back-up tapes. Nothing on the tapes indicated why they were being stored, and CSIRT could not explain what the tapes were or why they were being preserved. Neither CSIRT nor IBM has been able to determine who requested that the tapes be preserved and stored in the evidence locker. After the tapes were discovered in March 2011, Delta had a vendor perform a forensic scan of the tapes to determine their age and relevance and promptly informed Plaintiffs of their existence

---

[4] Delta's IT group is called the "Computer Security and Investigative Response Team," or "CSIRT." It is housed in a separate building from Delta's counsel, approximately one mile away.

[5] Apparently, that's really what it's called.

[6] IBM delivered these tapes to CSIRT pursuant to a preservation instruction from Delta's law department in connection with the slots-swap investigation.

upon determining their relevance. The scan showed that the tapes, which pre-dated the April 2009 back-up tapes that Delta thought were the oldest tapes available, contained documents responsive to Plaintiffs' document requests. Delta produced these documents to Plaintiffs in April and May 2011; they are included among the 60,000 pages of documents produced to Plaintiffs.

IV. Plaintiffs' July 25 Letter and Delta's Responses Thereto

None of this sat too well with Plaintiffs, who had suspected as early as 2009—when Delta admittedly destroyed documents when it delayed in instructing IBM to [22] stop overwriting the back-up tapes (albeit inadvertently, if one were inclined to take Delta at its word)—that Delta's production was woefully incomplete, suggesting that Delta had destroyed or intentionally withheld evidence. On July 25, 2011, Plaintiffs' counsel wrote the Court an eighteen-page letter accompanied by 47 exhibits totaling 361 pages, expressing Plaintiffs' ire. Plaintiffs seek four things: (1) a re-opening [*1344] of the discovery period; (2) a proposed case schedule; (3) sanctions against Delta; and (4) an order compelling Delta and AirTran to produce ongoing correspondence with the DOJ related to its bag-fee investigation.

By letter dated August 2, Delta responded to Plaintiffs' letter indicating that it (1) did not object to a limited reopening of discovery; (2) would respond to the motion for sanctions within the time allowed under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure; (3) objected to producing additional correspondence between it and the DOJ; and (4) commented generally on the nature of the recently produced documents. Delta's letter did not dispute that Delta (1) failed to search and produce responsive documents from the hard drives collected in May 2009 from the relevant [23] bag-fee custodians, and (2) located after the close of discovery the recently discovered back-up tapes containing emails from certain custodians. It characterized these blunders as "inadvertent mistakes."

On August 11, Delta sent a letter to the Court responding to Plaintiffs' request for sanctions. The details of this letter are addressed below.

V. The Evidentiary Significance of the Newly Produced Documents

Before addressing Plaintiffs' requested sanctions and Delta's response thereto, it is necessary to consider both sides' evaluations of the approximately 60,000 pages of documents [7] that Delta produced to Plaintiffs in April and May of 2011. Plaintiffs have two main issues with the newly produced documents.

Plaintiffs first contend that a number of the newly produced documents contradict the deposition testimony of Delta witnesses as to when Delta adopted a first-bag fee and that the contradictions as to the timing of Delta's decision "help demonstrate that Defendants imposed a first bag fee as the result of a conspiracy." Second, Plaintiffs argue that Delta [24] should be sanctioned for its late production because the existence of these newly produced documents (1) refutes Delta's numerous representations that it had provided a full and complete record of events, and (2) suggests that even more documents remain missing or were destroyed.

The Court addresses each contention in turn.

A. The Deposition Testimony of Delta's Witnesses and Evidence of a Conspiracy

Plaintiffs contend that Delta's witnesses previously testified that its two divisions responsible for making a recommendation about the first-bag fee—Revenue Management ("RM") and Airport Customer Service ("ACS")—were divided on whether Delta should impose the fee. Generally speaking, Delta's witnesses testified that ACS favored a first-bag fee long before AirTran's October 23, 2008 earnings call and that RM always opposed the fee.

[7] Prior to the close of discovery on December 15, 2010, Delta had produced to Plaintiffs approximately 103,000 pages of documents.

Plaintiffs contend that the newly produced documents show that ACS was actually opposed to the fee in the months prior to AirTran's earnings call, but that Delta changed its position after the call. Thus, Plaintiffs assert that Delta decided to adopt the first-bag fee as a direct result of AirTran's earnings call.

Plaintiffs also contend that the new documents "impeach [25] other aspects of the testimony of Delta witnesses." However, Plaintiffs compare the new documents to the testimony of only one witness—Delta's executive vice president Steve Gorman. [*1345] Plaintiffs assert that Gorman testified that Delta knew that three other carriers did not have a first-bag fee but that this did not enter into Delta's consideration. Plaintiffs claim that the new documents refute this testimony and make clear that AirTran's position was indeed a factor taken into consideration by Delta and Gorman. Thus, to summarize, Plaintiffs contend that the timing of Delta's decision about the first-bag fee, as evidenced by the newly produced documents, shows that Delta's adoption of the fee was a direct result of AirTran's October 23, 2008 earnings call, and that this evidence supports their conspiracy claim.

Delta offers three responses to Plaintiffs' assertions about the alleged inconsistencies between the depositions and documents. Delta first responds that the alleged inconsistencies are trivial and that Plaintiffs inaccurately represent the contents of the new documents. More importantly, Delta contends that "what is noticeably absent from Plaintiffs' letter [is] any evidence, [26] in the newly produced documents or otherwise, supporting [Plaintiffs'] allegations that Delta entered into an agreement with AirTran to adopt the first bag fee." [8] Finally, Delta asserts that the documents actually confirm its defense because they show that (1) its two most senior executives and the ultimate decisionmakers—CEO Richard Anderson and president Ed Bastian—decided that Delta should adopt the fee in advance of AirTran's earnings call; (2) the leaders of ACS decided that Delta should adopt the fee and advocated its decision long before AirTran's call; (3) RM, led by Glen Hauenstein, was implacably opposed to the fee both before and after AirTran's call; and (4) information provided by Northwest to Delta after the merger and before Delta's final decision about the fee confirmed the substantial profitability of the fee. Thus, to summarize Delta's position, it contends that the new documents show only that it made a unilateral decision to adopt a first-bag fee and that AirTran's earnings call had no effect on that decision, contrary to Plaintiffs' theory of the case—that Defendants conspired to adopt the first-bag fee and used AirTran's October 2008 earnings call to cover their [27] actions.

On August 26, 2011, Plaintiffs responded to Delta's arguments in both its August 2 and 11 letters. Noticeably absent from Plaintiffs' August 26 letter to the Court is a complete response to Delta's contention that there is not "any evidence, in the newly produced documents or otherwise, supporting their allegations that Delta entered into an agreement with AirTran to adopt the first bag fee." In reply to such a strong assertion, Plaintiffs state only,

> [A]lmost all of the relevant documents in the new production [28] undermine Delta's arguments and support Plaintiffs' allegations of conspiracy. See Pls.' Ltr. to J. Batten at 4-8 (July 25, 2011). In stark contrast to the numerous e-mails and documents that support Plaintiffs' allegations, Delta cites several ambiguous emails as support for its defense. For example, Delta argues that an October 21, 2008 e-mail about the need to schedule a meeting about post-merger fees, including a first bag fee, demonstrates [*1346] that Delta CEO Richard Anderson had reached a decision about first bag fees by October 21, 2008. But Mr. Anderson testified that he did not reach a decision on first bag fees until October 29, 2008, contrary to Delta's strained interpretation of the e-mail.

This argument is buried on page nineteen of Plaintiffs' twenty-one-page letter. By contrast, Plaintiffs' first letter to the Court (dated July 25) addressed the impact of the new documents beginning on page four and continued for over four pages. Thus, if Plaintiffs had better examples of how the new documents show that Defendants conspired to impose a first-bag fee, surely they would have said so in their August 26 letter.

[8] AirTran made a similar statement in its August 2 letter to the Court. It stated that "[n]one of the newly produced documents [Plaintiffs] attach to their submission establishes, directly or indirectly, any communication between AirTran and Delta. Nor do they show any interaction at all between AirTran and Delta." AirTran contends that the documents upon which Plaintiffs rely show that Delta, acting independently, was aware of (1) what other airlines had done, and (2) AirTran's public statements, and that those were among the many factors Delta considered after its merger with Northwest. Thus, AirTran asserts that these parallel actions by Delta are completely lawful.

Plaintiffs also offer no additional or direct evidence of a conspiracy [29] between Defendants in their August 26 letter. Indeed, in their letter Plaintiffs offer only one example of how the recently produced documents allegedly undermine Delta's arguments and support theirs. That example is the alleged contradiction between the first-bag-fee emails sent by Delta's CEO Richard Anderson and his testimony about when he made his decision to adopt a first-bag fee. This example is tepid support for Plaintiffs' contention that "[t]he timing of Delta's change in position regarding first bag fee as evidenced by the newly produced documents provides evidence that the first bag fee was imposed as a direct result of AirTran's October 23, 2008 earnings call."

B. Delta's Representations That It Had Provided a Full and Complete Record of Events, and Plaintiffs' Contention that Relevant Documents Are Still Missing

Plaintiffs also take issue with Delta's representations that it had produced everything, in light of the existence of these new documents. Plaintiffs also argue that additional documents remain missing.

Plaintiffs first contend that the "[n]ewly produced documents . . . undermine representations made by Delta in connection with Delta's opposition to Plaintiffs' spoliation [30] motion about the completeness of its production." For example, Delta previously stated that all of Gail Grimmett's (the head of its bag-fee team) emails regarding first-bag fees had been permanently deleted on November 1, 2008, whereas, the recently produced documents contain a number of Grimmett's first-bag-fee emails.

Indeed, as discussed above in Part II, Delta made several representations about its complete production, and some of these representations pertained to Grimmett's emails. For example, during the hearing on Plaintiffs' spoliation motion, Delta's counsel stated, "It was [Grimmett's] normal practice in 2008 to delete her emails on a regular basis and for her deleted email box to clear every time she exited the computer. So there's no reason to think that in February of 2009, there was any document on back-up tapes or otherwise of Ms. Grimmett's to find." Despite this assurance, the newly produced documents include additional Grimmett emails.

In response, Delta acknowledges that it dropped the ball by failing to timely produce 60,000 pages of responsive documents. However, it insists that these documents are of little, if any, evidentiary significance to the case; in fact, [31] as stated above, Delta contends that the documents actually support its defense, not Plaintiffs' conspiracy claim. Significantly, Delta points out that of the almost 10,000 responsive documents [9] located on the imaged [*1347] hard drives and back-up tapes, the majority of those documents did not relate to bag fees.

Plaintiffs also contend that not only do the newly produced documents show that Delta failed to produce inculpatory documents, but that these new documents suggest that additional documents—presumably inculpatory as well—have still not been produced. In their July 25 letter, Plaintiffs state:

> While the newly produced documents provide evidence of Defendants' conspiracy, additional evidence remains missing. The backup tapes recently located by Delta are only a partial record of the e-mails and backup tapes that existed on February 2, 2009, when Delta received the DOJ CID. Delta did not suspend auto-deletion of e-mails until mid-May [32] 2009, and allowed IBM to destroy five monthly backup tapes in IBM's possession between February 7, 2009 and June 6, 2009. . . . Delta apparently made no effort to locate or preserve relevant backup tapes in its own possession until March 9, 2011 (well over a month after this Court's hearing on Plaintiffs' spoliation motion), when it asked its IT staff where Delta kept its backup tapes. "Neither Delta's IT group nor Delta's outside vendor . . . (IBM) possessed a log of the tapes or a record explaining why and when the tapes were set aside." Letter from Delta to DOJ (Apr. 27, 2011), Ex. 9. Thus, for over two years—from February 2, 2009 to March 9, 2011—a number of additional backup tapes may have also been destroyed, and Delta has no log or record of such destruction.

[9] Plaintiffs state that they received 60,000 pages of documents and Delta contends that only 10,000 documents were produced. It is unclear whether the 10,000 documents produced by Delta are the same documents as the 60,000 pages Plaintiffs contend they received.

Delta's two letters to the Court do not address this contention. However, Plaintiffs offer nothing more than speculation to support their theory that documents have been destroyed or that additional documents remain missing.

VI. Reopening Discovery

Plaintiffs contend that discovery should be reopened on a limited basis to allow them to explore issues raised by the newly produced documents. Plaintiffs propose that:

> (1) Discovery [33] be reopened on a limited basis;
> (2) Two weeks after discovery is reopened and as necessary thereafter, Delta and AirTran [10] supplement their discovery responses pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(e);
> (3) Four months after Delta and AirTran complete their document production, discovery closes;
> (4) Three weeks after discovery closes, the parties file summary judgment briefs and Plaintiffs file their supplemental brief regarding class certification; [11]
> (5) Briefs in opposition to the motion for summary judgment be filed four weeks after the summary judgment motions are filed; and > (6) Reply briefs be filed three weeks after the opposition briefs are filed.

Delta agrees that discovery should be reopened; however, it believes that Plaintiffs' proposed open-ended schedule is not helpful. Delta contends that the Court should either issue a clear instruction on [*1348] the purpose and scope of any new discovery (e.g., the order Delta proposed with its August 2 letter to the Court) or order Plaintiffs to identify [34] what additional discovery needs to be conducted during the new discovery period. Delta also argues that point (3) is superfluous, as Delta completed its document production months ago and is now attempting to compromise with Plaintiffs on their new document requests.

As to the start time of the new discovery period, Delta believes that its document production is complete, and thus the four months of additional discovery, as proposed by Plaintiffs, should commence immediately. However, Delta also acknowledges that it is producing documents as a result of new document requests by Plaintiffs.

Because Delta agrees that discovery should be reopened, the Court will grant Plaintiffs' request to reopen discovery. However, discovery will be limited to the matters related to the documents produced by Delta after the close of the original discovery period, which includes but is not limited to the recently produced documents on the hard drives and back-up tapes produced by Delta in recent months. Discovery will reopen immediately and end four months from the date of this Order.

VII. Plaintiffs' Request for Sanctions

In addition to reopening discovery, Plaintiffs contend that Delta should be sanctioned [35] for not locating the recently produced documents sooner. Specifically, Plaintiffs contend that Delta should be sanctioned pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(g) and 37 because it failed to produce responsive documents prior to the close of discovery; failed to conduct a reasonable inquiry into the existence and location of its back-up tapes; and misrepresented that it did not possess the recently located back-up tapes. As for the type of sanctions, Plaintiffs seek reimbursement of their fees and expenses associated with (1) their motion for spoliation sanctions; (2) their request for sanctions, and (3) the extended discovery period. They also urge the Court to enter an order barring Delta from using any of the late-produced documents at any stage of the litigation.

---

[10] Plaintiffs' discovery issues with AirTran are discussed at the end of this order.

[11] Delta and AirTran object to the supplemental class certification brief. This, too, is addressed at the end of the order.

Delta responds that there is no basis for sanctions under Rule 26(g) or Rule 37. It contends that its failure to timely search its individual custodians' hard drives was the inadvertent result of a misunderstanding by Delta's IT department of instructions from Delta's counsel. Delta further contends that its failure to locate the recently discovered back-up tapes was equally inadvertent, i.e., the result of the tapes' storage [36] in an unexpected location: the evidence locker. Thus, Delta asserts that its in-house and outside counsel reasonably believed that all requested hard drives had been searched and that the oldest available back-up tapes had been produced. Consequently, it argues that its responses are not sanctionable now just because in hindsight its discovery responses may have been incomplete or incorrect.

Additionally, Delta asserts that it was obligated to, and did, provide in a timely manner the additional or corrective information once it became aware of the relevant but unproduced documents. It also argues that it has been in constant communication with Plaintiffs and the Court about the additional discovery and has offered to cover the fees and expenses related to the additional discovery but that Plaintiffs have refused to identify what discovery they think is needed.

Despite its arguments against the propriety of sanctions, Delta does not dispute that it (1) neglected to search and produce responsive documents from the hard drives collected in May 2009 from the relevant bag fee custodians; and (2) located and identified additional back-up tapes [*1349] containing emails from relevant custodians after [37] the close of discovery.

It is also undisputed that prior to the discovery of these documents, Delta represented to the Court approximately twenty times [12] that it had produced every document responsive to Plaintiffs' discovery requests that it had in its possession. Delta's representations are best summarized by its counsel's statement to the Court during the hearing on Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions. During that hearing, Delta's counsel stated, "There's nothing in those documents to suggest there's something missing somewhere else. It gives—it gives a full and complete and, frankly, I think, hopefully to the Court comforting view that everything exactly as I just walked you through, everything is there, there is no collection of documents missing."

However, although Delta clearly failed [38] to comply with its obligation to produce documents—and misrepresented through counsel that it had not so failed—the 60,000 pages of documents that Delta recently produced do not appear to contain "smoking gun" evidence of a conspiracy between Delta and AirTran to impose the first-bag fee. This, of course, does not excuse Delta's discovery failures and misrepresentations to the Court. But it does affect the Court's analysis of the relief that Plaintiffs seek.

The Court now addresses whether Delta should be sanctioned under Rule 26(g), Rule 37 or both, and what sanctions, if any, are appropriate.

A. Rule 26(g)

Plaintiffs contend that Delta violated Rule 26(g)(1), which states that a signing attorney certifies discovery responses are complete and correct to the best of his knowledge, information and belief after a reasonable inquiry, and that Delta's counsel failed to take reasonable steps to comply with this obligation. Specifically, Plaintiffs assert that Delta inexcusably failed to ensure that all sources of discoverable information (i.e., its custodians' hard drives) were identified and searched, did not determine the actual implementation of its e-discovery retention policy, and did [39] not search the storage area where its internal technology department stored back-up tapes until March 9, 2011.

[12] These representations can be found on (1) pages 16, 24 and 27 of Delta's brief in response to Plaintiffs' spoliation motion [210]; (2) pages 2 and 4 of Delta's surreply brief to Plaintiffs' spoliation motion [272]; (3) pages 57, 58 and 66 of the November 8, 2010 status conference transcript [200]; and pages 41, 42, 48, 61, 63, 64 and 66 of the spoliation motion hearing transcript [264].

Delta responds that sanctions pursuant to Rule 26(g) as a result of recently produced documents are limited in scope to the elements delineated in subsection (g)(1)(B). This subsection requires a signing attorney to certify after a reasonable inquiry that his client's discovery responses are (1) consistent with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and warranted by existing law or by nonfrivolous arguments for changing the existing law; (2) not interposed for any improper purpose; and (3) neither unreasonable nor unduly burdensome or expensive. Thus, Delta contends that Rule 26(g) only requires a reasonable inquiry limited to these three elements and that Plaintiffs have not shown that its conduct violated any of these elements. However, the comments to Rule 26(g) show that the rule is not as limited in scope as Delta contends.

HN1[] Rule 26(g)(1) requires an attorney of record to sign every discovery request, response or objection. By signing, an attorney certifies that to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief formed [*1350] after a reasonable inquiry that a discovery request, [40] response or objection is:

> (i) consistent with these rules and warranted by existing law or by a nonfrivolous argument for extending, modifying, or reversing existing law, or for establishing new law;
> (ii) not interposed for any improper purpose, such as to harass, cause unnecessary delay, or needlessly increase the cost of litigation; and
> (iii) neither unreasonable nor unduly burdensome or expensive, considering the needs of the case, prior discovery in the case, the amount in controversy, and the importance of the issues at stake in the action.

FED. R. CIV. P. 26(g)(1)(B). The comments to subsection (g)(1) clarify that Rule 26(g) broadly "imposes an affirmative duty to engage in pretrial discovery in a responsible manner that is consistent with the spirit and purposes of Rules 26 through 37." FED. R. CIV. P. 26(g) advisory committee's note. This broad duty is satisfied when an attorney makes "a reasonable inquiry into the factual basis of his response, request, or objection." Id. Specifically, the attorney's investigation and conclusions drawn therefrom must be reasonable under the circumstances. Id. Thus, the comments make clear that Rule 26(g) is broader than Delta portrays it. The [41] Court now determines whether Delta has in fact violated subsection (g).

Delta admits that it belatedly produced relevant documents; however, it contends that its conduct does not run afoul of subsection (g) because its counsel made reasonable inquiries prior to signing the certifications. It asserts that "each response was given only after Delta counsel had engaged in several conversations with Delta's CSIRT department and/or IBM to verify the relevant back-up tapes Delta had in its possession."

Plaintiffs assert that Delta did not conduct a reasonable inquiry into the factual basis for its implicit representations that (1) all of the relevant hard drives had been processed through Clearwell, and (2) there were no missing back-up tapes. They argue that Delta should have ensured that all sources of discoverable information were identified and searched and searched in (where else?) the evidence locker, where CSIRT typically keeps back-up tapes. Consequently, Plaintiffs contend, Delta falsely certified that its discovery responses were correct and complete. Plaintiffs argue that as a result, the case has been unnecessarily delayed and its costs unnecessarily increased, and the fact that [42] Delta is now producing these documents is immaterial. The Court agrees. See Kipperman v. Onex Corp., 260 F.R.D. 682, 698 (N.D. Ga. 2009) (imposing sanctions under Rule 26(g) for defendant's misrepresentations about its e-discovery and rejecting defendant's arguments it had finally complied with discovery orders and plaintiff was not prejudiced); R&R Sails Inc. v. Ins. Co. of State of Pa., 251 F.R.D. 520, 524-25 (S.D. Cal. 2008) (imposing Rule 26(g) sanctions where defendant without substantial justification belatedly produced electronic information despite certifications to court and plaintiff that its discovery production was complete); see also 8A CHARLES WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER & RICHARD L. MARCUS, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2052 (3d ed. 2010) (collecting cases where parties asserted opponent neglected to produce all electronically stored information and sanctions appropriate under Rule 26(g)).

The Court finds that Delta did not conduct a reasonable inquiry. With respect to the collected but unsearched hard drives, Delta has not substantially justified its failure to ensure the drives were run through Clearwell and searched back in [*1351] 2009. While its counsel did email CSIRT a [43] list of custodians whose hard drives should have been loaded onto Clearwell, CSIRT did not respond with confirmation that each listed person's drive was on the system; CSIRT only stated that files were identified by "user employee id, not by name." Delta has not shown that it ever confirmed with CSIRT that each hard drive that was supposed to be run through Clearwell actually had been.

This oversight is a huge hole in Delta's electronic discovery process, and Delta has not adequately explained why it did not ensure in 2009 that every collected hard drive was actually processed through Clearwell and searched. See Bernal v. All Am. Inv. Realty, Inc., 479 F. Supp. 2d 1291, 1334 (S.D. Fla. 2007) (finding Rule 26(g) violated where attorney relied on client's assurances in drafting discovery responses without confirming assurances by reviewing financial records).

As for the back-up tapes, Delta has not tried to explain why counsel did not check CSIRT's evidence locker. Again, Delta relied on email and phone communications, but given the extensive questioning of Delta about back-up tapes upon receipt of the bag-fee CID, counsel should have inspected the evidence locker in 2009, and certainly [44] should have done so as soon as issues with the back-up tapes arose. See id. (attorney did not "make a reasonable investigation to assure that his clients had provided all available responsive information"). Delta tries to justify its failure by explaining that back-up tapes are not typically located in this locker; however, it also explicitly states that tapes are routinely stored in the CSIRT evidence locker once they are collected for litigation or internal or external investigations. Consequently, Delta's counsel should have inspected the tapes in this locker, as it stores only the tapes that are collected for litigation and investigations, and Delta has not substantially justified its failure to do so.

Compounding the problem are Delta's repeated representations that it had produced everything. The unequivocal nature of those representations is best illustrated by Delta's counsel's statement during the January 27, 2011 hearing on Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions: "There's nothing in those documents to suggest there's something missing somewhere else. It gives—it gives a full and complete and, frankly, I think, hopefully to the Court comforting view that everything exactly [45] as I just walked you through, everything is there, there is no collection of documents missing."

Also, Delta did not promptly correct its factual misrepresentations to the Court regarding its supposedly complete production of the requested documents. To the contrary, on February 22, 2011 (five days after the DOJ informed Delta of its discovery of additional documents), Delta's counsel submitted another letter to the Court insisting that spoliation sanctions should not be imposed. Delta waited until March 1—one week after the Court denied Plaintiffs' spoliation motion—to notify the Court of the issues raised by the DOJ.

Thus, sanctions under Rule 26(g) are appropriate for Delta's failure to ensure that all collected hard drives were actually searched and to locate the back-up tapes in the evidence locker and for its myriad inaccurate representations that it had done both. See Legault v. Zambarano, 105 F.3d 24, 28 (1st Cir. 1997) (finding Rule 26(g) violated where documents defendants failed to produce were in their possession and would have been located if defendants had conducted a reasonable search).

With respect to the type of sanctions, subsection (g)(3) provides that > [*1352] HN2[] If a certification [46] violates this rule without substantial justification, the court, on motion or on its own, must impose an appropriate sanction on the signer, the party on whose behalf the signer was acting, or both. The sanction may include an order to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the violation.

Through this subsection, Rule 26(g) "curb[s] discovery abuse by explicitly encouraging the imposition of sanctions." Malautea v. Suzuki Motor Co., 987 F.2d 1536, 1545 (11th Cir. 1993) (quoting FED. R. CIV. P. 26(g) advisory committee's note). However, while the Court "must impose" a sanction, the rule also clarifies that the sanction must be "an appropriate sanction." Thus, the Court evaluates the circumstances surrounding Delta's behavior both before and after the discovery of the documents.

Since becoming aware of its deficient document production, Delta has diligently worked to address the situation. It collected the two terabytes of data produced in the DOJ slots investigation and searched it for documents relevant to this case; processed the newly discovered back-up tapes and produced relevant documents; employed electronic search terms to accommodate Plaintiffs' requests; [47] added additional custodians to the search list; searched material collected in another unrelated DOJ investigation; and agreed to numerous additional discovery requests made by Plaintiffs. Its initial delay in informing the Court aside, Delta has been forthcoming with the Court and Plaintiffs about its progress, agrees that discovery should be reopened, and acknowledges that it should be required to pay at least a portion of the expense of the additional discovery that will now be necessary because of Delta's mistakes. Delta also asserts that the majority of the recently produced documents do not relate to bag fees, and the ones that are so related do not show that Delta conspired with AirTran. Finally, and significantly, Delta produced the documents prior to motions for summary judgment and well before trial.

In light of these facts, the Court finds SCADIF, S.A. v. First Union Nat'l Bank, 208 F. Supp. 2d 1352, 1378-79 (S.D. Fla. 2002), aff'd, 344 F.3d 1123 (11th Cir. 2003), instructive. There, First Union, like Delta, admitted that it had failed to make a complete production due to an unintentional omission, and it accepted responsibility for its mistake. The court rejected First Union's [48] excuses for failing to produce certain documents and found its "failure to timely produce known, requested and discoverable documents . . . a serious procedural and ethical violation . . . one that cannot be dismissed lightly, even where the failure is the result of mere carelessness."

Nevertheless, the court determined that the prejudice from First Union's untimely disclosure was minimized by the fact that "(1) the documents were produced before trial (though barely); (2) SCADIF used the documents to examine and cross-examine witnesses in the trial; and (3) the documents are of minimal relevance." Id. at 1379. Particularly persuasive to the court's finding that First Union's failure was a "good faith error" was the fact that "[t]here were no 'smoking guns'" in the belatedly produced documents. Id. As a result, the court limited its sanction to a written reprimand. See also Guimaraes v. NORS, 366 F. App'x 51, 54 (11th Cir. 2010) (affirming district court's denial of motion for sanctions in part because untimely produced documents were "of minimal relevance"); cf. BankAtlantic v. Blythe Eastman Paine Webber, Inc., 12 F.3d 1045, 1051 (11th Cir. 1994) (finding sanctions appropriate where [49] late documents [*1353] were discovered on "eve of trial" and were relevant and material).

While this Court does not believe a written reprimand suffices, [13] Delta's response after it learned that it had relevant but unproduced documents, the timing of its production (pre-trial and pre-motions for summary judgment), and the lack of a "smoking gun" support lesser sanctions. Pursuant to Rule 26(g), the Court finds it appropriate to require Delta to pay reasonable expenses, including attorneys' fees, caused by its violation. Additional details about determining this amount are below.

B. Rule 37

Plaintiffs also contend that Delta is subject to sanctions under Rule 37(b)(2) & (c)(1).

1. Subsection (b)(2)

Plaintiffs assert that subsection (b)(2) applies because "Delta's failure to produce these documents prior to the deadline set by the Court amounts [50] to a failure to comply with this Court's discovery Orders." Delta disagrees, arguing that it has not willfully disobeyed a discovery order compelling production of specific materials or information.

Subsection (b)(2) provides,

> HN3[] (A) For Not Obeying a Discovery Order. If a party or a party's officer, director, or managing agent—or a witness designated under Rule 30(b)(6) or 31(a)(4)—fails to obey an order to provide or permit discovery,

---

[13] As made clear throughout this Order, issues with document production have hounded Delta from the beginning of this litigation and since it received the DOJ's bag-fee CID. Nevertheless, Delta repeatedly represented to the Court and Plaintiffs that it had produced "a full and complete record." Time has proved those representations to be woefully inaccurate.

> including an order under Rule 26(f), 35, or 37(a), the court where the action is pending may issue further just orders. They may include the following:
> (i) directing that the matters embraced in the order or other designated facts be taken as established for purposes of the action, as the prevailing party claims;
> (ii) prohibiting the disobedient party from supporting or opposing designated claims or defenses, or from introducing designated matters in evidence;
> (iii) striking pleadings in whole or in part;
> (iv) staying further proceedings until the order is obeyed;
> (v) dismissing the action or proceeding in whole or in part;
> (vi) rendering a default judgment against the disobedient party; or
> (vii) treating as contempt of court the failure to obey any order except [51] an order to submit to a physical or mental examination.
>
> . . . .
> (C) Payment of Expenses. Instead of or in addition to the orders above, the court must order the disobedient party, the attorney advising that party, or both to pay the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure, unless the failure was substantially justified or other circumstances make an award of expenses unjust.

(Emphasis added.) The key phrase in this subsection is "fails to obey an order to provide or permit discovery." Plaintiffs contend that Defendants violated (1) the Court's May 13, 2010 order that required Defendants to complete their production in response to Plaintiffs' first document requests [*1354] on or before June 30, 2010, and (2) the initial case management order that set forth a December 15, 2010 deadline for document production by all parties.

Delta responds that general discovery orders like the ones mentioned above are not sufficient to trigger application of subsection (b)(2), especially where a party, like it, has complied in part with the general directives.

The parties have provided neither persuasive nor binding authority as to whether an order setting a deadline for a party to [52] respond to a discovery request or a scheduling order qualifies as an order providing for or permitting discovery under subsection (b)(2). [14] Indeed, based on the Court's own research, the facts of this case are not similar to the facts in most cases addressing subsection (b)(2). Here, Delta was producing documents in response to Plaintiffs' first document requests, and the parties' counsel were engaged in continuing discussions regarding the scope of the requests. Thus, unlike the orders in most of the cases within the Eleventh Circuit interpreting subsection (b)(2), the May 13 order in this case was not issued as a result of a party's refusal to produce documents or respond to a discovery request. See Brooks v. United States, 837 F.2d 958, 961 (11th Cir. 1988) (stating in dicta that Rule 37(b)(2) did not support sanctions where "there had been no failure to cooperate following an order to compel and failure to comply"); BankAtlantic, 12 F.3d 1045, 1052 (11th Cir. 1994) (imposing sanctions under Rule 37(b)(2) where court issued an order compelling defendant to produce documents and defendant failed to comply with that order); *SCQuARE Int'l, Ltd. v. BBDO Atlanta, Inc., Civil Action File No. 1:04-cv-641-JEC, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5490, 2008 WL 228032, at 1 (N.D. Ga. Jan. 25, 2008) [53] (imposing sanctions under (b)(2) where defendant failed to obey court's order compelling defendant to produce certain documents). In contrast to those three cases, the May 13 order in this case was issued to address Plaintiffs' concern that production would take too long and that they would not have sufficient time to analyze all of the documents before the discovery period closed. Thus, the Court set the June 30 deadline to ensure that Defendants timely produced the documents in response to Plaintiffs' document requests. Such an order more closely resembles a scheduling order than an [14] Delta relies on R.W. International Corp. v. Welch Foods, Inc., 937 F.2d 11, 16 (1st Cir. 1991), for the proposition that a district court's scheduling order is not a discovery order for purposes of subsection (b)(2). While the First Circuit did reject the defendants' argument that the general scheduling order qualified as an order providing for or permitting discovery, its decision was strongly influenced by the fact that the district court dismissed the case pursuant to subsection (b)(2). The sanction of dismissal is considered an extremely harsh sanction, and it is not one that Plaintiffs seek in this case. Consequently, the Court finds R.W. International inapposite.

order "to provide or permit discovery." [15] Additionally, the initial case management order only sets a deadline for the [*1355] discovery period, which is also more like a scheduling order than an order providing for or permitting discovery. In light of the generic nature of these orders and the Court's conclusion that sanctions are appropriate under Rule 37(c)(1), which incorporates the Rule 37(b)(2) sanctions, it is unnecessary to resolve whether the initial case management order and May 13 order qualify as orders providing for or permitting [54] discovery and whether subsection (b)(2) applies.

2. Subsection (c)(1)

As with their Rule 26(g) arguments, Plaintiffs contend that Delta's conduct violated Rule 37(c)(1), which incorporates obligations imposed under Rule 26(e), because Delta failed to act reasonably under the circumstances, i.e., its failure to produce the documents was not substantially justified. Specifically, Plaintiffs assert that under Rule 26(e)(1)(B), sanctions are appropriate because Delta failed to produce responsive documents as ordered by the Court.

Delta responds that Plaintiffs have failed to show that Rule 37(c)(1) sanctions are appropriate because they have neither (1) identified the information that it failed to provide in keeping with Rule 26(e), nor (2) shown that it did not act in accordance with the rule. Specifically, Delta asserts that Rule 26(e)(1)(A) requires it to correct or supplement responses "in a timely manner," and that it did this [56] when it immediately notified Plaintiffs and the Court of the recently discovered documents and immediately began producing those documents.

Turning to subsection (c)(1), it provides,

> HN4[] (1) Failure to Disclose or Supplement. If a party fails to provide information or identify a witness as required by Rule 26(a) or (e), the party is not allowed to use that information or witness to supply evidence on a motion, at a hearing, or at a trial, unless the failure was substantially justified or is harmless. In addition to or instead of this sanction, the court, on motion and after giving an opportunity to be heard:
> (A) may order payment of the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure;
> (B) may inform the jury of the party's failure; and
> (C) may impose other appropriate sanctions, including any of the orders listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi).

Rule 26(a) addresses Delta's obligations with respect to initial disclosures, and Rule 26(e) addresses Delta's obligations to supplement disclosures and discovery responses, including its responses to Plaintiffs' document requests. Plaintiffs believe that Rule 37(c)(1) applies because Delta has violated its obligations under Rule 26(e), [57] which states in pertinent part,

> HN5[] (1) In General. A party who has made a disclosure under Rule 26(a)—or who has responded to an interrogatory, request for production, or request for admission—must supplement or correct its disclosure or response:
> (A) in a timely manner if the party learns that in some material respect the disclosure or response is incomplete or incorrect, and if the additional or corrective information has not otherwise been made known to the other parties during the discovery process or in writing; or > (B) as ordered by the court.

[15] Review of Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(f) and supporting case law suggests that Rule 16(f) is a more appropriate vehicle for seeking sanctions where a party has violated a scheduling order. See Guimaraes, 366 F. App'x at 54 ("Under Rule 16(f), a court may impose sanctions if a party or its attorney violates a scheduling order or other pretrial order, including a discovery order."). However, the Court will not address Rule 16(f) sanctions, even though it could sua sponte, since [55] that subsection permits sanctions substantially similar to those permitted by Rule 37(c), which the Court finds applicable below. See Brooks, 837 F.2d at 961 (stating that Rule 16(f) authorizes district court on motion or sua sponte to impose sanctions for failure to comply with scheduling or pretrial order).

Thus, Delta was required to supplement its discovery responses in a timely manner when it learned that its previous document production was incomplete or when ordered by the Court to supplement or correct its responses. Failure to do either can result in sanctions under Rule 37(c)(1).

[*1356] Plaintiffs argue that if Delta had conducted a reasonable investigation into the location of the hard drives and back-up tapes within its control, it would have discovered the existence of these new documents prior to the DOJ's February 2011 letter. Plaintiffs assert that a reasonable investigation would have involved Delta's ensuring prior to the close of discovery [58] that it had (1) run all of the captured hard drives through Clearwell, and (2) searched the CSIRT evidence locker for additional back-up tapes. Plaintiffs contend that by not doing these things, Delta's production of the recently discovered documents was not timely under Rule 26(e)(1)(A), and consequently sanctions under Rule 37(c)(1) are appropriate.

Plaintiffs also assert that the Court's May 13 order setting the June 30 production deadline qualifies as an order by the Court to supplement disclosure under Rule 26(e)(1)(B), and that Delta failed to comply with that order when it failed to produce the recently discovered documents, which have always been in its possession. Thus, Plaintiffs contend that Delta violated subsection (B) and sanctions under Rule 37(c)(1) are appropriate. The Court finds that this argument distorts the nature of the May 2010 order that established a deadline, but did not order Delta to supplement its responses. Thus, the Court will evaluate this argument and the above arguments under subsection (A).

Finally, Plaintiffs assert that Delta's discovery failures are particularly egregious in light of the "repeated inquiries from the DOJ and Plaintiffs about the [59] dearth of its production and the existence of backup tapes." The Court agrees. In response to these numerous inquiries, Delta unwaveringly but incorrectly maintained that "there is no collection of documents missing," and that reasonable inquiries would have prevented this entire quagmire.

Turning to whether Delta's conduct violated Rule 26(e)(1)(A), neither side has provided, and the Court cannot find, case law applying subsection (A) to facts similar to the facts of this case. However, several cases have addressed subsection (A) where a party belatedly supplemented an expert report, and the Court finds the reasoning in those cases, particularly *Cochran v. Brinkmann Corp., Civil Action File No. 1:08-cv-1790-WSD, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114895, 2009 WL 4823858, at 5 (N.D. Ga. Dec. 9, 2009), persuasive.

In Cochran, the defendant challenged the plaintiffs' disclosure of additional testing by their expert after the Court's deadline and asserted that it had been harmed by its inability to pursue discovery as a result of the plaintiffs' untimely disclosure. The plaintiffs contended that their expert had discovered shortcomings in his report, and thus they had recently learned that in some material respects his report was [60] incomplete or inaccurate. Consequently, they argued that they were entitled to supplement his report under Rule 26(e)(1)(A).

The Court rejected the plaintiffs' argument, characterizing it as a "tortured and self-serving" interpretation of the rule in order to introduce evidence foreclosed by the Court's orders. The Court reasoned that the purpose of the report requirement and the Court's deadlines was to "end discovery and fix for the parties the evidence and opinions with which they would have to contend at trial so a trial could be fairly and efficiently conducted." *2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114895, 2009 WL 4823858, at 5. The Court found that allowing the plaintiffs' tortured interpretation of Rule 26(e) would "hopelessly and unfairly frustrate[]" the rule's purpose and the Court's efforts. Id. The Court determined that although the plaintiffs' expert had been retained months in advance of the deadline, the expert failed to conduct testing to formulate his report prior [*1357] to the deadlines. 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114895, [WL] at 6. As a result, the Court found that Rule 26(e)(1)(A) precluded the plaintiffs' belated supplementation, as doing so would have allowed the plaintiffs to circumvent the Court's deadlines. Id.

The Cochran Court also determined [61] that the plaintiffs' failure to conduct the testing and to offer the opinions based thereon before the deadline was not substantially justified, and the late testing and disclosures were not harmless. Accordingly, the Court found sanctions appropriate under Rule 37(c)(1). 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 114895, [WL] at 7.

Like the Cochran plaintiffs, Delta tortures the meaning and purpose of Rule 26(e) by suggesting that it timely produced the recently discovered documents (always in its possession) after the Court's deadline. Just like the discovery deadlines in Cochran and made clear to Delta by the Court, the June 30 deadline established by the May 13 order was important to moving the case forward. Furthermore, there were extensive conversations between the parties and the Court about Delta's document production and the existence of back-up tapes. And in response to every inquiry and challenge, Delta represented that it had produced every requested document in its possession. Indeed, in its brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions, Delta represented, "There is no evidence that any document regarding Delta's decision to adopt a first bag fee in 2008 has not been produced by Delta to Plaintiffs."

Now, [62] Delta asks the Court and Plaintiffs to believe that it was unaware of the existence of the new documents in its possession the entire time. Even if true, it is only because Delta was not diligent in ensuring that the relevant hard drives were searched. Delta's counsel did resend to CSIRT the list of custodians' hard drives that should have been run through Clearwell for CSIRT to confirm that those hard drives were uploaded. However, CSIRT's reply email does not actually confirm that each identified person's hard drive was run through Clearwell. Delta has not identified other steps it took to ensure that all of the hard drives were in fact uploaded for processing through Clearwell, nor has it shown that it was impossible or unduly burdensome for it to determine which hard drives were and were not passed through Clearwell. Thus, as with the expert in Cochran who was retained months in advance but not diligent about conducting testing before the deadline, Delta was always in possession of the recently produced documents on the hard drives and back-up tapes, but it was not diligent in locating them.

Delta was also dilatory in determining the existence of additional back-up tapes. Given [63] the extensive discussions about the back-up tapes, Delta's counsel should have inspected the evidence locker prior to March 2011 and ceased to rely solely on CSIRT's representations that there were no other back-up tapes. *See Martinez v. Rycars Constr., LLC, No. CV410-049, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 142998, 2010 WL 6592942, at 2 (S.D. Ga. December 2, 2010) ("An incomplete report cannot be cured by the use of supplementation . . . . Supplementation of an expert report pursuant Rule 26(e) does not cover failures of omission because the expert did an inadequate or incomplete preparation.") (alteration in original).

Thus, as found in Cochran, HN6[] Rule 26(e) does not forgive Delta's failure to timely conduct an adequate and complete search for responsive documents. Even though subsection (A) required Delta to supplement incorrect or incomplete information, it does not grant Delta a "right to produce information in a belated fashion." *3M Innovative Props. Co. v. Dupont Dow Elastomers, LLC, Civil No. 03-3364 (MJD/JGL), 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 47972, 2005 WL 6007042, at 4 [*1358] (D. Minn. Aug. 29, 2005). In short, Rule 26(e) does not provide Delta a "safe harbor for [its] lack of diligence." Id. (Internal quotations omitted.) Consequently, Delta's recent and belated [64] document production violated this Court's deadlines, was not timely, and runs afoul of Rule 26(e). Consequently, the Court must determine whether sanctions are appropriate under Rule 37(c)(1).

As sanctions, Plaintiffs request an award of their fees and expenses incurred in connection with (1) this motion, (2) the portion of the discovery period that must now be extended, and (3) Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions. They also contend that Delta should be barred from using any of the recently produced documents as evidence during any proceeding.

The Court first addresses whether Delta can use the recently produced documents as evidence in connection with any motion or at trial. HN7[] Under Rule 37(c)(1), a party who fails to provide information as required by Rule 26(e) is not allowed to use that information unless its failure was substantially justified or is harmless. "[A]n individual's discovery conduct should be found 'substantially justified' under Rule 37 if it is a response to a 'genuine dispute, or if reasonable people could differ as to the appropriateness of the contested action.'" Devaney v. Cont'l Am. Ins. Co., 989 F.2d 1154, 1163 (11th Cir. 1993) (quoting Pierce v. Underwood, 487 U.S. 552, 565, 108 S. Ct. 2541, 101 L. Ed. 2d 490 (1988)). [65] "A discovery mistake is harmless if it is honest, and is coupled with the other party having sufficient knowledge that the material has not been produced." Go Med. Indus. Pty, Ltd. v. Inmed Corp., 300 F. Supp. 2d 1297, 1308 (N.D. Ga. 2003).

Exclusion, however, is not mandatory. See Bearint ex rel. Bearint v. Dorell Juvenile Grp., Inc., 389 F.3d 1339, 1348 (11th Cir. 2004) (Rule 37(c)(1) gives district courts "discretion to exclude untimely submissions."). Rule 37(c)(1) provides that in addition to or instead of excluding the late-produced information, the Court may order a party to pay the reasonable expenses caused by its failure; inform the jury of the party's failure; or impose other appropriate sanctions, including those listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(iv).

The facts of this case do not warrant a sanction precluding Delta's use of the recently produced documents. Even though Delta was dilatory in locating these documents, Delta immediately informed the Court and Plaintiffs about its discovery of the additional documents and asked the Court to suspend the case schedule, which the Court did. In addition, the prejudice to Plaintiffs is mitigated by the revised case schedule, which includes [66] additional discovery time and adjusted summary judgment deadlines, established in this Order. Cf. SCQuARE, 2008 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 5490, 2008 WL 228032, at *3 (finding preclusion appropriate in part because undisclosed documents would have changed court's decision with respect to motions for summary judgment). Furthermore, there is no evidence that Delta willfully withheld production of these documents, and there is no smoking gun of which the Court is aware at this point contained within the new documents. Consequently, a sanction preventing Delta from using these documents is not appropriate. See BFI Waste Sys. of N. Am. v. DeKalb Cnty., Ga., 303 F. Supp. 2d 1335, 1344-45 (N.D. Ga. 2004) (permitting plaintiff to use late-produced expert report where plaintiff produced report as soon as plaintiff received it and defendants had not shown they were prejudiced).

The Court finds that a more appropriate sanction would be to require Delta to pay Plaintiffs' reasonable expenses and attorneys' fees caused by Delta's failure, which includes Plaintiffs' request for fees and expenses related to this motion, the [*1359] extended discovery period, and its motion for spoliation sanctions. Delta made myriad misrepresentations to the [67] Court and Plaintiffs that its document production was complete, and it waited almost two weeks to inform the Court of the problems with its document production. Conveniently for Delta, the Court issued its order denying Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions on February 22, 2011, which was after Delta received the DOJ's letter but before Delta's March 1 letter to the Court. Moreover, Delta emailed the Court a letter on February 22, after it had received the DOJ's letter, in further support of its opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions, and this letter is silent as to the document-production problem. Indeed, the letter states that Delta "agrees with Plaintiffs that further discovery on [spoliation] issues is not necessary." Thus, the Court finds the above sanction amply warranted by the facts.

As for determining the amount of fees and expenses [16] owed to Plaintiffs by Delta, the Court strongly expects Plaintiffs and Delta to confer and agree on a reasonable amount for Plaintiffs' expenses and fees incurred in connection with (1) the motion for spoliation sanctions, and (2) this motion. If Plaintiffs and Delta cannot agree on a reasonable amount for these expenses [68] and fees, then on or before February 17 Plaintiffs shall file a brief in support of their claim for expenses and fees, accompanied by the affidavit of Plaintiffs' lead counsel attesting to the requested amount and reasonableness thereof; on or before March 3, Delta shall file a brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' request for expenses and fees; and on or before March 17 Plaintiffs may file a reply brief in support of their claim for expenses and fees. The parties are cautioned that any such submissions should be succinct, and not voluminous.

At the conclusion of the extended discovery period, the Court strongly expects Plaintiffs and Delta to confer and agree on a reasonable amount for Plaintiffs' expenses and fees incurred in connection with the extended discovery period. If Plaintiffs and Delta cannot agree on a reasonable amount for these expenses and fees, then within fourteen days of the close of the extended discovery period Plaintiffs shall file a brief in support of their claim for expenses [69] and fees, accompanied by the affidavit of Plaintiffs' lead counsel attesting to the requested amount and reasonableness thereof; fourteen days after Plaintiffs' filing, Delta shall file a brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' request for expenses and fees; and fourteen days after Delta's filing Plaintiffs may file a reply brief in support of their claim for expenses and fees. Again, the parties are cautioned that any such submissions should be succinct, and not voluminous.

[16] To be clear, the Court is awarding expenses and fees for (1) this motion, (2) the portion of the discovery period that must now be extended, and (3) Plaintiffs' motion for spoliation sanctions.

VIII. Plaintiffs' Issues with AirTran

As if the foregoing were not enough to wade through and resolve, Plaintiffs also have issues with AirTran's document production. In its first letter to the Court, Plaintiffs do not mention AirTran. Thus, by letter dated August 2, AirTran informed the Court that its review of Plaintiffs' letter indicated to it that the reopened discovery would only apply to Delta, and that to the extent Plaintiffs also sought its communications with the DOJ, it would not produce future correspondence. It also expressed its opinion that the newly produced documents failed to show that Delta and AirTran colluded on the first-bag fee.

[*1360] However, by letter dated August 5, Plaintiffs informed the Court that [70] AirTran had belatedly produced several of its communications with the DOJ related to the first-bag-fee investigation (125 pages of documents) and thus the following was necessary: (1) reopening discovery as to AirTran limited to the 125 pages; (2) ordering AirTran to search the files of two custodians, Fred Cannon and June Ritter, whose relevance to Plaintiffs' claims was revealed in the new documents; and (3) ordering AirTran to produce ongoing communications with the DOJ related to the first-bag-fee investigation. Plaintiffs have not provided a separate case schedule for AirTran, and their proposed case schedule only mentions Delta. Thus, the Court presumes Plaintiffs want the same schedule it proposed for Delta to apply to AirTran.

On August 23, AirTran responded to Plaintiffs' August 5 letter, and on August 30, Plaintiffs addressed AirTran's response. Their respective arguments are discussed below.

A. AirTran's DOJ Documents

AirTran objects to discovery being reopened for Plaintiffs to pursue discovery related to the 125 pages of documents it produced in May 2011. It contends that Plaintiffs had agreed with it that communications between its attorneys and the DOJ were not included [71] in Plaintiffs' document requests, and that it was not until May 2011, after discovery closed, that Plaintiffs "pressed AirTran for all its prior communications with the DOJ." [17] AirTran asserts that rather than object to Plaintiffs' request, it chose to produce the documents and avoid involving the Court in another discovery dispute. Thus, it contends that these documents were not "belatedly" produced.

AirTran's argument is meritless. In their first document request, Plaintiffs asked for:

> Since January 1, 2009, documents relating to any investigation by a government agency (including the Department of Justice) that relates to any allegation in Plaintiffs' Consolidated Amended Complaint, including documents provided to or received from the agency, documents reflecting testimony, and communications with third parties (including, but not limited to, Delta).

(Emphasis [72] added.) On its face, this request includes communications between AirTran's counsel and the DOJ. Moreover, as discussed below, any ambiguity was resolved by the parties' subsequent communications.

On March 11, 2010, AirTran's response/objection to the above request for production was:

> AirTran will produce the documents and privilege log it produced to the [DOJ] in connection with its checked baggage fee investigation and documents reflecting testimony of its employees in that investigation. AirTran objects to the remainder of this request as overbroad and unduly burdensome to the extent it requires AirTran to speculate on what documents not produced to the [DOJ] in connection with its checked baggage fee investigation might be deemed to relate to that investigation.

Noticeably absent from this response/objection is any objection to the production of AirTran's correspondence with the DOJ. Nonetheless, in its August 23 letter to the Court, AirTran incorrectly claims that it "produced the documents and transcripts it had produced to the DOJ and objected to producing other materials submitted to [*1361] the DOJ." AirTran also claims in its August 23 letter that "Plaintiffs did not challenge that [73] objection and instead reached an agreement on the scope of the request that did not include counsel's correspondence to the DOJ." Review of the parties' emails, though, shows this statement to be false.

[17] As for Plaintiffs' "pressing," on May 12, 2011 Plaintiffs asked, "Has AirTran produced to Plaintiffs all of its correspondence with the DOJ?"

On March 24, 2010, Plaintiffs' counsel emailed to AirTran's counsel a summary of their discussion about AirTran's responses to Plaintiffs' first document requests. Plaintiffs' counsel wrote, "AirTran will produce responsive non-privileged communications to other entities and will [reflect] any privileged communications on a privilege log. AirTran will also produce documents received from the DOJ Antitrust Division." In its March 26 email response, AirTran added only the following to Plaintiffs' summary: "AirTran understands 'documents received from the DOJ Antitrust Division' to mean the CID and any other documents it received from the Division in connection with the bag fee investigation." Nothing in these communications excludes from production correspondence between AirTran and the DOJ.

Yet in its August 23 letter to the Court, AirTran contends that this "modified scope . . . did not call for AirTran to produce its counsel's submissions to the DOJ, just the documents AirTran had received [74] from the DOJ" because "the phrase 'other entities' refers to entities other than the DOJ." The actual words of Plaintiffs' summary and AirTran's initial response/objection belie AirTran's new-found interpretation of the scope. As for the meaning of "other entities," AirTran's initial response/objection only mentions the DOJ, so it hardly makes sense that a clarification of the scope of the request, only two weeks after AirTran's response, would exclude the DOJ. As for Plaintiffs' summary, it explicitly mentions communications and does not exclude counsel's communications, and AirTran has not raised a privilege argument of which the Court is aware with respect to any of the communications. Thus, AirTran's August 23 interpretation is flawed.

Regardless of how Plaintiffs' summary is interpreted, any remaining doubt as to the scope of Plaintiffs' first document request was eliminated a few months later. On November 26, 2010, prior to the close of discovery, Plaintiffs' counsel emailed the following to AirTran: "Can you please confirm that AirTran has produced to Plaintiffs all of its communications with the DOJ regarding the DOJ's bag fee investigation, including but not limited to any [75] communications between AirTran's attorneys [18] and the DOJ regarding document preservation[?]" This email explicitly asks AirTran for all DOJ documents, including attorney communications. Nothing in Plaintiffs' question suggests, as AirTran does in its August 23 letter, that the parties "reached an agreement on the scope of the request that did not include [AirTran's] counsel's correspondence to the DOJ."

Consequently, AirTran's November 30, 2010 response to Plaintiffs' question—"AirTran has no communications with the DOJ in its files regarding the DOJ's bag fee investigation that have not already been produced to the Plaintiffs"—is incorrect. Furthermore, AirTran's August 23 explanation that "[b]ecause the DOJ has never raised document preservation issues with AirTran, and because AirTran had produced all DOJ correspondence within the modified scope of Plaintiffs' Requests [76] No. [*1362] 1 and 2, AirTran told Plaintiffs that AirTran had already produced all responsive DOJ communications" is meritless. AirTran's November 30 response unequivocally stated that it had no communications with the DOJ that had not already been produced; AirTran did not hedge, as it does in its August 23 letter, which states that AirTran produced all responsive DOJ communications. Quite simply, AirTran should have produced these documents earlier, but did not. Consequently, Plaintiffs have shown good cause for reopening discovery as to AirTran.

B. Files of Cannon and Ritter

AirTran also objects to searching the files of Cannon and Ritter because it contends that these individuals' involvement was apparent in other discovery responses, and thus Plaintiffs should have requested their files

[18] Nothing in Plaintiffs' document request or in this statement limits Plaintiffs' document request to correspondence with AirTran's in-house counsel. Thus, AirTran's contention in its August 23 letter that it "had no obligation to produce to Plaintiffs its outside counsel's correspondence to the DOJ" is without merit.

sooner. AirTran primarily relies on emails already produced to Plaintiffs showing that Cannon and Ritter were invited and accepted the invitation to the bag-fee-decision meeting. AirTran also contends that even if Cannon's and Ritter's files are relevant, the estimated cost of searching those files (in excess of $50,000) outweighs the likely evidentiary value of any documents ultimately produced.

Plaintiffs [77] disagree and contend that the recently produced documents "more strongly suggest the relevance of these two custodians than previously produced documents, and AirTran should be ordered to search their files." They assert that not everyone invited to the meeting attended, and it was not until they received the new documents that they confirmed that Cannon and Ritter had attended. Plaintiffs also assert that their request is not burdensome because they initially "agreed to the original limited custodian list based on AirTran's agreement to add additional relevant custodians upon Plaintiffs' request." The Court is persuaded by Plaintiffs' arguments and will order AirTran to search Cannon's and Ritter's files. See Am. Key Corp. v. Cole Nat'l Corp., 762 F.2d 1569, 1576 (11th Cir. 1985) (HN8[] "district court has broad discretion in all discovery matters" (internal quotations omitted)); Nat'l Indep. Theater Exhibitors, Inc. v. Buena Vista Distribution Co., 748 F.2d 602, 609 (11th Cir. 1984) ("A trial judge has broad discretion to control the course of discovery, especially in a complex antitrust case such as this one . . . .").

C. Additional Discovery

The Court will grant Plaintiffs' request to [78] reopen discovery, limited to the documents produced by AirTran after the close of original discovery. This includes but is not limited to the 125 pages produced in May 2011. The Court will also order AirTran to search the files of Cannon and Ritter. Neither Plaintiffs nor AirTran has addressed how long the new discovery period as to AirTran should last, but the Court finds that it should be less than four months. Plaintiffs seek four months as to Delta, which produced 60,000 documents, whereas AirTran belatedly produced significantly fewer documents and is being ordered to search the files of only two additional custodians. Therefore, a shorter discovery period is appropriate.

However, Plaintiffs' additional discovery requests should be narrowly targeted to avoid duplicating discovery that was or could have been conducted during the original discovery period. Discovery will reopen immediately and end three months from the date of this Order. Additional details are set forth below.

IX. Defendants' Correspondence with the DOJ

Plaintiffs also seek from Defendants all future correspondence with the DOJ related to the DOJ's first-bag-fee investigation. Plaintiffs contend that Defendants [*1363] should [79] produce these documents because their request is narrowly tailored and seeks relevant evidence. Specifically, Plaintiffs state that their request is limited to the DOJ's first-bag-fee investigation, and prior productions have already shown that the request is reasonably calculated to lead to the discovery of admissible evidence.

Both Delta and AirTran contend that the DOJ's bag-fee investigation is confidential pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 1313(c). AirTran argues that this confidentiality statute means that Plaintiffs must make a particularized showing of relevance and need before the statutory confidentiality is breached. Relying on *In re Urethane Antitrust Litigation, No. 04-md-1616-JWL, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134110, 2010 WL 5287675, at 7 (D. Kan. Dec. 17, 2010), in which the court denied the defendants' motion to compel because they did not show that the federal government's investigation into a possible conspiracy by plaintiffs was relevant, Delta argues that Plaintiffs seek its communications with the DOJ solely to gain some tactical advantage, which is both unfair and abusive.

Defendants also argue that they have already provided to Plaintiffs the documents and testimony that they provided to the DOJ for its first-bag-fee [80] investigations, and thus Plaintiffs have complete access to the factual evidence surrounding Delta's and AirTran's decisions to adopt a first-bag fee. So, they conclude that it would be unfair to permit Plaintiffs to go beyond factual discovery and pry into communications between Defendants' counsel and the DOJ.

In addition, Defendants assert that Plaintiffs are in regular contact with the DOJ, and AirTran argues that Plaintiffs have "never treated lawyer-to-lawyer communications with the DOJ to be responsive to requests directed to the parties." Thus, AirTran contends that it is inconsistent to permit Plaintiffs to see Defendants' communications with the DOJ when Plaintiffs have not produced their own communications with the DOJ. [19]

Plaintiffs respond that Defendants have not articulated any defense or privilege [81] that justifies their withholding future correspondence with the DOJ. Plaintiffs also argue, relying on In re Domestic Air Transportation Antitrust Litigation, 141 F.R.D. 556, 559-60 (N.D. Ga. 1992), that there is in fact no defense or privilege that supports Defendants' position.

HN9[] In general, "'where the proof is largely in the hands of alleged conspirators,' antitrust plaintiffs must be given 'ample opportunity' for discovery." In re NASDAQ Market-Makers Antitrust Litig., 929 F. Supp. 723, 725 (S.D.N.Y. 1996) (quoting Hosp. Bldg. Co. v. Trs. of Rex Hosp., 425 U.S. 738, 746, 96 S. Ct. 1848, 48 L. Ed. 2d 338 (1976)). In Domestic Air, 141 F.R.D. at 559-60, the antitrust plaintiffs' document request sought

> All documents received from or produced by you to any governmental entity relating to civil investigative demands . . . . Included within this request are any civil investigative demands, . . . and document requests themselves, any correspondence or other documents concerning the scope of the production under such demands . . . and any indices of the documents requested, gathered, produced to the government in response to any such investigatory request.

[*1364] The defendants in Domestic Air refused to produce copies of any government [82] CIDs, CID interrogatories, and their answers to the interrogatories on the grounds that such information was confidential. The court rejected their argument, finding that HN10[] in the Antitrust Civil Process Act ("ACPA"), 15 U.S.C. § 1311 et seq., section 1313(c) was the only restriction on the production of documents obtained in response to a CID and that § 1313(c) restricted disclosure "only by the officer to whom the report is made," i.e., the DOJ. Thus, the court determined that there was no provision of the ACPA that restricted production of the copies retained by the reporter, i.e., the defendants. Consequently, the court granted the antitrust plaintiffs' motion to compel the defendants to produce the requested documents.

Similarly, in NASDAQ, 929 F. Supp. at 725-26, the court determined that the ACPA did not prevent the antitrust defendants (the producing parties) from producing CID materials or the CIDs themselves to the plaintiffs. It also noted that the few cases that have addressed this issue have come down squarely in favor of compelling the production of CID materials in the hands of defendants.

Thus, it is clear from NASDAQ and Domestic Air that the ACPA and § 1313(c) do not [83] protect Defendants' CID correspondence with the DOJ about the first-bag-fee investigation.

Disclosure of CID materials, though, has its limits. The NASDAQ court held that the ACPA did not mandate the disclosure of all CID materials. Rather, their discovery was permissible only where they would otherwise be discoverable under the 929 F. Supp. at 726. As in this case, the defendants in NASDAQ challenged the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. relevancy of the CID materials under Rule 26, and the court determined that the CID materials were relevant to "liability and damages and potential impeachment material and [could] lead to the discovery of other admissible evidence." Id. at 725. Consequently, the NASDAQ court held that the requested CID materials were discoverable because they were relevant and not privileged.

Here, Plaintiffs assert that the requested CID materials are relevant pursuant to Rule 26(b), as they have already led, and will likely again lead, to the discovery of admissible evidence. AirTran summarily asserts in one sentence that Plaintiffs must make a "particularized showing of relevance and need"; however, other courts that have [19] The current letters before the Court do not indicate whether Delta or AirTran has specifically asked for Plaintiffs' communications with the DOJ, and only AirTran discusses the fact that Plaintiffs allegedly have not produced their own communications with the DOJ. Thus, neither side has addressed whether the rules permit or require Plaintiffs to produce these communications.

addressed this issue have rejected arguments [84] that a showing of "particularized need" is necessary to obtain CID materials. See NASDAQ, 929 F. Supp. at 726 (citing In re Domestic Air Transp. Antitrust Litig. (Domestic Air II), 142 F.R.D. 354, 356 (N.D. Ga. 1992), and In re Air Passenger Computer Reservation Sys. Antitrust Litig., 116 F.R.D. 390, 393 (C.D. Cal. 1986)).

Delta contends that Plaintiffs want its communications with the DOJ solely to gain a tactical advantage, which is unfair and abusive. Presumably, its objection invokes the protection afforded by HN11[] Rule 26(b)(2), which delineates the limits on the frequency and extent of discovery requests. In support of its contention, Delta relies on the antitrust case, *Urethane, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 134110, 2010 WL 5287675, at 7; however, Urethane is inapposite. There, the defendants (not plaintiffs) sought an order from the court compelling the plaintiffs to respond to their broad request for any documents that the plaintiffs had provided to any government agency related to any investigation into violations of antitrust law by the plaintiffs. In denying the defendants' motion, the court did not find their broad document request to be unfair and abusive, as Delta asserts. Rather, the court determined [*1365] that the [85] defendants failed to show how their request was relevant to a claim or defense. Here, Plaintiffs' request, which is limited to the DOJ and its first-bag-fee investigations, is significantly narrower than the request in Urethane. Moreover, Plaintiffs have shown that their request is relevant, and Delta makes no argument that the request is irrelevant. Thus, Urethane is not on point.

Defendants have not shown that any other Federal Rule of Civil Procedure prevents disclosure of their CID correspondence with the DOJ about the first-bag-fee investigations. Accordingly, the Court will grant Plaintiffs' request for all CID materials related to the first-bag fee investigation produced by Defendants to the DOJ, including correspondence, subject to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

X. Supplemental Class Certification Brief

Finally, in their proposed case schedule, Plaintiffs provide for themselves the opportunity to file a supplemental class certification brief. Their letters to the Court do not address why this supplemental brief is necessary, nor do they address why their proposed schedule does not permit Defendants to file responses to the supplemental brief.

Delta and AirTran object to [86] Plaintiffs' request for a supplemental class certification brief. AirTran contends that if Plaintiffs determine at the close of the new discovery period that supplementation is necessary, they should confer with Defendants to determine an appropriate course of action.

The Court does not take issue with Plaintiffs' request to file a supplemental brief. However, if Plaintiffs choose to file one, Defendants will be permitted to file a response to the brief as provided below in the new case schedule.

XI. Conclusion

The Court GRANTS Plaintiffs' requests (1) to reopen discovery on a limited basis and (2) that Defendants be required to continue to produce CID materials related to the DOJ's first-bag-fee investigation. The Court also GRANTS, as sanctions pursuant to Rules 26(g) & 37(c)(1), Plaintiffs' request for reasonable expenses and fees incurred in connection with this motion, their motion for spoliation sanctions, and the extended discovery period. The Court also ORDERS AirTran to search the files of custodians Cannon and Ritter if it has not already done so, and to promptly produce to Plaintiffs all documents encompassed within Plaintiffs' document requests.

The case schedule is changed [87] as follows:

(1) Discovery reopens as of the date of this Order;

(2) Ten days from the date of this Order, Plaintiffs will provide to the Court their proposed discovery as to both Defendants for this period, unless the parties can agree among themselves on the scope of Plaintiffs' additional discovery;

(3) Fourteen days from the date of this Order and as necessary thereafter, Delta and AirTran must supplement their discovery responses pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(e);

(4) On or before February 17, if Plaintiffs and Delta cannot agree on all or a portion of Plaintiffs' reasonable expenses and fees for this motion and their motion for spoliation sanctions, Plaintiffs shall file their brief and supporting documents as to the expenses and fees they and Delta cannot agree on;

(5) On or before March 3, if necessary, Delta shall file its supporting documents and brief in opposition to [*1366] Plaintiffs' expenses and fees for this motion and their motion for spoliation sanctions;
(6) On or before March 17, if necessary, Plaintiffs shall file their reply brief in support of their expenses and fees for this motion and their motion for spoliation sanctions;

(7) Three months from the date of this Order, discovery [88] as to AirTran will close;
(8) Four months from the date of this Order, discovery as to Delta will close;
(9) Fourteen days after the close of discovery as to Delta, if Plaintiffs and Delta cannot agree on all or a portion of Plaintiffs' reasonable expenses and fees for the extended discovery period, Plaintiffs shall file their brief and supporting documents as to the expenses and fees they and Delta cannot agree on for the extended discovery period;
(10) Fourteen days after Plaintiffs' filing, if necessary, Delta shall file its supporting documents and brief in opposition to Plaintiffs' requested expenses and fees for the extended discovery period;
(11) Fourteen days after Delta's filing, if necessary, Plaintiffs shall file their reply brief and supporting documents in support of their requested expenses and fees for the extended discovery period;
(12) Three weeks after close of discovery as to Delta, summary judgment briefs and Plaintiffs' supplemental brief regarding class certification will be due;
(13) Four weeks after summary judgment briefs, opposition briefs and Defendants' briefs in response to Plaintiffs' supplemental class certification brief will be due; and

(14) Three weeks after [89] opposition briefs, reply briefs will be due.

IT IS SO ORDERED this 3rd day of February, 2012.

HN2[] Vertical Restraints, Price Fixing

Downstream discovery may include, among other things, information concerning the plaintiffs' use, manufacture, sale, marketing, distribution or supply of a product to entities and individuals lower in the distribution chain. In general, discovery of downstream information is not appropriate when a potential class of antitrust plaintiffs is seeking damages for overcharges. Price-fixing claims may not be defended by proving that the plaintiffs did not suffer damages because they were able to pass overcharges on to their downstream customers. Downstream information may be discoverable if the plaintiffs are attempting to recover damages for lost profits, or if there is a fundamental conflict of interest among class members. A fundamental conflict exists where some party members claim to have been harmed by the same conduct that benefitted other members of the class.

HN3[] Relevant Market, Product Market Definition

Defining the relevant market is primarily a process of describing those groups of producers that have the ability to take significant amounts of business away from each other because of the similarity of their products. The outer boundaries of a product market are defined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between a product and its substitutes. Courts should consider how the product is used by consumers in general.

Opinion

[*621] ORDER

Before the court are Defendants Transitions Optical, Inc., Essilor of America, Inc., and Essilor Laboratories of America, Inc.'s Motion to Compel (Dkt. 209) and the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' Amended Opposition (Dkt. 220 Ex. 1). The court heard oral argument on the motion on January 25, 2012. For the reasons explained below, Defendants' motion to compel is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

Background

Transitions Optical, Inc. ("Transitions") purchases prescription eyeglass lenses ("ophthalmic lenses") from lens casters and applies a photochromic treatment that causes the lenses to darken when exposed to sunlight and fade back to clear when removed from sunlight ("photochromic lenses"). Transitions then sells the photochromic lenses back to lens casters, and lens casters sell the photochromic lenses to downstream markets, such as wholesale laboratories and retailers.

The Direct Purchaser [9] Plaintiffs represent a potential class of wholesale laboratories and retailers that purchased Transitions products from entities owned or controlled by one of the Essilor Defendants, Essilor of America, Inc. and Essilor Laboratories of America, Inc. The Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs represent a potential class of individuals who purchased Transitions photochromic lenses from downstream entities, such as retailers and eye-care practitioners.

The Direct and Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs allege that they paid inflated prices for photochromic lenses as a result of Transitions's anticompetitive conduct. Transitions allegedly entered into exclusive dealing arrangements with wholesale laboratories, retailers, and lens casters and refused to deal with lens casters that sold or promoted competing products. The Essilor Defendants own or control wholesale laboratories that sell photochromic lenses. The Essilor Defendants allegedly conspired with Transitions to monopolize the relevant market and restrain trade.

The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs assert five counts against Defendants for violation of the Sherman Act, as amended, 15 U.S.C. § 1 et seq. The Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs assert four counts [10] against Transitions for violations of state antitrust law, state unfair trade practices law, and unjust enrichment.

Discussion

The parties are currently engaged in class-certification discovery. Defendants seek to compel the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs to produce information regarding: (1) the relationship between the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs and purchasers lower in the distribution chain ("downstream discovery"); and (2) products other than photochromic lenses ("market discovery"). [1] The court will first [*622] address the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' general objections to Defendants' discovery requests before turning to the parties' arguments regarding downstream and market discovery.

1. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' General Objections

HN1[] A court must limit the scope of discovery if finds that: (1) the discovery sought is unreasonably cumulative or duplicative or can be obtained from [11] some other source that is more convenient, less burdensome, or less expensive; or (2) the burden of the proposed discovery outweighs the likely benefits considering the needs of the case, the amount in controversy, the parties' resources, the importance of the issues at stake, and the importance of the discovery in resolving the issues. Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(b)(2)(C).

The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs object to Defendants' discovery requests as unduly burdensome. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' response includes an affidavit from Scott Clarke, O.D. ("Dr. Clarke"), a principal for Central Illinois Vision Associates, Ltd. ("CIVA"), one of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs (Dkt. 220 Ex. 2 at 9-10). Dr. Clarke avers that information regarding CIVA's purchases and sales are contained in patient records that are kept only in paper format. CIVA must review its records prior to production to redact protected patient information. And because tinted lenses and sunwear comprise only fifteen percent of CIVA's business, CIVA's burden would increase by a factor of seven if it were required to produce information relating to its purchases and sales of non-photochromic products, according to Dr. Clarke.

As [12] discussed below, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs agree to produce information regarding their photochromic lens purchases. Such production will require the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs to search their records. Dr. Clarke's affidavit does not reveal whether searching for records relating to non-photochromic products will significantly increase the burden of the search. Dr. Clarke does indicate that the burden of redacting and producing records may increase by as much as a factor of seven if non-photochromic products are included. However, there is no indication as to the number of records that might be involved or how long production might take. Even assuming that Dr. Clarke's affidavit represents the burden faced by a typical direct purchaser, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs have not demonstrated that their burden of production outweighs the likely benefits of discovery (discussed below) considering the importance of the issues at stake, the amount in controversy, and the parties' resources.

The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs also contend that the information sought by Defendants can be obtained from other sources, including industry trade associations and Transitions itself. For example, [13] the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs state that The Vision Council, an industry trade association of which Defendants are members, routinely collects transactional data from multiple levels of the distribution chain and conducts comprehensive market research that it makes available to its members for free. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs also assert that Transitions collects sales data from many of its downstream retail and wholesale laboratory purchasers (see id. at 12-16).

[1] A summary of the disputed discovery requests is attached as an exhibit to the declaration of Defendants' counsel, Mr. Jeffrey C. Bank (Dkt. 210 Ex. 1). The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs dispute the accuracy of this summary and filed their own summary of the disputed discovery requests (Dkt. 220 Ex. 2 at 4-7).

There has been no showing that any industry trade association data is sufficient to permit the parties to conduct the market analyses required to address class certification or the merits of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' claims. Certainly, at this stage of discovery, it is possible that an individualized inquiry will be necessary to determine whether potential class members share common questions of law or fact and whether the named Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' claims are typical of those of other class members.

As to the customer data collected by Transitions, a review of Transitions's customer agreements indicates that Transitions collects information relating to the total number of lenses its customers sell each [14] month (id.). [*623] The agreements do not indicate that Transitions collects pricing data or information regarding the dollar amount of its customers' sales (Dkt. 221). As a result, neither the trade association data nor Transitions's customer data justify limiting the scope of discovery from the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs.

2. Downstream Discovery

HN2[] Downstream discovery may include, among other things, information concerning the plaintiffs' use, manufacture, sale, marketing, distribution or supply of a product to entities and individuals lower in the distribution chain. See In re Vitamins Antitrust Litig., 198 F.R.D. 296, 297 (D.D.C. 2000). In general, discovery of downstream information is not appropriate when a potential class of antitrust plaintiffs is seeking damages for overcharges. See *In re Air Cargo Shipping Servs. Antitrust Litig., No. 06-MD-1775, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 2 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 24, 2010); In re Vitamins, 198 F.R.D. at 300-01. This rule stems from Supreme Court decisions holding that price-fixing claims may not be defended by proving that the plaintiffs did not suffer damages because they were able to pass overcharges on to their downstream customers. *In re Air Cargo, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 2 [15] (citing Ill. Brick Co. v. Illinois, 431 U.S. 720, 97 S. Ct. 2061, 52 L. Ed. 2d 707 (1977) and Hanover Shoe, Inc. v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 392 U.S. 481, 88 S. Ct. 2224, 20 L. Ed. 2d 1231 (1968)). One consideration underlying the Supreme Court's decision to bar the "pass-on" defense was an unwillingness to complicate cases with attempts to trace the effect of overcharges on the plaintiffs' prices, sales, costs, and profits. See id. (citing Ill. Brick Co., 431 U.S. at 725).

Downstream information may be discoverable if the plaintiffs are attempting to recover damages for lost profits, see *In re Air Cargo, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 4 (citing Air Tech Equip., Ltd. v. Humidity Ventilation Sys., Inc., No. 05-CV-77 CPS, 2006 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 80198, 2006 WL 3193720, at *2 (E.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2006)), or if there is a fundamental conflict of interest among class members, see Valley Drug Co. v. Geneva Pharms., Inc., 350 F.3d 1181, 1192-93 (11th Cir. 2003). "A fundamental conflict exists where some party members claim to have been harmed by the same conduct that benefitted other members of the class." Id. at 1189.

Defendants argue that downstream discovery should be allowed because a conflict of interest may exist among potential direct purchaser class members. According to Defendants, some direct [16] purchasers might have benefitted from Defendants' alleged anticompetitive conduct by receiving discounts pursuant to the exclusive agreements. However, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs aver that none of the named Plaintiffs — the entities from which downstream discovery is sought — benefitted from Defendants' anticompetitive conduct because none of the named Plaintiffs entered into the exclusive agreements that are the source of the alleged benefit.

In seeking downstream discovery, Defendants rely on Valley Drug where the Eleventh Circuit allowed the defendants to take downstream discovery to determine whether the most significant plaintiffs, including three wholesalers whose transactions accounted for over fifty percent of the plaintiffs' total claims, received a net benefit from the defendants' anticompetitive conduct. Id. at 1188, 1190. The plaintiffs in Valley Drug were wholesalers that purchased pharmaceuticals directly from one of the defendants. Id. at 1186. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants entered into unlawful market-allocation agreements that kept less expensive generic pharmaceuticals off the market. Id. The net-benefit theory stemmed from the fact that some of the [17] plaintiffs sold their products on a cost-plus basis, which allowed them to charge the same percentage mark-up as their acquisition costs. Id. at 1190. Thus, some of the plaintiffs arguably benefitted from the higher acquisition cost of brand-named pharmaceuticals. Id. at 1190-91. In justifying downstream discovery, the appellate court noted that cost-plus sales alone would be insufficient to prove a conflict if it were not for the specific nature of the product and industry involved. Id. at 1191.

Here, Defendants have not identified any direct purchasers that benefitted from Defendants' conduct or provided any information [*624] regarding the extent of the alleged benefit. And Defendants do not identify any factors specific to the nature of the product or industry that support the existence of a conflict of interest. Defendants assert that downstream discovery might reveal a conflict of interest between the named and unnamed Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs. However, this assertion, without more, does not support the existence of a potential conflict of interest that justifies downstream discovery.

Defendants also submit that some unnamed class members might benefit from a lost profits theory of [18] damages, which would depend entirely on downstream discovery. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs respond that they are seeking damages based on overcharges, not lost profits, because overcharges are the standard measure of damages in cases such as this one. See Howard Hess Dental Labs., Inc. v. Dentsply Int'l, Inc., 424 F.3d 363, 374 (3d Cir. 2005). As the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs are seeking to recover for overcharges, downstream discovery is not relevant to the issue of damages. The mere possibility that some unnamed plaintiffs could benefit from a lost profits theory of damages does not justify the discovery sought. See *In re Air Cargo, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 4; In re Vitamins, 198 F.R.D. at 301.

Defendants also maintain that downstream discovery is necessary to determine the buying power of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs, a factor relevant to both class certification and the merits of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' claims. According to Defendants, differences in buying power between Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs at different levels of the distribution chain could highlight differences in their claims. Additionally, Defendants contend that the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs, in conjunction [19] with certain managed care companies, have enough buying power to constrain the prices that Transitions can charge for its photochromic lenses. Defendants also seek discovery of any agreements or communications between managed care companies and the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs.

The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs respond that downstream discovery is not relevant to class certification because differences in purchasing patterns or diversity in the types of businesses that make up the class do not render the class representatives' claims atypical or inadequate. Further, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs assert that they are small companies whose sales could not affect or inform an analysis of the downstream market. And in any event, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs claim that their buying power would be reflected in their purchasing records, which they have agreed to produce. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs also have agreed to produce a broad range of materials relating to managed care companies.

For these reasons, Defendants have not demonstrated the relevance of downstream discovery to class certification. The common issues to be resolved, if any, are not in the downstream market, but in the [20] direct-purchaser market where Plaintiffs allege that they were overcharged. See *In re Air Cargo, 2010 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 125623, 2010 WL 4916723, at 3. And although Defendants claim that differences in buying power will highlight the need for individualized inquiries concerning damages, Defendants do not explain how differences in buying power affect whether the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' injuries are susceptible to common proof. See Cordes & Co. Fin. Servs., Inc. v. A.G. Edwards & Sons, Inc., 502 F.3d 91, 106 (2d Cir. 2007). In any event, to the extent that differences in buying power exist among the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs, such differences will be reflected in the purchasing records that the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs have agreed to produce. See In re Vitamins, 198 F.R.D. at 301 (quoting In re Folding Carton Antitrust Litig., No. MDL 250, 1978 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20409 (N.D. Ill. May 5, 1978)) ("[B]uyers' leverage is not determined by profits, but by volume of purchases.").

Defendants also have not demonstrated the relevance of downstream discovery to the merits of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' claims. If overcharges exist, the amount of the overcharges will be determined by examining prices in the direct-purchaser market, not the [21] downstream market. Id. at 300. Allowing downstream discovery risks unnecessarily complicating the case with attempts [*625] to trace the effect of the alleged overcharges on the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' prices, sales, costs, and profits. See Ill. Brick Co., 431 U.S. at 725. And in view of the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs' representation that they will produce materials relating to managed care companies, Defendants request for production of agreements or communications between such companies and the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs is denied.

Lastly, Defendants contend that downstream discovery is relevant to class certification for the Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs and the merits of their claims. Defendants claim that downstream discovery will allow them to determine whether wholesalers and retailers passed overcharges on to indirect purchasers and whether Defendants' conduct had any pro-competitive effects that lowered prices for some indirect purchasers. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs dispute the relevance of downstream discovery to the indirect purchaser action and submit that any discounts that indirect purchasers may have received would be better reflected in discovery from the Indirect [22] Purchaser Plaintiffs. Further, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs argue that as third parties to the indirect purchaser action, they are protected from such burdensome discovery under Rule 45, Fed. R. Civ. P.

Defendants do not explain why discovery from the Indirect Purchaser Plaintiffs is insufficient to address the claims raised in that action. Defendants have not demonstrated that the relevance of downstream discovery to the indirect purchaser action justifies subjecting the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs to the burden of such discovery.

3. Market Discovery

HN3[] Defining the relevant market is primarily a process of describing those groups of producers that have the ability to take significant amounts of business away from each other because of the similarity of their products. U.S. Anchor Mfg., Inc. v. Rule Indus., Inc., 7 F.3d 986, 995 (11th Cir. 1993) (citing Gen. Indus. Corp. v. Hartz Mountain Corp., 810 F.2d 795, 805 (8th Cir. 1987)). The outer boundaries of a product market are defined by the reasonable interchangeability of use or the cross-elasticity of demand between a product and its substitutes. [2] Id. (citing Brown Shoe Co. v. United States, 370 U.S. 294, 325, 82 S. Ct. 1502, 8 L. Ed. 2d 510 (1962)). Courts should [23] consider how the product is used by consumers in general. Jacobs v. Tempur-Pedic Int'l, Inc., 626 F.3d 1327, 1337 (11th Cir. 2010).

Defendants seek, among other things, discovery of documents relating to the cost, purchasing, and sales of non-photochromic products. Defendants argue that such discovery is necessary for the parties to fully understand the relevant market and analyze the impact of the alleged anticompetitive conduct. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs respond that non-sunwear products are not functional substitutes for photochromic lenses and should not be considered in defining the relevant market.

As discussed above, Transitions creates photochromic lenses by applying a photochromic treatment to ophthalmic lenses. The treatment causes the ophthalmic lenses to darken when exposed to sunlight and fade back to clear when removed from sunlight. The resulting photochromic lenses serve two purposes: vision correction and ultraviolet-light protection. Consequently, [24] photochromic lenses can be considered functional substitutes for clear ophthalmic lenses as well as ultraviolet-protection products.

Documents produced by Transitions confirm that its photochromic lenses are intended to serve as a consumer's primary pair of corrective lenses (Dkt. 220 Ex. 2 at 39-41; Dkt. 222 Ex. 2 at 1-2). However, Transitions does not view its photochromic lenses as a replacement for sunglasses. According to Transitions, sunglasses are better suited for sustained outdoor use (Dkt. 220 Ex. 2 at 41) and may function in some settings where photochromic lenses do not, such as in a car. Nonetheless, photochromic lenses, like sunglasses, provide ultraviolet-light protection [*626] (Dkt. 222 Ex. 2 at 1). And sales of photochromic lenses may be linked to the sales of sunglasses (Dkt. 220 Ex. 2 at 44; Dkt. 222 Ex. 1 at 3), which presents the possibility that a cross-elasticity of demand exists between the two products. Therefore, discovery related to clear ophthalmic lenses and ultraviolet-protection products is relevant to defining the market at issue.

[2] "The cross-elasticity of demand measures the change in the quantity demanded by consumers of one product relative to the change in price of another." Jacobs v. Tempur-Pedic Int'l, Inc., 626 F.3d 1327, 1338 n.13 (11th Cir. 2010).

The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs shall produce information relating to clear ophthalmic lenses and ultraviolet-protection products, [25] such as sunglasses or clip-on sunglass attachments. However, the Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs do not need to produce information regarding frames, lens treatments, anti-reflective coatings, scratch-resistant coatings, or other products that do not correct vision or provide ultraviolet-light protection. The Direct Purchaser Plaintiffs need only produce information concerning these products as it relates to the direct-purchaser market, where the alleged overcharges occurred. This includes, for example, purchasing records from wholesale laboratories and retailers. However, information relating to clear ophthalmic lenses and ultraviolet-protection products is not relevant to the extent it constitutes downstream discovery.

Conclusion

Accordingly, and upon consideration, it is ORDERED and ADJUDGED that Defendants' Motion to Compel (Dkt. 209) is GRANTED in part and DENIED consistent with this order.

DONE AND ORDERED in Tampa, Florida on this 7th day of February, 2012.

ORDER

ENTERED BY MAGISTRATE JUDGE KRISTEN L. MIX

This matter is before the Court on Defendants Pivotal Colorado II, LLC ("PCII") and North Parker Investments, LLC's ("North Parker") Motion to Amend Answer [Docket No. 100; Filed November 23, 2011] ("PCII's Motion"). Plaintiff filed a Response in opposition to PCII's Motion on December 19, 2011 [#114]. On January 5, 2012, Defendants PCII and North Parker filed a Reply [#126]. [*3] The Motion is ripe for resolution.

This matter pertains to the Metro Defendants' alleged failure to honor agreements with Plaintiff with respect to "the construction and maintenance of certain public infrastructure." See Scheduling Order [#23] at 3. Plaintiff alleges that Defendant PCII petitioned the Metro Defendants' Boards of Directors to exclude certain property from the boundaries of the Metro Districts. Plaintiff further alleges that the reconfiguration of the Metro Districts' size reduced the number of tax-paying individuals within each "and rendered them incapable of discharging the indebtedness [to Plaintiff]." See Am. Compl. [#38] at 5.

Pursuant to PCII's Motion, PCII and North Parker seek to amend their Answer [#62] to add one additional affirmative defense: "One or more of Plaintiff's claims are barred by applicable privilege[ ]." Motion [#100] at 3. Specifically, they aver that "Plaintiff's interference claim may be barred, in whole or in part, by applicable constitutional privileges under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine."[1] Id.

As a preliminary matter, the pleading amendment deadline expired on January 3, 2011. See Minute Order [#23]. The present Motion was filed on November 23, 2011, and, therefore, is untimely. Accordingly, Defendants PCII and North Parker must provide good cause for their failure to timely move for amendment pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(4). If good cause is shown, the Court next considers any arguments raised by the parties related to whether justice would be served by amendment. Specifically, the Court should grant leave to amend "freely . . . when justice so requires." Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a)(2). Leave to amend need not be given, however, when the moving party unduly delayed, failed to amend despite ample opportunity to do so, the nonmoving party would be unduly prejudiced, or amendment would be futile. Foman v. Davis, 371 U.S. 178, 182, 83 S. Ct. 227, 9 L. Ed. 2d 222 (1962).

A. Good Cause to Modify the Pleading Amendment Deadline

Defendants PCII and North Parker have met the good-cause [*5] standard to modify the pleading amendment deadline pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b)(4), because filing an amended Answer prior to that deadline was not possible. As noted, the pleading amendment deadline expired on January 3, 2011. See Minute Order [#23]. On

---

[1] In general, "the Noerr-Pennington doctrine stems from federal antitrust law and exempts from antitrust liability 'the conduct of private individuals [*4] in seeking anticompetitive action from the government.'" Coll v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 642 F.3d 876, 894 (10th Cir. 2011) (emphasis in original) (quoting City of Columbia v. Omni Outdoor Adver., Inc., 499 U.S. 365, 379-80, 111 S. Ct. 1344, 113 L. Ed. 2d 382 (1991)).

February 7, 2011, Plaintiff filed an Amended Complaint [#38] adding Defendants PCII and North Parker to the lawsuit. Defendants PCII and North Parker waived service on February 10, 2011. See Waiver of Service [#50]. They filed their Answer [#62] on May 2, 2011.

Defendants PCII and North Parker must "show that [they were] diligent in attempting to meet the [pleading amendment] deadline," but this standard can be met by the provision of "an adequate explanation for any delay." Minter v. Prime Equip. Co., 451 F3d 1196, 1205 & n.4 (10th Cir. 2006) (explaining that lateness itself does not justify denial of a motion to amend, but "undue" lateness does). Here, Defendants PCII and North Parker could not have met an amendment deadline that passed before they were parties to the case. Thus, the Court finds that they have provided good cause for requesting leave to amend outside of the pleading amendment deadline.

B. Rule 15(a) [*6] Requirements

The Court next turns to Rule 15(a) and whether justice would be served by permitting amendment. As already noted, in situations where the request falls outside the pleading amendment deadline and assuming good cause is shown, leave should generally be permitted unless the moving party unduly delayed or failed to cure, the opposing party would be unduly prejudiced, or the proposed amendment would be futile. Foman, 371 U.S. at 182. Plaintiff raises three of these arguments against Defendants PCII and North Parker's proposed amendment: undue delay, prejudice, and futility. See Response [#114] at 2, 6-7.

On February 7, 2011, Plaintiff filed an Amended Complaint [#38], adding Defendants PCII and North Parker to the lawsuit which was originally filed in state court on August 10, 2010. See Verified Notice of Removal [#1] at 2. In the Amended Complaint, Plaintiff alleged that, "[O]n April 13, 2009, upon petition by [PCII] the Boards approved by resolution further exclusions of property from the Metro Districts." Am. Compl. [#38] at 5. Plaintiff also asserted that PCII "by [*7] words or conduct, or both, intentionally caused the Metro Districts to breach their contracts with [Plaintiff]." Id. at 9. On May 2, 2011, Defendants PCII and North Parker filed their Answer [#62]. In their Answer, they denied Plaintiff's contention that they intentionally caused the Metro Defendants to breach their contracts with Plaintiff. See Answer [#62] at 8.

On June 28, 2011, Plaintiff responded to Defendant Pivotal Group, Inc's First Set of Interrogatories, Requests for Admissions and Requests for Production of Documents. See Ex. B [#126-2]. In that response, Plaintiff included a detailed recitation of the facts and argument underlying its claim for interference with contractual relations. See id. at 4-5. Defendants PCII and North Parker aver that this response, "in part, helped lead [them] to conclude that the alleged petitioning activity was likely the only 'words or conduct, or both' of PCII that could possibly qualify as improper interference. It is this petitioning activity that PCII and North Parker now claim is privileged pursuant to the Noerr-Pennington doctrine/First Amendment petitioning immunity." Reply [#126] at 5.

1. Undue Delay

Turning to Plaintiff's first argument, [*8] the Court may deny a motion to amend based on undue delay. See Minter, 451 F.3d at 1205. "The important inquiry is not simply whether Plaintiff has delayed, but whether such delay is undue." Id. at 1206. The Tenth Circuit "focuses primarily on the reason for the delay." Id. A motion to amend is untimely if, among other reasons, the moving party has made the complaint a "moving target," is trying to "salvage a lost case by untimely suggesting new theories of recovery," is trying to present more theories to avoid dismissal, or is knowingly waiting until the eve of trial to assert new claims. Id. at 1206 (citations omitted). Other common reasons for finding undue delay include lack of adequate explanation for the delay or when a moving party knows or should have known of the facts in the proposed amendment but did not include them in the original complaint or any prior attempts to amend. Id. (citations omitted).

Both parties erroneously conflate their Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b) diligence arguments with their Fed. R. Civ. P. 15(a) undue-delay arguments. Defendants PCII and North Parker filed their Answer [#62] on May 2, 2011. They contend that they first learned of the applicability of the privilege [*9] upon examination of Plaintiff's discovery responses received on June 28, 2011. They first conferred with opposing counsel about the present Motion on November 10, 2011. See Reply [#126] at 8. They filed this Motion shortly thereafter, on November 23, 2011. The parties do not specifically address the delay between receipt of the relevant discovery material and conferral on the Motion. Defendants PCII and North Parker do note that they spent that time "investigating the underlying facts at issue in this case," that they "retained an expert witness and have had an opportunity to review the pleadings and discovery conducted to date, "and that they were then able to review "legal research on potential defenses to the claims asserted against them." Motion [#100] at 2-3.

The Court notes that Defendants PCII and North Parker conferred with Plaintiff about assertion of the additional defense more than three months before expiration of the discovery deadline. Moreover, as Plaintiff notes, the addition of a privilege defense was not a surprise to Plaintiff, because other Defendants had already raised this defense. See, e.g., Answer of Defendant Pivotal Group, Inc. [#48] at 20. Further, during [*10] the delay, Defendant PCII and North Parker were attempting to obtain evidence related to the defense. Although Defendants clearly delayed, the Court does not find that this history evidences undue delay.

2. Undue Prejudice

Plaintiff next briefly argues that it would be prejudiced at this stage of the proceeding if Defendants PCII and North Parker were permitted to add a new defense. As previously noted, the Court may deny a motion to amend based on undue prejudice to the nonmoving party. See Minter, 451 F.3d at 1205. Plaintiff states that it would be prejudiced because: (1) the deadline for expert disclosures has passed without Plaintiff's expert's consideration of the new defense; and (2) Plaintiff has not propounded any written discovery regarding Defendants PCII and North Parker's defenses because it decided that there was no need to do so based on the defenses listed in their current Answer. Response [#114] at 6-7. The Court notes that, according to Defendants PCII and North Parker, Plaintiff had not propounded any written discovery, on any issue, to Defendants PCII and North Parker as of January 5, 2012. See Reply [#126] at 9. The Court also notes that, according to Defendants PCII [*11] and North Parker, Plaintiff has not disclosed any experts with respect to the defense of privilege raised by any other Defendant in this lawsuit.

All things considered, under these circumstances the Court finds that Plaintiff has not demonstrated that undue prejudice will result from assertion of the new defense. See Foman, 371 U.S. at 182 (stating that the opposing party must be unduly prejudiced by the proposed amendment).[2]

3. Futility

Finally, Plaintiff argues that the proposed amendment is futile because the Noerr-Pennington doctrine does not apply to the facts of this litigation. Response [#114] at 7. More specifically, Plaintiff asserts that the doctrine "does not apply outside the antitrust context where the fact pattern involves illegal activity by the 'petitioner,' and it does not apply where the party invoking immunity has contractually agree to give up its petitioning rights." Id. at 10.

The Court may deny leave to amend on the basis of futility if the proposed amendment "would be subject to dismissal for any reason." Watson v. Beckel, 242 F.3d 1237, 1239-40 (10th Cir. 2001). [*12] The appropriate standard for determining the viability of an affirmative defense is found in Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f). *See Layne Christensen Co. v. Bro-Tech Corp., No. 09-cv-2381-JWL-GLR, 2011 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 96368, 2011 WL 3847076, at 6 (D. Kan. Aug. 29, 2011). Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 12(f), the Court "may strike from a pleading an insufficient defense . . . ." "An affirmative defense is insufficient if, as a matter of law, the defense cannot succeed under any circumstance." Unger v. U.S. West, Inc., 889 F. Supp. 419, 422 (D. Colo. 1995).

[2] The parties are warned that any request to extend the discovery deadline in light of the new defense must be made promptly and with a showing of good cause.

As noted earlier, the Noerr-Pennington doctrine exempts from antitrust liability "the conduct of private individuals in seeking anticompetitive action from the government." City of Columbia, 499 U.S. at 379-80. However, the Tenth Circuit has held that this doctrine may be used outside of the antitrust context, but only on the basis of the First Amendment right to petition. See Cardtoons, L.C. v. Major League Baseball Players Assoc., 208 F.3d 885, 889 (10th Cir. 2000).

At this stage of the litigation, Plaintiff asserts that Defendants PCII and North Parker are responsible for the alleged breach of contract by the Metro Defendants because Defendant PCII petitioned the Metro Defendants [*13] to exclude certain property from their boundaries. See Reply [#126] at 10; Am. Compl. [#38] at 5. Plaintiff first argues that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine does not apply "where the fact pattern involves illegal activity by the 'petitioner.'" Response [#114] at 10. Plaintiff contends that Kurt Wolter was "a self-described 'independent contractor of [PCII],' [who] was elected to the Board of Directors for Metro Districts 2 through 11, while retaining his various positions with PCII and other Pivotal-related entities." Id. at 8. Plaintiff argues that the Noerr-Pennington defense would not apply "if [Plaintiff] were to prove Mr. Wolter engaged in illegal action by aiding and abetting a breach of fiduciary duty by his fellow directors . . . ." Id. at 9.

Plaintiff also argues that the Noerr-Pennington doctrine does not apply "where the party invoking immunity has contractually agreed to give up its petition rights." Id. at 10. Plaintiff argues that:

> [Plaintiff] will seek to prove [that] Mr. Wolter was elected to be a director on the Metro District Boards and thereby [became] subject to statutory fiduciary and other duties . . . and that PCII employed him to use his influence to get the Boards [*14] to ignore the Reimbursement Agreements. Because PCII employed an agent who was already statutorily and legally obligated to act in the best interests of the Metro Districts, it implicitly agreed he could not 'petition' the Boards on its behalf in any manner which would violate the District's previous contractual obligations.

Id.

Plaintiff's arguments rely on providing proof of a number of facts in support of certain legal positions, neither of which are fully formed at this juncture. Moreover, Plaintiff has not addressed application of the Noerr-Pennington doctrine in the absence of proof of Mr. Wolter's alleged dual role. Thus, Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate that "the defense cannot succeed under any circumstance." Unger, 889 F. Supp. at 422. Without taking a position as to whether the defense will succeed, the Court finds that adding it may not be futile under the circumstances of this case. Accordingly,

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the Motion [#100] is GRANTED.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the Court accepts Defendants PCII and North Parker's Answer [#100-1] for filing as of the date of this Order.

I. RECOMMENDATION: The Court should grant defendant's motion to dismiss.

II. REPORT:

A. Background

Plaintiff GMA Cover Corp. ("GMA" or "plaintiff"), Michigan corporation, commenced this action on May 21, 2010, against defendant Saab Barracuda LLC ("SBLLC" or "defendant"), a Delaware limited liability corporation. Plaintiff filed an amended complaint on March 9, 2011. Taking as true, for purposes of this motion to dismiss, the well-pleaded allegations set forth in the amended complaint, the facts are as follows.

Both GMA and SBLLC manufacture Ultra Lightweight Camouflage Net Systems [*2] ("ULCANS"), which are used by the United States Army to camouflage vehicles by masking visual, thermal, near infra-red, and broadband radar signatures of the vehicles. See Amended Compl., ¶¶ 1-3. The ULCANS used by the Army come in several types. Woodland-styles are used in green and wooded environments, while desert-styles are used in desert environments. Each style can be a radar scattering type—which uses radar scattering technology to inhibit the passage, reflection, and return of a radar signal—or radar transparent type, which have limited combat use and are used primarily for radar stations. See id., ¶ 10. [1] Military equipment, including ULCANS, is procured through the Army Material Command ("AMC"), operating through Program Executive Offices ("PEO") responsible for certain particular items of military equipment. ULCANS are the responsibility of the PEO Combat Support and Combat Service Support ("PEO CS & CSS") located in the Army's TACOM Life Cycle Management Command in Warren, Michigan. See id., ¶¶ 11-13.

As relevant here the Army, through its Communications-Electronics Command ("CECOM"), issued a Solicitation Notice on March 25, 2003, indicating that it would award a single, five-year indefinite delivery/indefinite quantity ("IDIQ") contract for WRS and DRS ULCANS. Bidders had to submit exemplar ULCANS of each type and testing date, and CECOM conducted independent testing. GMA submitted a bid, including exemplars and other required documentation, in response to this Notice. However, CECOM determined that GMA's exemplars did not meet the Army's technical standards, and thus GMA was not considered a qualified bidder for the 2003 solicitation. This left SBLLC as the only qualified bidder. SBLLC was awarded the contract for WRS and DRS production for a five-year period, with a contractual maximum of $240 million. See id., ¶¶ 25-31. However, in 2004, as a result of military operations in Iraq, the Army experienced an increased demand for DRS ULCANS, in volumes that exceeded the contractual commitments under the 2003 contract [*4] with SBLLC. In 2005, the contractual maximum under the 2003 contract having been reached, CECOM issued another Notice of Solicitation, this one soliciting bids for a five year, multiple award IDIQ contract with five one-year options, and a maximum contractual value of $1.763 billion. Both GMA and SBLLC submitted bids in response to the 2005 Notice, and were the only companies to do so. Both companies were awarded IDIQ contracts, which were executed in 2006. See id., ¶¶ 32-38. GMA was advised by CECOM that, given its substantially lower bid price, it would receive the bulk of delivery awards and therefore needed to double its existing production capacity. See id., ¶ 39.

Pursuant to the 2006 contracts, CECOM guaranteed both SBLLC and GMA an initial production run of $20 million, at an established ceiling price (the highest price that could be charged by a particular supplier under the contract). GMA had a ceiling price for WRS ULCANS of $850.92 per kit and a ceiling price for DRS ULCANS of $1,042.71 per kit. GMA was awarded an initial production run of 11,705 WRS kits and 9,522 DRS kits on June 7, 2006. SBLLC's ceiling prices for the WRS and DRS kits under the 2006 contract were approximately [*5] $1,109.00 and $1,360.00 per kit, respectively. These prices were higher than the prices charged by SBLLC in 2005 under the previous contract, which were $786.13 and $878.24 per kit, respectively. SBLLC was awarded an initial production run of 8,555 WRS kits and 7,874 DRS kits. See id., ¶¶ 41-44. Following the initial production run, CECOM would order additional ULCANS through Requests for Quotes ("RFQs"), pursuant to which SBLLC and GMA could submit a bid identifying the price at which it would provide the quantity sought in the RFQ. See id., ¶ 45. The bids submitted in response to the RFQs issued under the 2006 contract form the basis of GMA's claims.

[1] The [*3] parties refer to the various ULCANS as WRS (Woodland Radar Scattering), WRT (Woodland Radar Transparant), DRS (Desert Radar Scattering), and DRT (Desert Radar Transparent).
